The Gospel of the Kingdom

For Young People's and Adult Classes

The enthusiasm with which so many adult Sunday school classes have taken up the gospel of the Kingdom series this fall prompts us to present the outline of subjects for the entire year of 1912. Problems relating to men, women and the home are uppermost the coming year. The magazine is adapted to both men and women, whether young people or older folks. Send 5c in stamps for a single copy of the magazine.

Faith

When John Hus journeyed to Constance to attend the council of the church it was at the invitation of the emperor and with the pledge of protection and safe return. Many friends who knew the deadly hostility of the Roman Church to the principles of the Reformation urged him not to put his life into such peril. But with confidence that the word of the sovereign could be trusted implicitly he journeyed forth only to find how fallible is the faith of man, and to atone for his mistake and glorify his testimony by a martyr's death.

There is no word more commonly used in the Scriptures to designate a ruling quality in the religious life than the word faith. It is used in many senses, but its highest meaning connotes the supreme values of Christianity. Indeed so impressive was the word in the vocabulary of the early church that gradually it came to be used as the synonym for the gospel itself, and "the faith" was the familiar term used among the first interpreters of Jesus to designate their new possession and fellowship.

A word so important as this is likely to suffer at the hands of partial interpreters. It has been affirmed that faith is the belief of testimony. There is of course a sense in which the assent to statements of fact may be called by this name, but this is very far from a satisfactory definition of Christian belief. The intellectual apprehension of historical truth may be valuable as a mental discipline or for purposes of culture, but it has no necessary connection with the formation of character.

Even the belief in the supreme facts of religious history is valueless to alter the disposition and restrain evil impulses. The belief in the fact of a sacred history of which the Hebrew people were the example, in the fact of the life and ministry of Jesus, in the facts of his death, burial, and resurrection, of his Messiahship and Saviorhood, no more constitute the ground of a transformed life than belief in the facts of the assassination of Caesar, the battle of Waterloo or the Proclamation of Emancipation by Lincoln. Such a definition of faith is utterly inadequate and meaningless.

Nor is the faith that saves a mere trust in the accepted beliefs of the church, however full and confident that belief may be. It has been the delusion of religiously inclined people through the centuries that the submission of mind to the teachings of the church, whether or not they seem to be in harmony with a rational explanation of history and the human soul, was an exemplary attitude, the ground of commendation and blessing. This is the particular tenet of the Roman Catholic Church which has done more than aught else to secure for that communion the unquestioning submission of her communicants to the traditions she has mediated from the past. In such an atmosphere inquiry is stifled, freedom is impossible, and the development of character, which always depends upon initiative and the search for truth, becomes impossible. The faith that is the product of such a view is but a pale and sickly thing, incapable of self-defense and of little worth in the organizing of Christian life.

Faith is confidence, trust, reliance, not upon statements of fact but upon a living object. Christian faith cannot repose upon a doctrine, but rather upon God who is the source of all truth, and our Lord who has revealed the Father.

The men of faith have been the men of confidence and courage. Abraham went forth from his Chaldean home because he leaned upon the divine assurance, and he went forth not knowing whither he went. That was faith in God.

The prophets of the tenth century before Christ placed Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, upon the throne of Israel because they had confidence in him that he would reverse the autocratic and centralized policies of Solomon and save the religion of Israel. But he disappointed their hopes and proved their faith to have been misplaced.

The Maccabees, father and sons, rose against the exactions and idolatries of Syria by reason of their intense faith in God and in their countrymen, and the issue of their faith was the most splendid demonstration of national spirit in the long history of the Hebrew race.

The apostles of Jesus went forth to their task of world-wide evangelism, relying implicitly upon the Master who had sent them forth. They counted not their lives dear unto themselves, but cheerfully bore all burdens and faced all hardships that they might win through to the goal of their desires in the diffusion of the Gospel to the Roman world. That was their faith.

Bernard of Clairveaux went through Europe preaching the second crusade, urged on by the confidence that God would deliver the tomb of the Savior from the hands of the infidel. It was a sublime and audacious faith, though its object was of secondary worth, and it generated a splendid enthusiasm in the heart of Christian Europe which even the disasters and sins of the Crusaders could not obscure.

Columbus went forth like Abraham not knowing whither he went, but filled with a great faith in God and in the future, and a new world was opened to his quest.

The missionaries of modern days have gone out to the ends of the earth in the faith of the Cross. Doubtless many of them have signified in this way their devotion to certain doctrinal beliefs, but in the last issue it has been faith in the Master they loved and in the God of all grace which has inspired them to their heroic service.

Even such is the faith of the humblest disciple of Jesus. It is a confidence that his way of living is the secret of success. It is the definite commitment of mind and heart and will to his control and ideals. It is the courageous and confident adjustment of life to his program, with unfailing assurance that the issue cannot but be good.

Faith is the essential quality in all human relationships. It is in faith in the integrity, skill and devotion of our fellow men that we undertake every act of the day. Our faith in men leads us to put our lives into the hands of train-men, elevator boys, street-car conductors, purveyors of food, physicians firemen, patrolmen, and the thousand obscure workers whose services are essential to the safety of our cities and homes. To refuse to exercise this faith would be to abandon all effort to live happily in the common world.

To be sure there are people who take largely this negative attitude. They are suspicious of banks, and therefore they hide their savings at home. They are afraid of trains and automobiles, and so they will not commit themselves to such dangers. They are wary of all advice given them, and therefore make no ventures beyond the circles which they can personally mark for themselves. Such people of course live hermit lives of inefficiency and suspicion.

The man of faith is one who accepts the universe as divinely guided and directed toward some good and satisfying end. He believes in his fellow men with an optimism which refuses to grow despondent in spite of their limitations and faults. He believes in God because such an attitude is the only one that can satisfy an eager and searching spirit.

He believes in Christ because his way of living proves itself to be the best. There may be many facts in the story of the life of Christ regarding which he is uncertain, and perhaps some of those events have been most stressed by the church. But his faith is not merely in events of the past, however significant they may have been in religious history, but in the Christ of the present, the master of men, the revealer of truth, the gracious and sympathetic brother of all.

Such a man shares the "faith of Jesus," not merely the faith which accepts Jesus as its object of confidence, though this is much, but the faith which Jesus had in God, in his fellow men, and in the ultimate triumph of good over evil. This is the faith which saves the soul from doubt, pessimism and misanthropy. This faith is the victory that overcomes the world.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

The Punishment of Crime

It is reported by the authorities in the study of penology, that there were 462,000 people who were arrested and sentenced to prison terms last year. That there is an increase in the number of these sentences is quite apparent. We may fairly raise the whole question of our criminal procedure. Is it doing the work that it should do? In order to answer this, we must ascertain what the function of punishment is. If, as the ancients thought, punishment is designed to furnish a quid pro quo, then we are only obliged to find equivalents and valuations for the various offenses and to impose the punishment to meet the crime. If, however, the social function of punishment is other than vengeance, then we must further define our course. The modern and rational punishment has for its first function, the protection of the rest of society and for its second function, the reformation of the criminal himself. If punishment was to be judged entirely from the first point of view, we should impose the death sentence for every form of misdemeanor. If we were concerned for the welfare of the criminal alone, then we would allow him freedom and a new chance, even though there were grave danger of his repeating his crime. The ancient idea of punishment, as we have said, was retributive, and the punishments were death, mutilation and fines. Imprisonment is a modern device which we have substituted for the more violent punishments. The theory of most imprisonment is that we give the prisoner time to think over his crime alone and thus bring him to repentance. Hence we call the state prison a penitentiary, or a place for repentance. Even though we satisfy retributive justice by our present procedure, it is evident that we are by no means satisfying any modern notion of punishment. Our offenders become "repeaters." This means that society is not being protected and the individual is not being reformed. In such case, we must pronounce our present system pretty largely a failure. We must undertake many important reforms in dealing with the criminal.

Who Is a Criminal?

It is important at the outset to determine who is a criminal. The story of Jean Valjean, by Victor Hugo, has set forth in immortal fiction the point of view that a normal man with great possibilities of good may be made into a criminal through stress of circumstance and further, that a violent criminal may be transformed into a philanthropist through kindness. In modern fiction, Jack London has taught the same truths through his two dog stories, "White Fang," and "The Call of the Wild." We all admit there are the occasional criminals who have committed a misdeed through some peculiar force of circumstances, but is there a criminal class, a genus of criminals? Lombroso, with his head measurements, was seeking to justify such a hypothesis. Did we believe that the shape of a man's skull was responsible for his criminality, or that the peculiar skull indicates a physical and mental make-up that predestined to crime, then we must regard criminals as unfortunates and not hold them responsible for their deeds any more than we do insane people. However, a long line of experimentation on the bearing of environment on crime would seem to show that any man is a potential criminal and that placed under certain unfavorable circumstances, most of us would fall into the clutches of the law. That heredity does have something to do with crime, was shown in the history of the Jukes family; but even here it was not a physical heredity so much as a social heredity of custom and point of view, that was the determining element. It was noted that when a member of the Jukes family did not intermarry in the family, the product was much improved. The modern social view-point, it seems to us, no more permits us to speak of a genus of criminals than it permits us to regard men as foreigners. Prisoners are men. Criminals, even murderers, have too much that is human in them to make them of another race alien to us. The criminal may have come up in an unfavorable family environment. He may have been goaded to poverty, or misled by associates, or perverted by drug habits, so that his conduct came within the scope of the law. In any case, our duty to him is that of brotherhood.

Our County Jails As Schools of Crime

There are many schools of crime. We might mention that colossal university of evil-doing, the saloon. The most indefensible of all the schools of crime, however, are those conducted by the state. The ordinary county jail is a first-rate school of crime. A visit to one of these will indicate that men and boys, first offenders and repeaters, are herded together in a common room and that even when in their cages, they can communicate. Even when the women are in a separate section, they are often able to talk to the men, and the polluted conversation that sometimes floats out upon the outer world from a jail window indicates that the county jail is anything but a reforming institution. The boy who was taken for a petty burglary is shown by the experienced hand how to do the same thing again and not get caught. Dickens, in his Oliver Twist, showed that there are schools for pickpockets in London. We can point to vast numbers of county jails which are engaged in the same nefarious kind of educational propaganda. These jails are the schools of various kinds of terrible and unmentionable sex habits. The idle inmates, who have not even the relief of work, must occupy their minds, if only in perversity. Nor must we forget to mention the physical surroundings of these unfortunate men. It is well known that the sanitary conditions of many of these jails are terrible. They smell worse than any animal cage. We know a lock-up in a most aristocratic suburban town which is in a basement. Under these circumstances, the man who is sentenced to thirty to sixty days in jail, may be receiving in fact a death sentence, for here may be the beginnings of tuberculosis. Certainly none of us would deny that it is necessary to take away the liberty of criminals at times. We must protect society. We must enforce the social conscience upon the refractory individuals until we can make them see the reasonableness of the law. However, there is no excuse for putting criminals into polluted air, physically and morally, while we seek their reformation.

The Prevention of Crime

The work of preventing crime is certainly more important than the work of reforming criminals. "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," is a maxim that is as true here as anywhere else. Since so many of our crimes are crimes against property, we find the prevention of poverty is also the prevention of crime. Many of the boys who are known in school as wild, are simply uninterested in the kind of thing that is given in the conventional public school. In the John Worthy School in Chicago, we saw several hundred boys that had been sentenced under the juvenile court act for misdemeanors. They had been unmanageable in the public school. They were working with a will here in manual training and in other lines, because they had a kind of education adapted to them. They leave with a trade, and a man with a trade is but seldom a criminal. It is the man with nothing but untrained hands that turns to crime more frequently. Perhaps even back of the education of the boy, we must ask about his heredity and his birth. To stop crime, we may have to prevent the marriage of some in the criminal class. Then the new science of eugenics teaches us that a more general knowledge of the biological origin of the human race will have much to do with race improvement and the prevention of criminals. Some of our preventive measures must be political. Honest policemen, courts that render just verdicts without delays of legal quibble, honest legislation, these all have a bearing upon the crop of criminals. The quickness and certainty of punishment has much more influence as a deterrent than does the severity of punishment. The care for discharged prisoners is another important measure. Much as we admire Maude Ballington Booth and her home for discharged criminals, we think there is a better thing for society to do than to allow these criminals to form a social group after leaving prison. That would be to remove the tabu from the man who has worn the stripes and to freely allow him a chance. The social injustices as a cause of crime, we have no space to discuss, but we only mean by this that here we are at the heart of the whole matter of prevention.

—The Methodist Episcopal Board of Foreign Missions, at its recent meeting in Denver, found itself facing a debt of about $175,000, a large part of which was an inheritance from the preceding year. It was arranged that special efforts should be made during the current year to pay the debt aside from the regular contributions. For the last year these were somewhat smaller than for the year before.

A Chorus of Affirmations on the Deity of Christ

The Sunday-school Times with its usual enterprise, gives us a page of great names who witness to this historic truth. Among them are Robert Ellis Thompson, Ph. D., LL. D., Philadelphia; Principal Andrew Harper, M. A., D. D., St. Andrews College, University of Sydney, Australia; President M. Woolsey Stryker, D. D., LL.D., Hamilton College, Clinton, New York; President William Douglas Mackenzie, M. A., D. D., Hartford Theological Seminary; President Milton G. Evans, of Crozier; Prof. Gerhardus Vos, of Princeton; Prof. James Hardy Ropes, of Harvard; Principal Fairbairn, of Mansfield College, Oxford.

The Rev. Wiliam Fairweather, M. A., Kirkcaldy, Scotland, bears this testimony:

I cannot subscribe to a purely humanitarian Christology. I share the church's faith in the Saviour's deity, and regard the sinlessness of Jesus, taken along with his own recorded testimony to his unique relation to God, as constituting a valid basis for the apostolic conception of the eternal pre-existence of the Son. "Divinity" may be a more elastic term, but hitherto, as applied to the Person of Jesus Christ, it has usually been understood to imply his absolute Godhead. To my thinking, the ethical perfection of Jesus is something more than human, and in presence of it I feel constrained to re-echo the sentiment of the disciple who said, "My Lord, and my God."

At the same time I consider that there has often been manifested a tendency unduly to neglect the human side of our Lord's personality, and that it is the wisdom of the church not to lay such exclusive stress on either its divine or human aspect as to obscure the full-orbed image of the God-man, "that highest type of being," who, while possessing the rights of the Son of God, meekly accepted the place of the Son of man, in order "to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many."

The affirmation of Professor M. B. Riddle, D. D., LL. D., of Western Theological Seminary, is valuable as indicating a tendency that is widespread.

I believe in the deity of Christ. The phrase "divinity of Christ," as now used, applies at its highest valuation to an Arian position, thus virtually reproducing the discussion of the Nicene period. But it may also be construed as Socinian, and simply amount to "the divinity of man."

There are other testimonies yet to appear; but these will be of particular interest because of their bearing upon the faith of these men, some of whom are in the fore-front of modern Biblical scholars. The historic Christ remains a powerful figure to many of the greatest living scholars, and we rejoice that their convictions have not reduced them to a necessity of preserving an "ideal Christ," a position involving greater difficulties than any on the New Testament page in that it gives us shadow without substance, a creation, in that well-known phrase, which makes its author a much greater figure than the hero.

Episcopal Church Growth

Reports of Episcopal Church growth for the year 1910-1911, now completed, show two per cent increase in communicants, and $309,000 in gifts. The number of members is now 963,000, indicating that the 1,000,000 membership mark will be passed in 1913. The total gifts are almost $19,000,000, or $20 per member average. The number of Episcopal churches is now 8,065, an increase of seventy-eight for the year. The unfavorable showing is made by the Sunday-schools. Always among the lowest of religious bodies in proportion of scholars to adult members, the church lost 6,337 scholars last year, and is now down to 449,938. The report gives out no information why this loss, nor can any steps be traced in any quarter to recover it.

What is regarded as an effort to bring about closer relations between the Episcopal Church and the Eastern Orthodox Communions, not subject to the Pope of Rome, that have organized congregations in this country is the clergy list of Russian, Syrian, Servian, Greek and Polish churches published in the Episcopal report. These lists show that members of these Eastern churches are scattered in almost every part of the United States. The official seat of the Russian church in America is New York; of the Syrian, Brooklyn; the Servian, Los Angeles; of the Polish, Scranton, Pa.; while Greek is without an ecclesiastical system, depending for its central administration upon Greek patriarchs at home. Philadelphia Greek churches have no fewer than 4,000 members, Chicago 24,000 and New York 30,000.

While the Episcopal church's growth last year was about normal—it is fairly regular at two to three per cent per year—it fell relatively behind population growths in some cities. These include New York, Chicago, Detroit, Newark, Minneapolis, Denver and Atlanta. The official report says it might be thought the proportionate loss is due to excessive growth of foreign population were it not for that fact that in other cities, where there has also been foreign growth, there has been a relative gain. These gains are in Pitsburgh, Cincinnati, Washington, Louisville, Syracuse, Scranton, and even Hoboken. The report concludes, from the showing made, that the great task before the Episcopal church is a home mission advance. It refers to recent efforts for foreign missions, and while disclaiming any intent to antagonize friends of these campaigns, it believes, it says, that strategy and duty alike demand the larger emphasis at home, and especially in the Middle West.

Have We a Papal Court at Washington?

In view of the publicity given to the appointment of the nineteen cardinals by the Vatican, it is interesting to note the following from the United Presbyterian:

The creation of three new cardinals for America appears to be given the place of a political event of national importance. It belongs to the Roman Catholic powers to give out as many red hats as they may think proper; that is a matter of internal administration of the church. But in some way it seems that a public recognition of Catholic events is given by our politicians and the press not given to the doings of other churches and which should not be given. On Thanksgiving Day, President Taft, members of the cabinet, justices of the Supreme Court and members of the diplomatic corps attended a Thanksgiving mass in St. Patrick's Catholic Church. The twenty nations of Latin America were represented, and the building was decorated with their flags entwined with our own. "The ceremony was a blend of the religious and patriotic." It was a blend that does not belong to the spirit of American institutions. Our political leaders bend to the approaches of the leaders of the Catholic Church until we are in danger of becoming a vassal of the pope. Our president should give more attention to the proprieties of his office, and less to political favors.

Why Was Archbishop Ireland Left Out?

From the same paper we clip the following:

After all it would seem that there are some heart-breakings and disappointed ambitions as was true in other years in connection with the spectacular investiture of new cardinals. The American prelate who has more largely the favor of the newspapers than any other, except, perhaps, Cardinal Gibbons, is Archbishop Ireland. It was prophesied that he would be adorned with the cap when a new distribution was made, but he was passed by—not by accident at all. Some of the Catholic papers mildly express disappointment, illustrated by the following from the Western Watchman, of St. Louis:

"The Ave Maria, after devoting nearly a column of eulogy on the new American cardinals, has this to say: 'The general rejoicing over their elevation, however, is not unmixed with regret that at least one other American prelate, whose services to the church are so conspicuous as to render the mention of his name unnecessary, was not included in the bestowal of Papal honors. Though, of course, no complaint on this score will be heard from American Catholics, they cannot help feeling regretful, and may be excused for expressing disappointment. Political activities familiar to every one, combined with unrecognized instrumentalities, have resulted in the deprivation to the sacred college of a cardinal who would have been a light among its most illustrious members.'"

This statement is not overdrawn and the coming semi-centennial celebration of Archbishop Ireland's priesthood will give the American people an opportunity of expressing their feeling on the subject. We would not be surprised if the golden jubilee of the St. Paul prelate were to eclipse that of Cardinal Gibbons in splendor and magnificence.

—Some of the recent missionary charts show that the amount expended for work at home, according to The Churchman, in 1910, was hardly more than the nation's confectionery bill, and the contributions for foreign missions, less than half the cost of America's chewing gum. A very striking chart shows by circles of different sizes, the number of people to each Protestant minister in the United States and in various foreign countries. Africa, it appears, is twice as well provided for as Japan, and counts nearly six times the missionary ratio of the Chinese Empire. In the religious census of the world, it may be interesting to note that this latest computation reckons Roman Catholics at 273,000,000, Protestants of various names at 166,000,000, the several Orthodox churches of the East at 120,000,000. Jews are thought to number 11,000,000, Mohammedans 217,000,000, and those of other faiths, or none, 837,000,000.

Improving On Our Past Achievements

In theory we are all ready and anxious to improve on our past achievements. The old fogy is our horror. We shun him as we shun the plague. In practice we are apt to be different. The old ways are so easy to follow that we look with suspicion upon every invitation to change. We identify all virtue with our practice. We acknowledge the limitations of our thought, yet when conditions require a re-statement of the doctrines of Christianity, we are very suspicious of honest men who attempt to make such adjustments as the times demand. We do not quickly discern the signs of the times in the social world. We try to put new wine into old bottles. We can improve upon the old habits of worship. Periods of silence in the prayer meeting ought to be more common than they have been, provided we learn the uses of silences. Two good friends sat together one evening and neither said a word for an hour or two. When the visiting friend arose to go, one said, "We have had a pleasant visit this evening." Both were able talkers when talk was needed. Both knew the value of silent companionship. We think the prayer meeting is a failure if there has not been a continuous stream of talk. Why should we not give God a chance to work in our hearts without the medium of the words of others? Religious meditation is almost a lost art. And because we cannot practice this art, our speech has not the weight it ought to have. It requires few words to reveal faith that is rich and strong.

There are many of us who could improve our habits of church attendance. We have been thinking that the minister is responsible for the spiritual tone of the Sunday meetings. The poorest preacher on the face of the earth cannot take away the inspiration from a gathering of the right kind of people. We go to the church on Sunday to meet with those who have like faith with ourselves and to join with them in the worship of God. The absence of eloquence from the public meeting need not cause us to forget our brethren and the God whom we have come to worship. It is well to consider the effect of the sermon on those who are not Christians. We serve God acceptably when we use the greatest care in selecting a minister of ability and character. But we ought not to be such religious weaklings that we cannot enjoy the fellowship of the house of God without the aid of a great preacher. There is power in the right sort of congregation. It is the church speaking through the preacher that compels attention. A very feeble preacher is wonderfully effective when he speaks for the right sort of church.

A little more attention to the financial side of church life would add to the power of most churches. The coal dealer has more confidence in the exhortations of the church if he holds no bills of long standing against it. The preacher has greater force in delivering his message when he feels that he is working with people who know what fair dealing is and who live up to their knowledge. What we give, we should give after careful thought. A church properly trained does not have to hire a specialist in generating enthusiasm when it needs to have money for local expenses and for missions. An educated disciple does not resent the request of the finance committee that he pay his part toward the support of the church. He does not stay at home when there is a special collection.

The social life of the church is always capable of improvement. We can learn to welcome strangers without leaving on them the impression that we are the only ones benefited by their presence. We have much to learn about the way in which we must meet church visitors and church members in order to leave the conviction with them that they are in the house of God and that we are glad to have them with us as fellow worshipers and servants of God. We must neither fear nor patronize our visitors. We must greet them as those who have the same needs that we have and who can find help from the God whom we are trying to serve. The Meaning of Baptism

XIII.—THE BAPTISM OF JESUS. (Concluded.)

[It is hoped that all readers of this concluding portion of the article on The Baptism of Jesus will re-read last week's installment, taking the two sections as one article. The break between them was unduly abrupt on account of insufficient space having been set apart for the treatment last week.—THE EDITORS.]

All these great structural notes of John's message aroused in Jesus inexpressible emotion. This is God's doing, he said. John is God's prophet. His message is God's truth. His movement is God's enterprise. What his own attitude should be Jesus was not for a moment in doubt. Consecrated as he was to do the will of God, to take one step at a time until the full purpose of God should be disclosed to him, he perceived that duty called him to ally himself with John's movement.

Up to this time his consecration to God was an individualistic, private, inner purpose. He had not allied himself with any voluntary social movement of righteousness, because in the first place, there was none (though there were many movements that claimed a messianic character) to which he could give his allegiance and, in the second place, because his own soul had been engaged in the inner struggle of defining its relation to the divine will. A provisional solution has now been given to this struggle, a sort of working hypothesis, upon the basis of which he is ready to take his place actively in any movement that is evidently inspired of God.

He goes forward, therefore, to identify himself with John's movement, to socialize his inner consecration, to stand with penitent men who seek to do God's will, to humbly take the place of a disciple of the fearless prophet who is already laying the ax at the root of the tree of effete Judaism. John's work, he sees, is God's work, and the prompting of God's spirit urges him to invest his personality in it. Whether John and Jesus had been personally acquainted before this time we do not know, though it is not unlikely that here at the Jordan from day to day there was afforded an opportunity for conversation on the high themes of which the Baptist discoursed.

At all events, when Jesus presented himself for baptism the prophet was well aware of the superior insight of Jesus into the things of God. He remonstrated with him. I have need to be initiated by you into the secrets of the divine will, he said. I have no grace to confer upon you. You have grace which should be conferred upon me. My movement is elementary. I speak but the rudiments of the will of God. I cannot allow you to be put in the position of a disciple of mine. I should be your disciple. "I have need to be baptized of thee."

But Jesus said: "Suffer it to be so now." He, too, knew his superiority to John. He was aware of the incompleteness of John's message. It was a message of repentance and righteousness—an ethical message. As such it would soon reach its limitations. It was a prophetic message. But Jesus was aware that the message of human redemption must have in it the priestly note of sacrifice, of atonement. John's preaching was austere, peremptory. It lacked those characteristics of graciousness and patience with human sinning which Jesus felt belonged to a full revelation of God. He was aware, thus, of the temporary character of his relation to John as a follower. Suffer it to be so now; he said. Let us leave the question of superior and subordinate to God. It is clear that your work is in the plan of God. Yours is an enterprise of righteousness. I wish to stand with you and your penitent disciples. In allowing me so to do we shall be fulfilling the righteous will of God.

And John baptized him, made him a member of his messianic community, conferred upon him the status of a disciple, a status which Jesus willingly and humbly accepted as a tribute to the divinely sent prophet and an act of self-identification with his fellows who were seeking the kingdom of righteousness and awaiting the coming of the messianic king.

How the rich significance of this crucial event in both John's and Jesus' lives is legalized away by those who would make the Baptist say, I have need to be immersed of you! In what conceivable sense could John have needed to be immersed of Jesus? If baptism was the physical act of immersion it would seem more appropriate that the subordinate should immerse the superior, than the superior the subordinate. But because the baptism was the conferment of a status, the initiation into a social community or fellowship of which John was the teacher and leader, he felt the inappropriateness of conferring the badge of the community upon one whom he regarded as superior to the community and to himself.

It was not the physical act of immersion but the psychical, social, spiritual presuppositions of immersion that gave ground in John's mind to his remonstrance. And these presuppositions constituted the essential nature of the baptismal act to which our Savior submitted.

If we search for something distinctive and unique in the baptism of Jesus we shall find it not in the baptismal act as such, but in the fact that he, the sinless one, was willing to take his place by the side of sinful men and merge his unstained personality into the common life of sinful men seeking righteousness. This was an act of benignant grace. It was the beginning of that redemptive ministry which consisted in actually making his own the sins of the world, in identifying himself with sinful men in the freemasonry of the incarnation. His baptism was in very truth a vicarious baptism of repentance for remission of sins. Those commentators who are struck dumb when they see Jesus, the sinlesss one, coming to a baptism which in the case of every other candidate has reference to the remission of sins, are obsessed with the idea that the baptism is a mere personal sacrament, with its meaning in itself and producing an effect directly upon the soul of the one baptized. They identify it with the washings of purification, common among the Jews. But this is to miss the essential thing in the baptism: it was initiatory; its virtue was not in itself; it bestowed no forgiveness of sins. Its essential character was the public avowal by the candidate of the ideals and obligations of John's community of penitent men and the social act of induction into that community.

It allied the candidate with a communal life in which would be found forgiveness and righteousness.

It was into this communal life that Jesus wished to enter. He felt the sense of solidarity with all men. He was here on a mission of incarnation. He stood on man's level. Knowing no sin, he became sin, that he might redeem mankind. It is as idle, says a great teacher, to tell a wife that she has no need to feel ashamed because her husband is committed for fraud, as to tell Jesus that he need not be baptized because he has no personal guilt. It is precisely in this, his self-identification with men in an initiation into an order of the penitent, that his divine character is disclosed. This is the very spirit of Messiah.

The baptism of Jesus was thus his first messianic act—not because the baptism was unique but because he was unique. What more appropriate time could the Father have chosen to put beyond further doubt the messianic character that he bore? We do not marvel that to his soul the divine disclosure came as he went up from the water, "Thou art my beloved son; I am well pleased in thee!" The provisional solution of his long struggle has passed into a certainty, the working hypothesis into an indisputable fact. He now knows. From this time forward he never doubts his inner dignity as the one on whom Israel's redemption rests.

And some days afterward John, seeing him mingling with gracious freemasonry in the throng of the sinful, stopped his discourse, and pointing his staff at him, said, "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world! He must increase, but I must decrease!"

XIV. Baptism and the Commission.

The crux of the baptism controversy is the interpretation of the commission recorded in Matthew's gospel as the farewell words of our Savior. On the assumption that baptism and the physical act of immersion are equivalents, legalism appeals to Matt. 28:19 as its Magna Charta: "Go ye therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

It is claimed that this text puts the authority of Jesus behind immersion by an unequivocal mandate. It is important, therefore, to submit this claim to the most rigid examination. As Christians we are committed to do whatever Jesus Christ bids us do. His will is the normative law for our conscience. Our faith is in him. We believe that he knows the will of God and the laws of our human life better than we, and that he is a safe guide even when our reason does not agree with his command. Having given him our allegiance it is our instant and abiding duty to understand his mind, to know his will concerning us. If he has commanded immersion in water we are in all good conscience bound either to be immersed or to qualify our allegiance to him.

It would be a short-cut and by no means insufficient treatment of the question—in the light of our previous studies of the meaning of the word "baptize,"—to rest content with simply pointing out that there is no reference to immersion in the commission, but to baptism. These two, as we have seen, are not equivalent and interchangeable terms. Baptism is essentially a psychical, social act of induction into a religious community, the conferment of a new status upon a convert. Immersion is a physical act which, mainly by the incident of custom, was used in the time of Christ as the sign and token of this volitional act of community and candidate. So far as the sheer argument requires us to go it would be enough merely to call attention to this verbal point and close the case. But this would not be completing our task. Our task is not simply to find the meaning of the word "baptize" but the meaning of baptism itself. We may use the meaning of the word, we must use it, in determining the meaning of the act, but the meaning of the act takes us behind words and lexicons into the minds of those who participated in the act of baptism. Our problem in studying the commission is to discover, if we can, the larger program of Jesus as it lay in his own mind at the time the commission was uttered, and in that program to find the meaning of the baptism included in it.

Before entering upon that most fascinating quest, however, we are compelled, in candor, to reckon with the objection which an imposing body of scholarship is today making, namely that the baptism clause (including the trinitarian formula), if not the entire text of Matthew's commission, is not a part of the original writing but an interpolation by a later hand. The consideration of this aspect of the subject takes us into a technical field somewhat unfamiliar to the general reader. But it is our purpose to treat the materials in an untechnical way, only summarizing the facts involved, omitting details and lengthy citations from authorities. It is well known to the reader, no doubt, that the authenticity of the last twelve verses of Mark's gospel, including his account of a commission similar to Matthew's, is rejected by scholarship generally, both conservative and radical. The other gospels contain no record whatever of such a commission. We are dealing, therefore, solely with Matthew's record.

It is not the presence of baptism in the commission that first suggested to scholars the possible later origin of Matt. 28:19, but the presence of the trinitarian formula—"into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." This formula, says Harnack, "is foreign to the mouth of Jesus and has not the authority in the apostolic age which it must have had if it descended from Jesus himself." "The trinitarian formula," says Marcus Dods, "in the mouth of Jesus is certainly unexpected."

In the numerous references to baptism found in the book of Acts and elsewhere in the New Testament we would expect that so precisely formulated a rubric for baptism would be used. Instead of this the New Testament is silent on the trinitarian formula, and the book of Acts uses another formula four times—Acts 2:38; 8:16; 10:48; 19:5—twice "in the name of Jesus Christ," and twice "into the name of the Lord Jesus." Paul's allusions to baptism "into Christ" or "into Christ Jesus" would seem to bear out the view that the earlier formula of baptism used only the name of Jesus, and indicate that the trinitarian formula was a later addition.

It is also argued that the definite statements by Luke (Acts 1:5), contrasting John's water baptism with the baptism of the Holy Spirit which the disciples were soon to receive makes against the likelihood of Jesus' commanding them to baptize with water. Moreover, Paul in writing to the Corinthians declares that Christ sent him "not to baptize but to preach the gospel." It is hardly conceivable that Paul who was exceedingly careful concerning his apostolic reputation would acknowledge such a limitation in his commission, if Christ had specifically commanded the other apostles to baptize.

But the problem concerns not simply the clause of the commission enjoining baptism and prescribing the formula for its observance, but the entire commission itself, taken as a whole. There is in the entire utterance as it stands in our first gospel a certain dramatic, speech-making quality which we do not find Jesus assuming in the earlier and authentic records of his sayings. We do, however, after a century and more has elapsed, find, in the later tradition, apocryphal sayings issuing from the lips of Jesus in this august and heroic tone of voice. Had Jesus assumed such an attitude of legal authority over his disciples as this commission implies it would indicate a lapse from that high level upon which he had placed them just before his death, when he said, Henceforth I call you not servants, but friends. You are not so much to do my commandments as to participate in my spirit and my plans. The servant knows not what his master is doing. But I have tried to make known to you all the things of my Father. Whatever counsel Jesus may have given them about their impartation to the world of the new life they had received from him and which had been revived and established by his resurrection, it is contrary to his whole attitude that he should set up at the last a statutory regulation dealing with precise methods of procedure, back to which as to a norm the disciples were evermore to refer. He, not any statute that he promulgated, was to be the norm of their lives.

But apart from this apriori consideration it seems incredible that words of such august moment as this commission is assumed to be should be entirely omitted by Luke and John. It is inconceivable that any one writing the story of Jesus would omit so important an utterance at the very climax of our Savior's mission. It may be argued that Luke at least does record Jesus as teaching that repentance and remission of sins are to be preached to all nations, and that baptism was virtually inseparably associated with remission of sins in the minds of the early Christians, so that, by implication, this gospel also records the baptismal injunction. But this is irrelevant. The question is whether baptism is associated with remission of sins because they are connected in a formal commission of Jesus, or for some other cause.

If they are associated together because Jesus authoritatively joined them, Luke's omission to state it so is incomprehensible. Either Luke knew of the commission to baptize and omitted it or he did not know of its existence. The former is very improbable.

Beyond the failure of other gospel writers to record the commission is the failure of the early church to use it in those typical situations where such a formal, precise and comprehensive regulation would naturally have applied. Nothing is more evident in the New Testament than the freedom with which the early church met and discussed each problem on its own merits, never once appealing to a legislative statute or a body of statutes left it by the Lord. And, as has been shown by a recent writer*, there were many situations in which the mere quotation of such a commission would have settled differences that were most serious. Yet the main actors in the early church, men who were present at the time the commission was supposed to be given, did not once refer to it.

If a commission of this sort had such a place of authority in the minds of the apostles it is remarkable that Peter did not refer to it at Pentecost. Afterward when the rulers demanded "by what authority" the apostles spoke, they referred to the resurrection as a fact they were constrained to preach but made no reference to any legal commission. Moreover, Peter's need of a special vision (Acts 10) to convince him that the Gentile Cornelius was a proper person to be initiated into the Christian community is inexplicable if he already had the august and precise command of his Lord to "make disciples of all nations, baptizing them." At the Jerusalem council called to consider this very matter of receiving Gentiles it is incomprehensible that, instead of debating the question at such great length and with bitter division of sentiment, some one did not simply quote the authoritative mandate of the Lord. Paul's assertion of entire independence in his apostolic call and commission is significant, also. When justifying his ministry he made no reference to an authoritative commission common to all the apostles, but insisted that his personal call was complete, the other apostles having "added nothing" thereto.

The cumulative effect of the evidence produced by these various lines of inquiry impels the scholar to examine carefully the ancient documents with reference to the authenticity of the commission as it stands in Matthew. As to manuscripts three things are to be said: (1) All extant manuscripts, even the most ancient, represent late recensions of the original text; (2) the best manuscripts are defective at the point of the commission; (3) but in all manuscripts and versions that we have access to the text is found as we have it in our Matthew. However, the New Testament quotations made by the church fathers indicate the existence of a text in which the commission appears in a form unlike the original. Eusebius, writing about 300 B. C., quotes Matt. 28:19 twenty-one times. The words, "baptizing them into the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit," do not occur in these quotations, but the text reads: " . . . make disciples of all nations in my name, teaching them to observe," etc. In a few of these quotations the phrase "in my name" does not occur. He also quotes it in the form with which we are familiar four times, but these are all in his later writings whose Eusebian authorship is disputed on grounds entirely irrelevant to the present question. This seems to prove that Eusebius in his earlier writings, at least, used a text of the gospels which did not give the words traditionally attributed to Christ.

Justin Martyr and Hermas, writing earlier than Eusebius, give indications of their possession of a text with the same omission. Justin, in writing of baptism, justifies the practice and the use of the trinitarian formula by an appeal to apostolic tradition and the prophet Isaiah. He could hardly have failed to use the authoritative words of Jesus' commission had they been in his possession.

The conclusion of a large body of reverent asd careful scholarship in the face of these facts is that our Matthew 28:18-20 does not give us the ipsissima verba of Christ, but represents the influence of tradition working upon the earlier text.

This is a bare outline of the facts with which biblical scholarship wrestles, in this instance, in its task of providing the church with a clear text of holy scripture. What may be the merit of the conclusion reached, each student must decide for himself. It is important, however, that we shall discriminate clearly the question of the text from the question of fact. This particular textual record of fact may be unauthentic without necessarily invalidating the fact which it assumes to record. The fact may be able to substantiate itself on other grounds—either other texts or inherent probability. As for the trinitarian formula it seems pretty certain that, shaken from its position as part of an august pronouncement of our Lord himself, there is not the slightest warrant for regarding it as having been formulated until a much later date.

The case of baptism, however, stands otherwise.

The Old Church

By Ida Withers Harrison.

I know 'tis best to leave it, and my heart
Is full each day of praises, as I see
The stately building grow in symmetry
Where soon we'll meet; and yet—and yet to part
From this old church is hard, and tears will start,
As sacred memories come back to me
Of self and sin o'ercome by ministry
Of prayer and praise—of sorrow's cruel smart
Healed by the comfortable words of Him
Who sorrowed, too. But most to it I cleave
Because of those, now gone for many a year,
To sit and sing with heavenly seraphim;
And times, through tears, I can almost believe
They're near me, and still sit and worship here.

—The papers are telling an interesting and inspiring story of a man who has just been released from prison after serving over twenty years of sentence. His name is Sydney Ware. He was a miner, and at Lykens, Pa., in a saloon fight, killed two men. When he entered prison he was illiterate. He leaves it well-read, a poet, a musician, an artist of some skill, and a good mechanic. He pleaded his own case before the State pardon board. In all respects, he appears to be animated by fine spirit, is penitent for the sorry past and determined that he will do his best to make the future good.

Editorial Table Talk

Europe a Mission Field

The Evangelistic committee of the Presbyterian Church, prominently identified with which is Rev. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, will make, it is said, a proposal to other Presbyterian bodies in America, and to the Dutch and German Reformed Churches, that they join it in plans to carry revival work into the Protestant churches of the principal countries of continental Europe. The chairman of the committee, Rev. Dr. Wm. H. Roberts, has just returned from informal conferences with Presbyterian churches of Ireland, Scotland, England and Switzerland. He reports the English speaking Presbyterians ready to join the undertaking, and the Continental church eager to welcome aid.

This Presbyterian committee is responsible for the statement that of the 39,000,000 people of France, not more than 8,000,000 are connected with any Christian Church, Protestant or Catholic. There are 800,000 Presbyterian adherents in France, but that republic presents, the committee says, a missionary field of not fewer than 30,000,000 people. In Germany and Switzerland the committee reports rationalism on the increase. It expresses desire that the English speaking Presbyterians take up this great task of European evangelism, mentioning Italy itself as a field where Protestant effort will yield results.

The committee is anxious that its plans be not confused with the foreign missionary ones, but intimates that upon its work depends in large measure the success of the latter campaigns. It points out that Lutherans are preparing to observe in 1917 the four hundredth anniversary of the German Reformation, and asks whether followers of Luther and Calvin may not unite in a return European reformation. The committee also states that advances made to other Presbyterian and Reformed communions in this country, in Canada, and in England and Ireland have met with favorable response.

Which is the More Pathetic?

The Christian Evangelist reports a religious paper as making an appeal for one hundred preachers to send one dollar each to establish the cause in St. Louis, "that wicked city of seven hundred thousand without an established congregation of loyal disciples," and comments as follows:

> "Brethren will smile at that, but does it not merit a tear, also? Is there not real pathos in a state of mind that makes this statement possible? In St. Louis and its immediate vicinity there are seventeen churches representing the religious movement with which these "loyal disciples" claimed to be a part, only a few years ago. By stressing the differences of opinion on mission work and instrumental music, they have created a chasm as deep and broad as that which exists between any two denominations in Christendom. Is there no lesson in this fact, bearing on present tendencies among us?"

We smile and shed our tear for the Christian Evangelist's naive reply. Is there not real pathos in a state of mind that makes the Christian Evangelist say only seventeen? Are there only seventeen congregations of loyal disciples in St. Louis? Which is the more sectarian, to say that there is not one or to say that there are seventeen? In either case the count is determined by one's sectarian point of view. It recalls the pathetic statement of a state secretary about a year ago who wrote that there were "only twenty-one centers in this state where Christ alone is preached," referring of course to the number of congregations of his own particular type. Our vocabulary is one of the many indicators to measure how far we have lapsed from our original ideals!

Echoes of Early Days

The Christian Leader and The Way reports debates in West Virginia and Texas which recall the period when a debate was a great occasion, and awakened sanguine expectations. With the growth of the Disciples the debate, as a method of disseminating particular views, became obsolete except in more unprogressive communities. These mimic battles read very much as did the story of the great debates in a former generation. Both sides are confident of victory in advance; one party looks with disdain upon the assumption of the other; the partisans wonder how the champion on the opposing side can venture into such a perilous performance. After the debate, all parties are satisfied, all claiming a victory, and all hoping to see the final triumph of their particular principles, and the early dissolution of the principles of the other. In the remote sections each debater "skins" the other, according to the testimony on both sides, "skinning" being the only word that properly expresses the condition in which the vanquished finds himself. But, after all, a debate is a harmless affair; nobody is seriously wounded, except in the columns of the religious journals; few conversions take place, all concerned being satisfied before and after the debate of the correctness of their tenets; and equally satisfied of the falseness of the tenets of the others. The good thing about a debate of the sort reported is that both sides can claim a victory, and their right there is none to dispute.

—The social evil can never be rooted out by appeals to the individual. The Chicago vice report shows that the cost of that evil is five thousand women's lives a year in this one city, with bitterness and shame to thousands more of broken-hearted fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters of both the five thousand girls who die each year and the many more who live on in disgrace and degradation. That fact calls on every man who has a particle of honor or chivalry to refuse to be a partner in such wholesale human murder. Multiply the number in Chicago by all the cities in the country and it will be seen that more persons are made miserable in life and driven to dishonored death by white slavery today than there were by black slavery fifty years ago; that the battle against white slavery is to be the moral battle of the oncoming generation, and that every individual must determine his personal conduct by the side of this great social issue on which he wants to be counted.

—The great oracle of the scheme for regenerating society which is known as Socialism, is Karl Marx. It appears that one of his daughters, residing in France, committed suicide a short time since, together with her husband. She is the second daughter of Marx to commit self-murder. The sort of social regeneration which is based upon improvement of physical or material conditions is very imperfect and very unstable. It is quite the fashion to make light of the preaching the need of spiritual regeneration for the individual to those who are scantily fed and clothed, but after all it proffers a basis for social and individual regeneration which is complete and stable.

—The annual report of the United States commissioner of internal revenue, states that the production of distilled spirits last year was 75,402,395, the largest of any year in the history of the nation. It was 6,828,482 gallons more than the largest previous year. During the last fiscal year 2,488 illegal distilleries were seized as against 1,911 the year previous. The significance of this statement is more apparent when it is stated that the government recognizes but 923 distilleries in the entire country as lawful. The same report shows widespread use of opium in smoking dens—"in practically all cities of any size." There has been steady increase in the practice. The laws are not so framed as to make the work of following and catching this sort of debasers of their kind easy.

—America, a Roman Catholic paper of New York, says that the fight of the Roman Catholic Church against mixed marriages of Roman Catholics and Protestants is a fight for her life. Statistics in Holland show that out of 3,326 children who had a Protestant mother and a Catholic father, 1,747 became Protestants, 1,312 Catholics and 376 had no religion; out of 3,455 children who had a Catholic mother and a Protestant father, 1,242 became Protestants, 1,851 Catholics and 362 had no religion; but out of 61,047 children whose parents were both Catholics, 61,017 remained in the faith of their parents and only 30 lapsed.

—Ministers' sons are not as hopeless as is currently believed as the following from the Presbyterian Advance will show: "The popular but often disproved assertion that ministers' sons usually turn out badly is discredited once more by a study of the names included in 'Who's Who in America,' a volume which gives brief descriptions of our most noted citizens. It is found that one name in twelve is that of a minister's son, and the ministers' sons enrolled in that volume are said to be eighteen times as numerous as the sons of other professional men. An editorial in the New York Times asserts that of men who made their mark in English history, 1,270 were sons of ministers, 510 sons of lawyers, and 350 sons of doctors. Of the 99 foreign members of the French Academy of Science, one out of every eight is a minister's son. Ministers' sons seem to average up far beyond the average of mankind, after all."

What Hymns Do Children Like?

An Exposure of the Fallacy that is Corrupting Modern Church Music

BY GERALD BIRNEY SMITH.

Many readers of The Christian Century can remember the Sunday afternoon "sings," when the members of a good old-fashioned large family, perhaps reinforced by relatives or by neighbors, would gather around the "melodion" and engage in an enthusiastic and thoroughly enjoyable rendering of favorite hymns. In this way the taste of the children was educated so that the hymns which they preferred were likely to be those which the older generation also enjoyed. There was thus established between two generations an important bond of musical fellowship which meant much for the continuity of musical worship in the churches.

But today conditions have changed. Those good old "sings" are less and less frequent. The musical service in well-to-do churches has been handed over to a professional choir, until many a man is deluded into thinking that an amateur has no business to try his hand at sacred music. He even hesitates to lift his uncertain voice in the "congregational" singing carried on by a few timorous souls in the auditorium. A striking instance of this attitude was evidenced not long since when, in the pew where I sat, a man and his wife appropriated the only hymn-book and held it passively with absolutely silent lips during the singing of the hymn. I did my best to sing from memory; but it did not even occur to them to assist me by letting me look on the pages of the book which was of no use to them. They would, doubtless, have been surprised to know that anybody really wanted to join in the singing of the hymns. As I have occasion to meet the younger generation, I am often surprised to find that hymns which I supposed everybody knew are entirely unfamiliar to many young people. It is gratifying to find that the youth of today really does enjoy good standard hymns when once it is allowed to learn them. But the fact remains that our churches are mourning the poverty of their resources of common worship just because people do not know the standard hymns.

The Deluge of "Popular" Hymns.

The fact is, we have, for the past generation, been experimenting on the theory that we could make religious services more attractive by furnishing novelties in the realm of music. I well remember when the modern craze for more "popular" music began to invade the peaceful quiet of the little town where I spent my youth. "Gospel Hymns, No. 1" was speedily followed by "Gospel Hymns, No. 2," and with amazing rapidity by "No. 3." After that the deluge. We would just begin to get acquainted with one "popular" Sunday-school music book when another would be proposed so that the dear children should not get tired of the monotony of repetition. To such absurd lengths was this notion of novelty carried that, when as a boy I entered the church choir, it was the regular practice to substitute for the tune in the hymn-book (which was so old that everybody knew it!) a new melody selected from a second book which was only in the possession of the choir. I remember what skill was required properly to adjust the two books, dovetailing the pages so as to bring the words in one and the music in the other into the closest possible juxtaposition. Of course, this elaborate arrangement guaranteed that nobody in the "audience" should sing a note during the entire service. What was the choir for if not to keep others from marring the worship by amateur musical efforts?

Reaping the Harvest.

Well, we are now reaping the harvest of these modernizing experiments. When the children from the Sunday-school go into a young people's society of their own, they of course mark their progress by selecting a brand new "popular" hymn-book, which shall keep alive the love of novelty. If there is a junior society and a senior society, each has a different hymn-book. If there is a rally of all the young people's societies in the neighborhood, it is safe to surmise that each has been using its own peculiar brand of up-to-date music. The consequences, if one wishes to secure general participation in the service of song, may be imagined. In many churches the endeavor to "interest" the young people has led to the introduction into the evening service of some recent edition of "gospel hymns," on the assumption that fresh music which will "go" is of greatest value.

The desire to make religion attractive is certainly worthy of all praise. But is it a fact that novelties in music are really better liked than the older, more familiar hymns? A little understanding of the first principles of music would show the fallacy of this assumption.

The Value of Repetition.

Music is a form of art which depends on the memory for its full appreciation. An intelligent listener at a symphony concert will first of all memorize the themes of the composition, knowing that his enjoyment of the music depends upon the ability to recognize as they constantly reappear the musical ideas which the composer has expressed. One always enjoys a great musical composition better the fiftieth time than the first. This is because memory is better able to do its part. Take another illustration. No choir can sing well anything "at sight." We demand rehearsals in order to secure the benefits of repetition. Real appreciation and expression are possible only as what precedes a certain phrase and what comes after are present in memory so that there can be a genuine understanding of what it is all about. The greatest musical compositions often repeat the fundamental themes an astonishingly large number of times. But the repetition is an acknowledged element of strength. Think of the cumulative effect of the repetition in the "Hallelujah Chorus" from "The Messiah." It is only when the "Hallelujah" is fixed in memory by this process that the real grandeur begins to appear. As a modern musical critic has said, "Repetition is the fundamental principle in all musical construction."

If this be true, it is evident that the desire for novelty is directly opposed to the principles on which alone real musical culture is possible. This conclusion is borne out if one examines the contents of the "popular" hymn-books which are being so constantly turned out by enterprising publishing houses. The tunes must be "catchy" because, being new, they must be easy to learn. The harmonies must be so simple as to be commonplace, because only the simplest chord-forms can be successfully mastered by those who are practically reading at sight. The result is a collection of songs which may seem to "go" splendidly at first, especially if an enthusiastic leader helps, but which soon lose their power to charm. Like the "popular" songs of the lower class of theaters, they have not enough substance to bear much repetition; for the repetition of shallow sentiment soon becomes nauseating. Anything which endures the test of time must be too difficult to be exhausted of meaning at the first reading. In other words, just so long as we assume in our plans for the musical education of our children that they must be provided with attractive "novelties," we are making absolutely impossible the possession of genuinely valuable sacred music in our hearts and memories. For the fundamental musical principle of repetition cannot be evaded.

The Testimony of the Children.

A striking confirmation of this conclusion has been furnished by the answers to a questionnaire sent out by a recent contributor to Religious Education. Four hundred and seventy-four children between the ages of eight and twenty, and belonging to Baptist, Congregational, Episcopal, Methodist, and Presbyterian denominations, replied to a request to indicate their favorite hymns. The answers reveal the fact that only those hymns which are good enough to stand repetition for years and years actually come to be favorites for any large number of people. Such hymns as "Onward, Christian Soldiers," "Nearer, My God, to Thee," "Abide With Me," "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," "Rock of Ages," and "What a Friend We Have in Jesus," easily command a large number of votes. It would surprise many to know that in this questionnaire so difficult a hymn as "Lead, Kindly Light"—a hymn which, in the opinion of many choir-masters, is entirely unfitted for popular use—had thirty-three votes, while "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty" (which a certain choir-master in Chicago a few years ago declared too difficult to be sung by any congregation and which he reserved for a professional choir) received forty votes. Of course, many individual children expressed a preference for the lighter hymns of the "gospel" order. But the significant thing is that no one of these received any large number of votes. The preference for these represents a momentary enthusiasm rather than a lasting sentiment. As the writer who comments upon these replies says: "In view of the answers to the questionnaires, we are forced to the conclusion that it is a mistake to suppose the cheaper, lighter music is that which young people want. Where this is used, there are hardly any two preferences alike, showing that this style is not popular and that it has no hold on the minds and hearts of boys and girls. Young people, whether of different places or denominations, actually prefer the hymns of true worth, the so-called standard hymns. Recognition should be given to this fact. Their souls should not be starved on the trashy hymns. If they like the best, give them the best! What they like best, they will sing best."

Underestimate Children's Capacity.

In my estimation, many choir-masters and Sunday-school superintendents greatly under-estimate the capacity for appreciating good music which actually exists, although often latently, in those without musical training. I believe that ordinary people almost instinctively prefer solid music to the more ephemeral kind, if the solid music is presented to them with the same enthusiastic leadership which usually accompanies the learning of the "gospel hymns." What could not Mr. Alexander do if he should lead his great congregations in the singing of some of the splendid old hymns of the church instead of trying to get them to learn an unfamiliar new melody! Why should it not be a gain in every respect if a great public revival meeting should use the hymns which have already proved their efficiency as agents of religious inspiration? What a gain it would be if the impulses connected with the revival could be located in the hymns which would afterward be used in the Sunday services! Would it not help to bridge the gulf between the Sunday-school and the church services if children were taught to love and to sing the hymns which they would enjoy all through life? Would it not unify the work of the church if the same hymn-book were used in every department instead of allowing each section to choose an ephemeral collection? Above all, would it not make the musical worship of our church of positive value if we could have such congregational singing as is possible only if all know and love the same hymns? The fault with the present situation is not with the taste of the children but with the mistaken notions of adults as to what children respect and enjoy.

A Doctor and a Doormat

MIRIAM ALLEN DE FORD.

Did you ever notice the doormat in most houses? It is made of cocoa fibre, and it has printed on it the word "welcome," which is nothing more or less than an invitation to wipe your feet on it.

Mary was the Wyndham doormat. To be sure, the aforesaid invitation was not actually printed on her, but it was quite evident in her drooping, downcast manner, and the timid appeal of her eyes, which seemed always to plead, "Don't walk on me too hard, and I will always be a faithful and obedient doormat, and lie quietly where you can step on me daily."

And the Wyndhams, being human, and willing to appropriate a good thing when they saw it, did step on Mary. That is to say, Mrs. Wyndham handed over the family mending to her as a matter of course; and Mr. Wyndham took it for granted that Mary would see that the house was locked up at night, and would prepare his early breakfast before he went to the fields in the morning; and Charlie gave her his problems and his Latin sentences to do without a question; and when Amanda and Olive were asked to go anywhere in Farmington, they always accepted immediately, because, as they said, "Mary wouldn't mind getting supper and keeping mother company in the evening." Mary, you must understand, was the youngest daughter of the self-sufficient and prosperous Wyndham family.

As a consequence of all this walking on, Mary, at twenty-four, was so quiet and repressed that no one noticed her at all, or regarded her as more than a noiseless and willing machine for the performance of the tasks one prefers to shirk. Amanda had been married for three years now, and Mary would go over and take care of the baby whenever her sister, who lived in Farmington, (she had married the village druggist) wished to visit some of her friends, or to entertain company in the parlor below. In the latter case, Mary made the sandwiches and baked the cakes, and she never minded in the least staying afterwards to wash the dishes.

It was on one of these festive occasions—Amanda was frivolously inclined—that the new doctor first noticed Mary. He was a very new doctor in Farmington, who had bought old Dr. Phillips' practice when he retired. His name was Stokes, and he came from the city and was rather young, so that he was regarded as a great catch by the Farmington girls, whom he never noticed at all. On this evening, he had stopped his horse outside the drug-store, after returning from a late call, to have a prescription filled; and just as he was about to leave, a timid, unobtrusive figure, in Amanda's last year's coat and a hat that Olive had considered unbecoming, crept out from back of the store, and prepared, since dishwashing was finished, to trudge quietly home to the farmhouse. "My sister-in-law, Miss Wyndham," said Frank Brent, the druggist, at a nudge from the doctor.

Now the doctor, being a stranger, had discovered in an instant what none of the people who had lived with her always had ever suspected in Mary—that she was pretty, and that with color in her cheeks and some expression in her eyes, she would have been beautiful. Being a man, he saw that first, but, being human, he saw something else—that Mary was not happy. She did not look exactly sad, but, rather, dead, or, better, as if she had never lived. And he made up his mind on the spot that he was going to get to know her, if anybody could, and find out her trouble, and relieve it if possible.

"If you are going home, Miss Wyndham, I should be glad to take you in my team," he said pleasantly.

Probably no man had ever spoken to Mary in that tone before. "Oh, thank you, but I wouldn't bother for anything," she murmured.

Frank Brent laughed loudly. "Don't be a chump, Mary," he said, with an expressive wink at the doctor, "When you can get something for nothing, take it."

And the Wyndham doormat, accustomed to obey without question the voice of authority, flushed hotly, but went out and climbed meekly into the doctor's carriage.

It did not take much questioning on the way home for the shrewd young man to divine what was the matter with Mary; and he resolved firmly to emancipate her from herself. He was sorry for her, and rather irritated at her passivity; and she was lost in trepidation at the thought of the teasing she would get when the family discovered that she had come home with the charming and unapproachable Dr. Stokes.

She might have spared herself the trouble; it never occurred to the Wyndhams to ask questions concerning herself of Mary, any more than of the family cat or the grandfather's clock; and it was not until the doctor appeared at the farmhouse the next Sunday evening and asked for Miss Mary that they awoke to the situation.

"You could have knocked me over with a feather," remarked stout Mrs. Wyndham, a good deal later, in telling the story to a neighbor, "It had never struck me that anyone would want to call on Mary!"

The doctor began his course of treatment by trying, so to speak, to instill a backbone in Mary. He had to be very careful about it, both because she was so shrinking and meekly incredulous, and because he was afraid that she would be hurt at any remarks about her family. He himself treated her with marked respect, and deferred to her opinions even when, so far as she knew, she hadn't any. He thought that this made no impression; but you may be sure Mary treasured up every one of his unbelievable words, and told them over and over to herself as she made the family beds, or darned Charlie's socks, or embroidered shirt-waists for Amanda and Olive.

One day he ventured to tell her that her eyes were an astounding and wonderful blue, and she smiled faintly, and said, "Oh, Dr. Stokes, you will have your fun, I see!"—but the mere fact that she answered him at all was proof that Mary's individuality was expanding. To tell the truth, she was just getting over her bewilderment at having him come to see her at all; getting over it so well, however, that one evening, when Mrs. Wyndham said, from the other side of the room, "Did you give Tabby her supper, Mary?" she actually answered, "I'll do it in a minute, mother," and waited five, instead of rising and obeying immediately. It hardly seemed possible, even to herself, but the Wyndham doormat was beginning to be unpleasant to walk on.

It had seemed to the doctor that the best thing to make Mary more domineering—the word was funny as applied to Mary—would be something which she could rule over and give orders to, and accordingly he had brought her a wobbly puppy, which he insisted on her calling "Roger," after himself, for the sheer pleasure—by this time—of hearing her use his first name without compunction. For a while it seemed that Roger was going to be only one more tyrant in Mary's life, for he needed in his earliest puppyhood constant care and attention, and saw, by means of shrill yelps and whines, that he got them; but gradually Mary gained control, until it was delightful to hear her gentle reproof and mild but firm commands, and, for the doctor, cheering and encouraging to see how instinctively the puppy obeyed the new spirit in his mistress. It was this brown-eyed spaniel which led finally to the revolt of the doormat.

It was a day of unexpected things; the doctor had come early in the afternoon, for one thing, and insisted on taking Mary driving; and on the way he had, for the first time, spoken to her directly about her relations with her family. He was pleased to see that she resented his words, and was not afraid to say so; and yet he exacted from her finally a confession that she had once or twice, lately, objected to some new imposition that was being put on her—refused to run an unnecessary errand to Farmington for Olive, perhaps, or given Charlie short shrift when that lazy youth had demanded that Mary write his school compositions for him. In an unguarded moment she even said, "Some day they'll go too far and then I'll explode. But its no concern of yours to talk about it, Dr. Stokes," she added hastily. It was all the doctor could do to keep from taking her in his arms and kissing her.

When they reached the Wyndham farmhouse, he entered the kitchen—the common living-room—with her. They found Amanda there, with the baby—an enterprising child, nearly two years old. Roger, the puppy, was playing hide-and-seek with himself at the fireplace.

Mrs. Wyndham looked up placidly as they came in.

"Oh, Mary," she said, in her slow, throaty voice, "The baby likes your little dog so much; won't you let him have it?"

The doctor gazed at Mary curiously, and yet with fear at his heart. A great many things were being tested at that minute. The puppy, you must remember, had been his first gift to Mary—and its name was Roger.

For a moment it seemed that the training of a lifetime was to be the victor, and that the Wyndham doormat would still be walked on with impunity. Mary looked uncertainly at her nephew, at her mother and then at the unconscious puppy. The dog wobbled toward her, and caught the hem of her skirt between its tiny teeth.

All at once she stooped, snatched it up, and held it to her until it cried out. Then she spoke, and it was in a tone that none of the Wyndhams ever before heard from Mary.

"No," she said, "I won't let him have it! What's more, there'll be no use in trying to tease me to give it to him. It's the only thing I've ever had that I didn't feel one of you could come and borrow or just take from me without permission."

"Permission!" There was color enough in the pale cheeks now, and the wonderful blue eyes shot fire. "Who in this house ever dreams of asking my permission for anything? I'm good enough to trot around after you and run your errands and do the dirty work you wouldn't stain your own hands with, but when I'm not needed none of you even give me a thought. Could anybody here tell me now what color my eyes are, I wonder, or how many lumps of sugar I take in my coffee? But I'm expected to consult the wishes of everyone of you, to have things always just as you like them, to make life easy for you, no matter how hard it is for myself."

"I am sure, Mary," said Amanda, a sharp edge in her disagreeable voice, "That Frank and I have done a lot for you. You've always been welcome at my little parties."

"Yes, to work at them," answered Mary, wildly, "How many of those Farmington friends of yours do I really know? 'It's, my sister, Miss Wyndham, ladies and gentlemen,' and then, 'Mary, dear, would you mind going out in the dining-room and dishing out the ice cream?' You all use me—I'm the family doormat!"

"Steady, girl," whispered the doctor, a hand on her arm. But by this time Mary was beyond control.

"Your doormat!" she fairly shrieked "Your nice, convenient doormat, that you can wipe your feet on every rainy day, and put back in the hall closet when you have company coming. When have I ever had a stitch on my back that someone didn't choose for me or give to me? When have I had an opinion or thought that wasn't handed down to me? When has anyone consulted my wishes, or asked for my advice? I—when I think—I—"

And then, quite naturally, she fell into the arms outstretched to her, and a minute later she was weeping her heart out on the doctor's shoulder.

There was a horrified gasp from the assembled Wyndhams. The doctor smiled quite easily.

"You haven't given me a chance to tell you," he said, "That Mary promised to marry me this afternoon."

There was a little wriggle from the weeping Mary, but no audible protest. Mrs. Wyndham came to the rescue.

"I am very, very glad," she said, simply, taking his unused hand, "And you must know we are all fond and proud of Mary, in spite of the things she has just said. The dear child is not quite herself today."

And Amanda and Olive both assented, and said that father and Frank would be delighted, and the baby giggled and pulled the puppy's tail. You must not think too hardly of them for all this. After all, they really loved Mary; only, they had never realized before that she was there.

"Look up, sweetest," whispered the doctor, when the sobs ceased, and his shoulder began to feel dry, "I'm going to kiss you in front of all your family!"

"I won't if I don't want to," murmured Mary, "You can't boss me!"

Nevertheless, she raised her face obediently. It is hard to get over the habit of being a doormat.

Affairs Abroad.

Boers and British Unite.

The National Party Congress for the formation of one great, strong, South African party has just been held in Bloemfontein. There were 700 delegates. Gen. Botha, the Union Premier, presided, and most of the members of the cabinet were on the platform, besides ex-President Steyn and Gen. De Wet. Gen. Botha, who was recorded a remarkable reception, remarked upon the large number of Englishmen present. He believed that the influence which would eventually radiate from that assemblage would sweep South Africa clear of racialism. Never before in the history of South Africa had Englishmen and Boers been able to hold such a political congress at which every corner of the country was represented.

Lloyd-George's Insurance Bill.

The law is a compulsory system of insurance not only against accident and sickness but against nonemployment. It has been estimated that the total fund the first year will be $135,000,000, to which the state will contribute $12,500,000. The remainder will be raised by employers and employees, 14,700,000 being the estimated number of the latter. Of these 800,000 will come under the provisions permitting voluntary participation in the scheme. The compulsory features of the bill cover the others. The maximum contribution to be made by workmen will be 8 cents a week; by women workers 6 cents. The men's contribution, Lloyd-George explains is about equal to the price of two pints of cheap beer, or an ounce of cheap tobacco. The employer will contribute six cents a week for all persons on his wage sheet, whether men or women.

British Prepared.

In preparation for another strike of railway men, the English railway companies made arrangements for the employment of an organization known as the volunteer police force, whose object is to render practical assistance when the powers of the regular police cannot be called into operation. This force, purely a private affair, was organized by the Duke of Abercorn after the railway strike of last summer.

Among the declared objects of the volunteer police are to assist in the maintenance of law and order, to assist the regular police when overwhelmed by superior numbers, to protect signal boxes and other railway property, to escort vehicles containing food and protect merchandise and "to defend workmen who desire to work against the brutality and violence of pickets who molest them and try to coerce them by brute force." The activities of this volunteer organization will extend all over the country.

Mechanics Needed.

Australia is suffering from a dearth of mechanics. Sydney alone needs at least 3,000 of them. So serious has the situation become that the Master Builders Association of New South Wales sent an agent to England to induce men to emigrate to that colony at once. A newspaper advertisement inserted by this agent, brought 1,500 men and boys to a shipping office in Covent Garden, where they were told to apply. They refused to go unless given free passage. A commission appointed by the government of New South Wales learned that there was a shortage of labor in the building trades and the situation had been getting worse steadily for eighteen months.

Anarchy Rules in Macedonia.

A dispatch from Saloniki, European Turkey, to a London news agency, reports a condition of anarchy throughout Macedonia. Murder, pillage and brigandage are rife. Travel in the country districts is safe only for large armed parties. Twenty-seven assassinations have occurred within the last month within a two hours' journey of Saloniki, all the victims being Greeks. The Christians, finding it impossible to obtain redress, are organizing bands with the object of killing the Turks.

Notes

—Foes of temperance will be surprised somewhat by the report of the Chief Surgeon and Medical Inspector of the Central Division of the United States Army, which refutes their claim that alcoholism has been so much greater in the army since the prohibition act. The rate of admission to sick report for alcoholism from 1885 to 1900 was 41 per 1,000; from 1901 to 1910 it was only 26 per 1,000. From 1901 to 1910, during the prohibition of intoxicating drinks in the canteen, the rate of alcoholic admission per thousand was 40 per cent less than from 1885 to 1899, and 16 per cent less than from 1890 to 1900, during which two latter periods the beer canteen was in operation in army posts.

—Julius Rosenwald, well known Chicago philanthropist, last week sent the $25,000 to Washington, D. C., after he had received word that the conditions under which he subscribed that sum for a negro branch of the Y. M. C. A. there, had been met. Mr. Rosenwald conditioned this gift on the raising of $75,000 for the building by the Washington Association. The contribution insures the completion of the new building, which, with land and equipment, will cost $100,000. The cities of Chicago, Los Angeles, Indianapolis, Atlanta and Philadelphia each have raised the $75,000 necessary to qualify for a similar gift.

—A new plan of administering the finances of the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church was agreed upon last week by the committee to which the subject was referred at the last meeting of the assembly. The system, which becomes effective December 30, provides for the selection of a trust company at Philadelphia as treasurer; the preparation of a budget of expenses for the office of the stated clerk, for special committees of the general assembly and for the expenses of commissioners at the general assembly. Supervision of all finances by the finance committee of the executive commission is also provided for.

—The American Brewers' Review published the statement that Edison admired the wine region of France. But in reply to a letter of inquiry from the International Reform Bureau, Mr. Edison says that his remark was perverted, and he adds that "while the wines of France and the beer of Germany had only three or four per cent of alcohol in them, the people drank so much that they managed to get enough alcohol to stupefy them all right."

—Among other bequests the will of James Leedy of St. Joseph, Mo., admitted to probate, provides for a perpetual legacy of $500 per annum for revival meetings in the Christian Church of St. Joseph.

The Righteousness Christ Calls For

Dr. G. Campbell Morgan's Sermon

"Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the Kingdom of heaven."—Matthew 5:20.

The arresting notes of this text are two; first, that of Kingly authority; and secondly, the ethical severity. Let us take them in their wider meaning and application as revealing the ethical demand which the King makes upon his subjects.

A matter demanding far more attention than has been given to it lately is the fact that the moral standard of Jesus is an infinitely more severe one than that of any other teacher. No one will imagine that I undervalue the gospel of his grace, nevertheless I fear that we have sometimes preached the gospel of his grace at the expense of the demand of his ethic. To dwell upon the severity of his ethical demand, and his interpretation of morality, is our present purpose. Yet let us immediately recognize that to which we shall return by way of conclusion, that these words of Jesus must be heard in the consciousness of the whole of the mission of the King, in which mission he acted as Saviour as well as Sovereign, as Lover of the souls of men as well as Law-giver.

These words of Christ when set in their true context become the more startling; they were words spoken, not to the multitudes although the multitudes listened, but to men who had already crowned him in the measure of the light which they had received, to men who were to go out and teach his ethic.

Its Paramount Importance.

The clear implicate of the passage is that of the importance of righteousness. That is the perpetual biblical atmosphere. Among the fundamental things of the Bible, so far as human conduct is concerned, is the supreme message, that righteousness is of paramount importance. That of course is the Christian conception; or to come at once to the very heart of the thought, the master passion of Jesus was righteousness. The inspiration of that passion, if we may dare to press so deeply into the mind of Christ, was that of love. The master passion of all his doing was righteousness, not mercy but righteousness, not pity but purity. Mercy, yes; and pity, surely; he was infinite in his compassion and in his tenderness, but never at the expense of right, never by making peace with wrong, never by lowering the standard of Divine holiness, or explaining away the the awfulness of divine purity.

What Is It?

I take up my Bible and ask, What is righteousness as herein revealed? The Bible idea of righteousness may thus be expressed; God is the absolute and eternal standard of right. Consequently, human conduct is righteous, as it conforms to his will and approximates to his character. These Bible writers and Bible teachers, of the old dispensation and the new, never stayed to argue as to whether God is righteous. That is their fundamental assumption. Upon that all Biblical teaching proceeds. The Bible position is that God is holy, and therefore his doings are righteous. He is the one eternal, final standard in conformity to his will and approximation to his character.

Those who do not accept this standard are totally unable to follow the argument of Jesus in my text, for the man who does not admit that God is the ultimate, eternal standard of right, whatever his own view of right may be, stands on a lower level than the Pharisees, for the Pharisees started there, as I shall try to show you. That was their fundamental conception. But there are differences in the apprehension of what the will of God is, and in these distinctions we shall discover what our Lord meant when he said to the men who were entering into his kingdom that their righteousness must exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees.

Who Were the Pharisees?

Let us ask who these Pharisees were. The answer to the inquiry may thus be stated. The Pharisees were the Puritans of the Maccabaen period in Jewish history. Their very name means separated ones, and I do no violence to the name Pharisee when I say it means Separatist. That is precisely what they were. We have no history of the actual period in our Bible, but we have the history of its beginning in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, and we have revelations of the conditions in the books of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. God's ancient people, or a remnant of them, were established at Jerusalem, without any king or prophet. There originated the order of the Scribes, for Ezra was the first. As time proceeded these people were threatened with complete absorption by the Greek power that swept over that whole region; and in that period, of which we have no Biblical history, but of which we have a good deal of authentic history, Judas Maccabæus became the deliverer of the people. There was a period of victories, and these Hebrew people suffered as a result, for they were in danger of forming alliances with the surrounding peoples, and of being corrupted by that Greek influence which stood in direct opposition to their own conception of God and religion.

An Hour of Crisis.

It was then, when, humanly speaking, the Hebrew people were threatened with that most terrible form of extinction, absorption, that the Pharisees arose. The passion which actuated those who founded the order was one of loyalty to Jehovah. They constituted themselves into a definite order. I think when we read the New Testament we sometimes forget that the Pharisees were members of a very definite order. There were not more than six or seven thousand of them. They banded themselves together as men who would be entirely separated from the Gentiles; from those whom they described as the common people, that is, those who did not take those special religious vows; and especially from the Sadducees, who were the rationalists in religion. The movement was born of the highest, holiest passion. The order of the Pharisees was an order of men who stood for purity in religion in an hour when Hebraism was threatened by contamination by Greek influence, which would have cut the nerve of the religion of Jehovah. There can be no question, and those who are most familiar with the history of those times will agree with me, that they were the saviors of the nation, the men who enabled that remnant to stand against the encroachment of the forces of worldliness that were sweeping down upon the people. These were the Pharisees, and these were the men with whom Jesus Christ was brought into immediate contact, when he began his public teaching.

The Pharisee's Failure.

From the commencement of his public ministry to the close we see him flinging himself with all the force of his personality against them and against their teaching. How are we to account for this? Let us look at them again. Let us see what had happened to them in the course of the years; not tracing the movement but seeing the result as it is revealed to us in the New Testament. What had their righteousness become?

The Pharisees were religious, orthodox, and the base of their morality was their belief that man must conform to the will of God. Wherein then lay their failure? In order to answer that question, let us observe the structure which they had built on that base. Three things characterized their righteousness; it was first external; secondly, it was exclusive; finally, therefore, it was evasive of essential righteousness.

A System of Externals.

It was first external. It consisted in a most complex and elaborate system of regulations of life by habits. As every man entered the order he took two vows of initiation. The first was to tithe everything eaten, bought or sold. The second was not to be the guest of the Gentiles, and to observe all ceremonial purifications. These were the fundamental vows of initiation to the order of the Pharisees. Now observe what had happened in the process of the years. In their desire to interpret the law of God and to make it binding, they had added tradition to tradition. A little careful study of the Pharisees reveals things that are almost too absurd to be mentioned. Here is one simple illustration from the midst of their traditions. If a man on the Sabbath day should walk through the cornfields he must wear the lightest sandals, as, if he wore heavy ones, and the corn upon which he trod was forced from its husk, he was threshing on the Sabbath! You smile at that, but I know Puritanism today which is quite as foolish! They attempted to explain the meaning of the thought of God by their own foolish tradition, until they had heaped tradition upon tradition; and the Lord said of them, "They bind heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with their fingers."

Exclusive and Evasive.

Moreover, their righteousness was exclusive. They held in supreme contempt all who were outside their own order. We are quite familiar with their attitude toward the publican as we read the New Testament. That phrase, "the common people," in itself full of beauty because it describes not the people of one class or caste but all sorts of people, when used by the Pharisee included all those who were not Pharisees, learned and illiterate, rich and poor, bond and free, the common herd outside the Pharisaic order, the Pharisee looked with profound contempt upon them all.

Finally, their righteousness was evasive.

Accentuation of the letter had destroyed the spirit. The Sabbath was held so sacred that in the observance of it its hallowed sanctions were denied; so that when his disciples passed through the cornfields and plucked the ears of corn the Pharisees complained that they were breaking the Sabbath, and Jesus said, "If ye had known what this meaneth, I desire mercy, and not sacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltless." Have you ever really examined that answer of Jesus? These men were insisting upon the sanctity of the Sabbath in such a way as to harm humanity, and Christ swept their traditions away, declaring that even the sanctity of the Sabbath must give way to the sanction of caring for humanity. They w uld not work on the Sabbath, but they would hold their feasts on the Sabbath, provided Gentiles prepared them. Consequently, I repeat, the very acentuation of the value of the letter had destroyed the spirit.

Did Not Know God.

Wherein then lay the failure of these men? What was wrong? If the base of their righteousness was the conviction that righteousness is conformity to the will of God, wherein were they wrong? In that they did not know God. Consequently they were unequal to the interpretation of the will of God. They did not understand the nature of his holiness. They did not understand the nature of his love. Out of that ignorance of God, they proceeded to attempt to bring men into conformity to the will of the God whom they did not know, and whose will therefore they did not know; with the result that they libeled the God whom they professed to extol, and degraded the national conception of God, by misrepresentations, enforcing a righteousness which was external, exclusive and evasive.

The result was the degradation of all life; the degradation of their own spirit to the hard, harsh, critical, cynical, self-satisfied temper which they manifested; the degradation of all their disciples, upon whom they laid burdens that they themselves would not lift.

Jesus Opposed Them.

As Jesus moved among these men, the most religious and the most orthodox of men; against their righteousness, against their conception of righteousness, against their attempt to establish righteousness, he flung himself with holy passion and fervor, and strangely biting words of sarcastic denunciation. I will defy you to find me a single unkind or harsh word Jesus ever spoke to sinning man or woman; they were all reserved for false, religious teachers, men who misinterpreted God to other men, and who cut the nerve of essential righteousness by attempting to substitute for it the righteousness of triviality and tradition; men who did not know God. Against these he hurled the final anathemas, the awful, appalling woes, of the twenty-third chapter of Matthew.

The Will of God.

What then are the bases of the righteousness that Christ calls for? Knowledge of God. That is first. According to Christ all righteousness is conformity to the will of God, who is love, and who therefore is a God of holiness. As we read the Manifesto, and follow its teaching concerning life and its value; marriage and its sanctity; truth and its expression; justice and its manifestation; until we come to the last expression of love, love of enemies; we are driven to say, Who is sufficient for these things? And the answer is: None other than the child of God, for he alone knows him, or is able to obey him.

Behold the King who uttered the words, himself realizing righteousness in all the fact of his life, himself manifesting righteousness in all the glory and beauty of his tender compassion and his tremendous loyalty to truth and holiness.

Finally, behold the King enabling men to be righteous according to his pattern as they put their trust in him.

An Efficient Officiary

The apostolic church chose officers only to do their work and not until men were fitted to do the work. Paul returns several years after having established some churches, for the purpose of ordaining elders among them. We have known of some good churches being lost because of having those for overseers who were confessedly incapable to do the work. In apostolic days deacons were chosen some years prior to the choosing of elders. And the choosing of deacons did not mean quite the same to them as it does to us, as the word "deacon" is an anglicized Greek word, like the word "baptise" and signifies a servant.

An apostolic deacon had a job, rather than an office, as we understand it. More like our janitors, treasurers, clerks, ushers, and those who work for the poor in the slum work of the cities. Even the word "apostle" signifies a service rather than an office. There are three classes of apostles mentioned. First, those whom Jesus sent out—the Twelve. Then there are those whom these sent out. And third those whom the church sends out. An apostle is one who is sent out on a special mission. The teaching of Jesus that his people would not be like others in that they would not have any to lord over them has been a hard saying. Having the rule over others is always so much sweeter than being their servants. Churches which do nothing, do not need officers. Nor do they need officers for doing what should be done equally by all, except perhaps to direct their works so as to avoid conflicts.

The choosing of elders and other such officers with their various names is not so much of the wisdom or spiritual insight of the apostles as because these were the officers in the Synagogues to which they were accustomed, and were adopted without argument for this reason. Any new work needing to be done by any church at any time can be done by a man fitted to do it, by having it assigned to him. And the name of his office can be the same as that to which the people are accustomed in other organizations. As, for instance, a building committee.

Necessarily, no official position in the church can continue longer than the man is working at it. A man can be a preacher, elder, or deacon for life only by working at the job for life. For the sake of safety every officer in the church should desire a set time for his service to expire, because it is extremely hard to ask a good man to retire in favor of a new man, even though the new man should be much the more capable. Possibly ordination has been the most difficult thing to handle in this connection.

The doctrine of Apostolic Succession hangs so heavy over us that it is next to impossible for us to understand that it means the same in religion as inauguration does in politics. By the laying on of hands, and by fasting and prayer, the church did delegate its entire powers in a certain matter to the one man. And the ordination had no power beyond the power of the church doing the ordaining. In a way the ceremony of laying on of hands now is harmful, in that it is such an unusual custom that it is misunderstood. In the modern mind the power is given to our agent by the votes cast for him, rather than by any form or ceremony.

All officers were the choice of the church, in New Testament times. The Apostles themselves seem never to have taken to themselves the authority to choose out officers as is often done by evangelists today. Paul went around among the churches to ordain elders among them, though the King James version, in harmony with the idea of the time translates it, "appoint." The plan of selecting the men out of the church should be the one best understood by all. With these things in mind, if the Christ-spirit prevails freely, an efficient officiary is possible.

More Capital Needed in Religion

"My father went into business at twenty-five," said a trust magnate as he took a seat in the Pullman, "and I have recently found the inventory of his goods. He stocked up his store by an expenditure of seventy-five dollars and fifty-five cents, of which sum he borrowed nearly one-half. No man in his rural community could raise it all. He began with a bolt of cotton, a keg of molasses and a jug of rum. O, yes, he had a few odds and ends, of course, but these are samples of the quantities required. You could have put the whole stock in a one-horse sleigh. But I began business on a hundred thousand dollars and was squeezed out. My friends started me again with a million and a half, and I made the riffle. It takes money to make money these days, that is one thing I have learned."

That is worth thinking about. It takes more grace to live for God than it did in the days of our fathers. "Along the cool, sequestered vale of life, they kept the even tenor of their way." It is not given to us to live with so little competition. We must face bigger odds. We are in the midst of a mightier current and unless some arm stronger than our own comes to our help, the people along the shore are likely to hear "the bubbling cry of some strong swimmer in his agony." It is not a time in which to ignore the means by which grace is conveyed. We need the Lord's day more than our fathers needed it. We need the church more than our fathers needed it. We need the family altar more than they. And yet some spiritual "plungers" seem to think they can get spiritually rich with no capital to start with. They are sure to be undeceived.

Humanity seems to be more and more disposed to aid sick and unfortunate humanity as the years go by. Well to do girls of Cleveland are carrying the anti-tuberculosis campaign into the factories and wholesale districts this year. They are visiting the working girls during noon hours and enlisting aid. One death in ten in Cleveland is caused by tuberculosis. Cleveland sold 1,412,139 Red Cross seals in 1910, ranking second in the United States. Almost $15,000 was raised. This year a total of $25,000 will be raised.

That there are at least 10,000 serious accidents in Ohio manufacturing establishments every year is indicated by figures which are part of the annual report of Inspector of Workshops and Factories, T. P. Kearns. This year's report will include 6,700 accidental injuries to employes which necessitated absence from work for two days or more. The per cent of fatalities is large.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Organized Missionary Work Among Women

II.

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions of the Disciples of Christ had its origin in the same impulse to organization, that called Women's Missionary Boards into existence in the Congregational, Methodist, Presbyterian, Episcopal and Baptist churches—all of these were formed in the years from 1868 to 1874.

I do not know whether it was because of the larger liberty we enjoy in our church or not, but from its organization in 1874, it was planned on a broader and more independent scale than most women's societies; it has all the lines of endeavor on the foreign field in which they are engaged—zenana visiting, orphanages, a home for women and babies, evangelistic, educational, medical and hospital work. From the start, it comprised Home Missions in its work, as well as Foreign Missions; its field is the world—its labors are only limited by its opportunities. This gives a cosmopolitan flavor to its appeal, which makes it reach all sorts and conditions of people.

Jubilee Year.

We have just closed our jubilee celebration of organized missionary work among Christian women. During this great year, the Women's Missionary Boards of all the churches have united in holding a series of meetings from coast to coast, and from Maine to the Gulf, and have told the wonderful story of a half century's work. This union movement is but carrying out the spirit in which the work began—it is a demonstration of the great truth, that all true missionary work inevitably leads to a closer union among Christians. This anniversary year has brought the missionary boards of all churches into closer and sweeter fellowship than they have ever known before, and will leave an indelible impress on the years to come.

Women's Societies Justified.

The review of the fifty years' work, that was an important part of these Jubilee meetings, has more than justified the existence of women's missionary societies. The great sums of money raised and expended, the splendid work accomplished in preaching and teaching the gospel, the mental and spiritual training of the womanhood and childhood of the church through the agency of their organizations proves that the work is of God. The half century of effort and achievement lays an obligation on those engaged in it to do greater things in the future than in the past for the glory of God and the salvation of men.

Simplification and Unification.

In the multiplicity of organizations in the church today, there is a widespread and wholesome movement toward simplification and unification of its agencies, and suggestions have been made that the women's missionary societies should be absorbed in the general boards of the churches. This opportune anniversary, and the study of the genesis of the movement, has confirmed the women in this connection that they have been called to a special and distinctive work, which they have no right to transfer to other hands. It may be that the progress of expansion, which was noted in the previous article, has overstepped its bounds at times, and there should be a readjustment of lines of work; certainly, there should be a closer co-operation between the boards of the same church, working in the same fields; but we can see no reason why the women's boards should lose their autonomy in any effort to simplify and unify the work.

To Call to Women.

There are the same social conditions in the East today as those which called women's missionary societies into existence fifty years ago; we have no right to outrage their customs, or their sense of the fitness of things, by endeavoring to give their women the gospel message of healing soul or body, except through the agency of their own sex. There are new and compelling voices calling to us from our own land, which should sound as potently in our hearts today as did the cry of the women of the far East in past years. One of the perplexing things about this age of light and progress is the presence of great evils along with great blessings; the industrial opportunities of women have brought wrongs as well as privileges in their train; the greed of wealth, preying upon the weak in its search for cheap labor, has given us the latter day anachronisms of child labor and the sweat shop.

Woman's Greater Liberty.

The greater liberty that has come to woman, industrially, educationally, socially, has brought a brood of new enemies, especially to young womanhood, that cannot be ignored. Those of us who have reached our fifth or sixth decade have never been exposed to the temptations that assail them, especially in city life. Co-education, their daily work in office, store and factory, the new social freedom that has come to them, bring them into contact with all kinds of people, and often hideous wrongs are perpetrated on them, because they are not forewarned and forearmed.

Horrors of the Social Evil.

The social evil has reached greater proportions in late years than ever before. So alarming has that phase of it that we call the white slave traffic become, that in 1904 an international treaty was formed between the great powers of Europe for the abatement of the evil—the first treaty relating to social morality was consummated between the civilized governments of the world. Our country became a party to it in 1908, and the commission appointed by congress to investigate this traffic in the United States brands it as, "the most accursed business ever devised by man."

Hundreds of thousands of these poor prisoners of sin are in our land today, and this exceeding great and bitter cry for help should find an echo in the heart of every Christian woman, and work for their rescue a place in every woman's organization.

So, the call for the protection of women and children in the field of social service at home is added to the cry for help from women and children in distant lands, and there is a more imperative need for the existence of women's missionary organizations today than there was fifty years ago. Women of Note —Mrs. Rose Hawthorne Lathrop, daughter of Nathaniel Hawthorne, the author, realized the ambition of a lifetime in her appointment as the head of what is said to be the only free home in the world exclusively for cancer patients. The home is her own idea and in her honor it will be named St. Rose's Free Home for Incurable Cancer. It is located at Hawthorne. N. Y.

—Col. L. M. Maus of the United States army sounds the following note of warning to the women of the land. It is with regret that I have learned that the advocates of the beer canteen have appealed to the wives and daughters of army officers to sign petitions for the return of beer to the post exchange. If army women will recall the sad tragedies connected with hundreds of the families of officers and soldiers, past and present, resulting from the alcoholic curse, I am satisfied they will spurn such petitions with the contempt they deserve.

She has declared her intention of devoting her life to the alleviation of the hardships of the inhabitants of Labrador and Newfoundland, the field of Dr. Grenfell's labors.

—Mrs. Mary Warren and Miss Kate Shea hold the curious jobs of waste basket searchers to the government. It is the business of these two women to look carefully over the contents of the waste baskets used in the Treasury Department in Washington and save from destruction any money or bonds that may have fallen into them by accident. Mrs. Warren has been in the Treasury Department for nearly forty years, Miss Shea about ten. It is estimated that together they have saved the government more than a million dollars. Mrs. Warren once found $10,000 in a waste basket.

Boys and Girls

The Boy Who Became a Great Engineer

By Fred Myron Colby.

One autumn day nearly a hundred years ago, a gentleman passing through a country village in the north of England, saw a boy trying to launch a little toy steamer in the river Tyne and make it keep steady in the water. But the little toy would not keep steady. It leaned first to one side, and then to the other, and the boy with infinite patience, took it from the water time after time, but could not remedy the defect.

The stranger understood the patient struggle with difficulties, and he went to where the boy knelt among the long lush grass.

"Did you make the little boat yourself?" he asked.

The boy was a slender, pale-faced little fellow with fair hair and a sweet thoughtful face. He looked up with flushed cheeks as he answered, "Yes."

"Let me look at it," said the stranger.

The little boat dripping with water was placed in his hands.

"Suppose we see where the defect lies. What is your name?" "Robert Stephenson," answered the boy.

"Why, you are George Stephenson's son, are you not?" declared the man, gazing keenly at the slight boyish figure.

"Yes," was the brief answer.

"I will show you, my lad, where you have erred in making your boat." The visitor knelt in the grass by the boy's side and explained clearly and briefly the cause of the defect.

"Do you understand it?" he asked after a time; and the boy's face brightened as he replied:

"Yes; I have made dozens of boats," he added, "and none of them were right. Now I shall never have another failure."

"You seem sure of success?" laughed his interrogator.

"Yes, because I know now how to make them," answered the boy, "and when I know how to make anything I succeed. I could not let it fail."

The spirited answer pleased the stranger. He looked more intently at the eager, boyish face.

"What would you like to be?" inquired the man, who had himself conquered a few difficulties by his own industry.

"I want to be an engineer—to make railways, to build bridges. I should like to level mountains and fill up valleys. Father says the earth seems made for men to master and to work upon."

"Your father is a wise man. Some day we shall hear of you too, my lad. You have a strongly marked vocation."

"Oh, do you think so?" And the boy's face brightened wonderfully. "I certainly do," replied the man. "You have genius, and I think you have patience. The world will hear of you."

And with these words the stranger passed on, leaving the slender, fair-haired boy alone with his boat. But the day had changed for the sober-faced lad. New aspirations, new hopes were in his breast.

"I wonder if his words will come true," thought the boy. "Shall I ever be a great man. He said I had a genius and that I had patience. They surely must win in the end."

He had indeed genius and patience, but he did not have much else. The boy was the son of a poor engineer who had to mend boots and shoes in the long winter evenings so as to provide the means for Robert's schooling. The boy was a weak, sickly child that people thought was "not made for long on this earth." But he grew stronger as he grew older, though his father was always very much worried about him.

George Stephenson was very ambitious for his boy. As he had suffered all life from a lack of early education he resolved that Robert should not. When he was twelve he was sent to a school in Newcastle. His father bought a donkey for him and on this the young lad rode to school and back. Some of the neighbors thought that the boy worked too hard over his books, and that the father was too strict. But George Stephenson was a wise man. He not only wished his boy to be a learned man, but he made him live much out of doors. He also let him play at "throwing the hammer," which is a game very popular in the north of England.

People soon discovered that young Stephenson was a very clever lad. When he was but thirteen he made a drawing of a sun dial, and soon after, father and son made a real dial which they placed over the cottage door.

All his spare time was spent in embodying in a practical shape the drawings of machines and instruments which he found described in the books he read. Among other things he constructed a theodolite spirit lever, on which he engraved the words "Robert Stephenson fecit." He invented a fastening for the gate and numerous improvements which the folks of the village were never tired of talking about.

As an example of his industry the following incident will show how diligent and hard-working he was. His father, not satisfied with the knowledge his boy had obtained at school, resolved to send Robert to Edinburgh University. Accordingly he spent the summer and winter sessions there when he was seventeen years old. He took copious notes of all the lectures, which he was accustomed carefully to write out, and consulted for many years. One evening after he had become famous, an engineering friend was discussing with him in his library, some scientific point, when Mr. Stephenson arose, and took down from the shelves a thick volume for the purpose of consulting it. On the question being asked, "What have you there?" he replied, "When I went to college I knew the difficulty my father had in collecting money to send me there. Before going I studied shorthand, and while at Edinburgh I took down verbatim, every lecture I attended. Every evening before I went to bed I transcribed those lectures, word for word, and you see the result in that range of books."

Robert was taught all sorts of work in the mines and in the workshop, but he was not happy unless he was studying something or making something. His opportunity came when he went with his father to construct the first railway between Stockton and Darlington. He was then only twenty years of age, but he was of such help to his father that his name was put on the plans as engineer.

Father and son afterwards built the famous engine called the Rocket, which won the prize for greatest speed. Before he was thirty, Robert was famous the world over for the railways and bridges he had built, and his skill and hard work had won him many honors. His queen offered him knighthood, but he refused it, preferring to remain plain Robert Stephenson. When he died, however, he was interred in Westminster Abbey, beside the dust of kings and queens, and statesmen and poets—a galaxy of England's great departed. It was a high place for him to rest at last, who was born the son of a poor collier.

Penamoo's Little Papoose

Penamoo lived in pioneer times. His home was in Southern Michigan, which was then one vast forest. He belonged to a tribe of peaceful Indians; and however distressed he may have been when white men built their homes in the forest, he was always a kind, good neighbor.

There were no railroads in those days, and the only roads were Indian trails. When the settlers came from the east with all their household belongings in wagons drawn by ox teams, they cut down the forest and began making farms on which to live the rest of their lives. It was fortunate for them that the Indians made no trouble, but shared their country with the white men.

The woods were full of deer, bears and wild turkeys, and Penamoo was a great hunter. He may have shot rabbits to get skins to wrap his baby in, for all we know. This much was certain: Penamoo had a little papoose of whom he was proud. The little papoose was never left at home when his mother went on journeys through the forest, but traveled in a basket on her back from morning until night.

One time an accident happened to this dear little papoose. Penamoo and a company of his friends, with their families, were on their way to visit relatives. They were traveling on ponies. It was nearly time to camp for the night when they reached the home of Mr. Baker. Mr. Baker had been working on his farm and was just returning to his log house, carrying a water jug in his hand when the Indians arrived. Straightway one of the ponies became frightened; and before anyone could prevent, the pony had thrown his rider to the ground. She was a squaw with her little papoose, and the little papoose was the son of Penamoo. The squaw mother and Penamoo were filled with grief and anger when they found that the little papoose had a broken arm. They blamed Mr. Baker for the accident. Mr. Baker was sorry enough to see a little Indian baby so badly hurt, but he could not make the Indians understand. They said he scared the pony on purpose, and they were so angry that the children in the log house were alarmed. That night Mr. Baker was more troubled about what harm the Indians might do his own family than about the condition of that poor little papoose.

Penamoo and his squaw took good care of their baby that evening; and while Penamoo was giving Indian medicines to the little son, he kept thinking and thinking about Mr. Baker. At last he decided upon what he thought a fair plan. Soon after breakfast, Penamoo walked into Mr. Baker's cabin, and scared the little Baker children worse than ever by his terms of peace. "If papoose gets well," said he, "you pay me three dollars. If papoose die, you give me one of your papooses."

The Indians were not the only ones extremely thankful that Penamoo's little son was soon well. Three dollars meant more in pioneer times than now, but Mr. Baker gladly paid the amount.

"You give me one of your papooses," became a joke among the settlers, although it was a joke that the Baker children never thoroughly enjoyed. Not one of them wished to be Penamoo's papoose, not even the boy who could whoop the loudest and did not like to wash his face.—The Churchman.

Pat trotted down town to a jeweler's to buy a ring for his wife to be. After waiting until he could obtain the ear of the clerk, Pat whispered, hoarsely, "Give me the best wedding ring you have in the shop." "Eighteen karats?" queried the clerk. "No," snapped Pat, drawing back in an offended manner. "Atin' onions, if it's any of your business."—Electrical Review.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

C. W. Freeman has resigned at West Frankfort, the resignation to become effective within a short time.

Evangelists Hill and Knowles are conducting a revival meeting with the East Side Church, Decatur.

Evangelist H. A. Stone of Oklahoma, held a brief meeting at Cairo, Second Church, with one addition by baptism resulting.

Amos A. Burr, who has been pastor at Moweaqua, has accepted a call to an Iowa church, and has already removed to that state.

Paris Church, of which W. W. Sniff is pastor, will have the services of Evangelist William J. Lockhart in a revival meeting during January.

The revival meeting at Columbus, conducted by F. A. Sword and his singer, Mr. Kay, had resulted in twenty-three additions, after only ten days of services.

C. M. Smithson has entered on the second year of his pastorate at Streator. Four additions were reported from this church by confession, Sunday, December 17.

A short meeting at Stockwell, held by Evangelist J. W. Sweet, pastor of Mackinaw Church, added nineteen to the congregation, eighteen being on profession of faith.

The congregation at Edgewood is without a pastor since the pastoral relation was severed by J. E. Story. The church is seeking a new minister.

It is learned that H. H. Peters, financial secretary of Eureka College, has consented to become pastor for one half time of Laomi Church, his labor there to begin immediately.

N. E. Cory, of Iowa, held a three weeks' meeting with the church at Fowler, which proved of real spiritual value to the congregation and resulted in one addition by baptism. The pastor is S. F. Boyd.

A Brotherhood, numbering about one hundred charter members was organized at Mattoon by F. B. Thomas, the pastor. The pastor had the assistance of J. K. Shellenberger, secretary of the Brotherhood.

J. D. Williams closed a revival meeting at Ripley with twenty-six additions and new life infused into the congregation. Mr. Williams will continue for a time to preach for the church.

Against the protest of the congregation and after a vote requesting the reconsideration of his resignation, T. A. Lindenmeyer has decided not to remain with the church at Salem after the first of next March. He will either engage in evangelistic work or accept another pastorate.

J. E. Story has become pastor for half time of the church at Beecher City. Mr. Story has held two successful revival meetings for this congregation, and the church will accept his leadership with extra enthusiasm.

F. A. Galiger, who was mentioned recently as pastor of the church at Oreana, where the re-dedicatory service was held, has concluded his pastorate with this church and is ready to labor for some church accessible from Eureka College.

The Men's Class of the Sunday-school of Heyworth, held a banquet recently, and was addressed by S. H. Zendt and J. L. Scofield of Bloomington. The class purposes making this an annual event. The pastor is C. J. Robertson.

Lovington Church recently ordained to the ministry, Paul E. Million. Mr. Million is pursuing his college course at Eureka, from which point he has been preaching, and is ready for employment by churches not too distant, and not capable of having a resident pastor.

The new church at Kilbourne will be dedicated the first Sunday in January. State Secretary J. Fred Jones, of Stanford, will be present as master of ceremonies. Immediately following the dedication, R. B. Doan of Armington will lead the church in a revival meeting.

Atwood Church is pastorless since the resignation of J. H. Smart, which took effect the middle of December. Mr. Smart has not yet accepted another church. He is a man of experience and a strong preacher, and should be employed at once by some congregation within reach of Decatur, where he now makes his residence.

Major Griffith is entering the second year of his pastorate at Allenville. During the last year there were about fifty additions to the church, with a very largely augmented attendance at Sunday-school, and all departments of the church flourishing. Mr. Griffith may be secured to preach for another church for one half time.

The Summer meeting, conducted by J. E. Stout, was concluded with a total of ninety-five persons co-operating to form the reorganized congregation. Of this number, eighteen were new additions, five of whom were by confession. The church has employed J. A. Battenfield, to give them one half his time.

The Summum pastor, G. W. Burnett, who was to have concluded his pastorate at this place, at the urgent solicitation of the congregation, re-considered his resignation and will continue to serve as minister. At the regular services, during one week, there were eleven additions, the majority of them being on profession of faith.

Through error the Illinois yearbook, recently mailed, indicates that A. Immanuel Zeller of Petersburg is in secular business but preaching occasionally. He is the full time preacher of his church and it should have so appeared in the yearbook. While the error is purely accidental it is greatly regretted by Secretaries Jones and Deweese who ask that the correction be given publicity through The Christian Century.

Secretary W. D. Deweese, of the Illinois Missionary Society is also pastor at Hudson near Bloomington. He reports an excellent evangelistic meeting held in his church recently by Miss Myrtle B. Park. "There were some doubts in the minds of a few of the members whether a woman could or ought to preach, but that feeling soon disappeared, and they were her ardent admirers." There were nineteen additions to the church. Miss Park has just accepted a call to remain a fourth year with the church at Carlock. There is some talk of a new church building at that place.

Secretary's Letter.

R. O. Rogers is the new man at Carterville, and we predict some good work will be done there. He sends a good offering for Illinois missions and says: "Brethren, I have come into this great state to be of real service to the cause of Christ and the servants of our missionary enterprises, so you may depend upon me and command me."

There is a vast difference in men in this respect. Some slip into the state and seem to want to hide; they do not write us and when we do find them they will not enroll with our office. Others write us as soon as they get settled, or before; they send in their enrollment blank properly filled out, and desire to be closely identified with the state office.

Whenever a preacher decides to locate in another state he should at once notify his state secretary when he expects to move and where he is going, and as quick as he knows where he will locate he should notify the secretary of that state, and when he gets settled write him again. Don't play hide-and-seek with the state secretaries. It looks like there may be something wrong with the man who does that.

The work at Greenview prospers in the hands of R. L. Cartwright. They are planning for a meeting soon.

Sheeler Campbell of Girard held a meeting in Greenfield, O., with twenty-seven additions.

The congregation at Ancona recently gave Guy L. Zerby a unanimous call to remain with them another year.

J. I. O'Neal of Oblong held a ten days' meeting at Lancaster with nineteen additions. They were in a weak condition and this meeting is a great help to them. This is Bro. O'Neal's missionary meeting for this year. He has been re-employed at Oblong.

Coffey, for student work, 2.00; West Salem, 3.90; Union Prairie, Arthur, 1.25; Latham, 12.40; Arrowsmith, 2.25; Leroy, additional, 2.25; Barney's Prairie, Mt. Carmel, 3.16; Herrin, 22.12; Eureka, (additional) 2.55; Mt. Vernon, 6.00; Ruth Patterson, personal gift, 1.00; Heyworth, 18.00; Williamsville, 13.40.

At the last meeting of the state board, a Front Rank Standard for churches was adopted for Illinois, and the literature will be mailed out form our office in a short time to all the preachers and church clerks. The points required for a Front Rank Church are as follows:

1. A Sunday-school.
2. A Christian Endeavor Society.
3. Weekly Observance of the Lord's Supper.
4. The Sunday morning audiences averaging fifty per cent of the church membership.
5. Contributing members equal to sixty per cent of the Church membership.
6. Monthly meetings of the church officers.
7. Annual revision of the church roll.
8. Annual evangelistic meeting held at home or elsewhere.
9. Annual statistical report of the State Board.
10. Annual offerings to State Missions, Foreign missions, American missions, and Church Extension.

We hope the churches and ministers will take hold of this forward move with real interest and push it along. If your church can now measure up to the standard in every point, drop us a card to that effect, or tell us what points you have attained and try to attain the others as soon as possible.

The Front Rank plan has been a great uplift to the Sunday-school work and it can be applied with equal helpfulness to the church. We will publish the list of Front Rank Churches in this column from time to time. Kansas has had this plan working for two or three years with splendid results and other states are adopting a standard and Illinois will not be left in the rear of the procession. Report to our office.

There is a very great need that our churches in Illinois make their state offerings as large as possible and as soon as convenient. A large number have not reported yet and many offerings are much smaller than in former years. Weak churches are pleading for a little help, but we canont grant it, only as the churches make us able.

A Christian Gentleman

He is above a mean thing. He cannot stoop to fraud. He invades no secret in the keeping of another. He betrays no sercet confided to his keeping. He never struts in borrowed plumage. He never takes selfish advantage of mistakes. He uses no ignoble weapons in controversy. He never stabs in the dark. He is not one thing to a man's face and another behind his back. If by accident he comes in possession of his neighbor's counsels, he passes upon them an act of instant oblivion. He bears sealed packages without tampering with the wax. Papers not meant for his eye are sacred to him. He invades no privacy of others, however the sentry sleeps. Bolts and bars, locks and keys, hedges and pickets, bonds and securities, notice to trespassers are none of them for him. He may be trusted alone, out of sight, near the thinnest partition—anywhere. He buys no offices, he sells none, he intrigues for none. He would rather fail of his rights than win them through dishonor. He will eat honest bread. He tramples on no sensitive feeling. He insults no man. If he have rebuke for another, he is straightforward, open, manly; he cannot descend to scurrility. In short, whatever he judges honorable he practices toward every man.—Selected.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES

The report of the Department of Sanitation of the Isthmian Canal Commission shows the almost incredible result of trained, scientific effort to control disease during the month of October. There were 37,496 colored and 12,316 white employees at work on the canal and railroad. Thirty-three colored employees died of disease and six from violence, a total of thirty-nine deaths, or an average annual rate per thousand of 12.48. This is the death-rate for October for nearly thirty-eight thousand negro laborers, working in what was, a few years ago, the pesthole of the tropics. The death-rate for the United States for 1910, for all classes and climates, was 16.1, nearly four deaths per thousand higher than the death-rate for the poorest class of laborers in the Canal zone. Among the white employees, numbering 12,316, five died from disease and two from violence, a total annual death-rate of 6.82 per thousand. Returns from the 1910 federal census show that the American city having the lowest death rate in 1910 was West Orange, New Jersey, where the death-rate was 8.5, while the highest death-rate, that of Charleston, South Carolina, was 29.7, or over four times the rate among white employees on the Isthmus. The Journal of the Medical Association, commenting on these facts, says: "And yet the League for Medical Freedom, headed by Senator Works, who is a Christian Scientist, demands that the president revoke his order limiting the right to treat disease on the Isthmus to properly educated persons, and that the wonderful results secured by the toil and sacrifice of devoted, clear-headed scientific men be surrendered at the behest of deluded and uninformed religious enthusiasts."

Women are not working as long as they used to, thanks to the legislators of some of the states. South Carolina has passed a law limiting them to sixty hours per week in mercantile houses and the textile mills, of which there are so many in the state. In Ohio and Massachusetts a fifty-four hour bill has been enacted. The Ohio bill applies to everything excepting hotels and mercantile establishments. Utah and Missouri have also passed nine-hour laws. The ten-hour law which the legislature of Illinois enacted in 1909, is enlarged so as to include practically every kind of establishment where women are employed. Wisconsin has established a fifty-five hour week, excepting night work, which is less. Minnesota has strengthened its ten-hour law by extending the penalty for violation so as to include manufacturing and mechanical establishments. The states of Washington and California have passed eight-hour day laws for women. The law of Washington applies to the usual mercantile and mechanical establishments, restaurants, hotels and laundries, but the California act applies also to telegraph, telephone, express and transportation offices.

The pension idea is growing steadily with some of the great business concerns of the country. Stockholders of the American Sugar-Refining Company will be called upon at the next annual meeting to approve a plan to provide pensions to the company's 7,500 officers and employes. Details of the plan include provisions for retiring employes over sixty-five years of age or after thirty years of service. An appropriation of $300,000 is suggested as the nucleus of the pension fund. No pension under the proposed plan will be less than $20 a month and none will exceed $5,000 a year. The age limit for women is set at sixty and the term of service at twenty-five years. The amount of the pension will be "a sum annually equivalent to 1 per cent of the average annual wage or salary during the ten years preceding retirement multiplied by the years of service." All officers and employes of the company or any corporation owned or controlled by the company, the announcement states would be eligible for the pension benefits. To employees discharged after fifteen years' service pension may be granted if the committee deems fit. The only exaction of the beneficiaries embraced in the plan is that they do not engage in any work which, in the judgment of the committee, is in conflict with the company's interests.

Russia did a good deal of trading with the United States in the year which closed June 30, 1911. The total trade between the two countries in that year was $36,907,511. Exports from this country to Russia amounted to $24,704,049, and our imports from Russia were valued at $12,203,462. Of our exports to Russian territory $23,524,267 worth went to Russia in Europe and $1,179,782 to Russia in Asia. Of our imports from Russia $11,004,164 came from Russia in Europe and $1,199,298 from Russia in Asia. The Jews, who are entirely a commercial people, received no doubt, a large benefit from so much business.

Illinois had less land in farms in 1910 than it had when the previous census was taken in 1900, according to a bulletin issued by the census bureau. Farm property, including lands, buildings, implements and machinery and live stock, increased $2,000,000,000 in value, $1,576,000,000 being in the value of land, $180,000,000 in the value of buildings and $143,793,000 in the value of farm equipment. The number of farms in the state in 1910 was 251,872, having a total of 32,522,937 acres. The total wealth in the form of farm property is over $3,900,000,000. The decrease in the number of farms is due entirely to a decrease of 12,960 in the number of farms operated by owners and managers. There was an increase of 681 in the number operated by tenants.

England is sending a better class of her citizens to settle on the great prairies and labor in the mines and lumber camps of the Canadian country than she used to do They have the same chance to succeed now that "Lorimer" did when he struck the Northwest some twenty years ago. The bare facts are indicated by the very small percentage of rejections and deportations, which do not exceed one-half of 1 per cent.

The Dominion Government has an emigration department in London and it is doing a rushing business. A report for the ten months ended October 31 shows that the number of emigrants who went to Canada from the United Kingdom was 139,377, an increase of 21,300 over the total for the corresponding ten months of 1910.

Until last year more Britishers went to the United States than to Canada. This was not satisfactory to the British Government nor to the Dominion authorities, and efforts were begun which have been successful in diverting the tide of immigration from the United States to its northern neighbor. Up to Nov. 1 this year for which figures were available nearly three people went to Canada from the British Isles where one went to the United States. And there is no sign of a change in the tide.

C. C. Griggs has become associate minister of the church at Angola, Ind., where C. W. McCord ministers. At the Christmas service of the church there was a large attendance with six additions including one young man who is planning to enter the ministry.

The Sunday-school of the First Church at Richmond, Ky., was among those that had a "giving" instead of "receiving" Christmas. The children cooperated with the older members in distributing food and clothing to the needy. Over sixty baskets were sent out. It was the most enjoyable occasion the school has had in many a day.

B. F. Cato begins his work with the First Church of Bowling Green, Ky., Jen. 1. Mr. Cato has been at Lawrenceville, Ia., for the past sixteen months, where the work has greatly prospered. A $4,000 debt has been wiped out, the congregation has been made a living link in the Foreign Society and a pipe-organ fund raised.

The Central Church, Des Moines, Ia., had a vesper service in the afternoon of Dec. 24, to allow families to be at home for Christmas eve. A cantata was rendered and a musical program given. The Sunday-school distributed forty baskets containing food, dolls and books.

D. E. Olson is trying to raise $16,500 to pay to the Baptists for their $100,000 plant in the heart of the Scandinavian district of Minneapolis. The auditorium has a seating capacity of 1,500. He may be addressed at 2617 W. 57th St., Seattle, Wash. Mr. Olson is associated with C. J. Osterhuis.

A. W. Kokendoffer and Miss Laura Gentry were married in Sedalia, Mo., on Christmas day. The ceremony was performed by Richard W. Gentry, the brother of the bride. Mr. Kokendoffer has been pastor at Sedalia for three years. The Christian Century wishes the couple a long, happy, useful married life.

H. O. Breeden recently dedicated the building of the First Christian church of Sacramento, Cal. Money enough was raised to pay off the debt of $7,000 and to assure the immediate purchase of a $3,000 organ. Ministers of seven denominations spoke in the afternoon, congratulating the pastor, J. J. Evans, and the church on the completion of their plans. Frank C. Huston led the music.

R. Stuart, of Rochester, N. Y., writes that the rally of the F. C. M. S. team with Secretary Allen, Dr. Jaggard of Bolengi, and Mr. Shaw of China, as the speakers, was highly successful in point of attendance and interest. The parties from national societies often skip Rochester, but this exception was much appreciated by the church and will result in a greatly increased offering for the work and greater loyalty to the work of God that is being done by this agency.

W. Remfry Hunt writes: China in the throes of a great revolution is a terrible business. Cities are sacked, brigandage rife, and the loss of life very great. Our missionaries will be wise and do their best. Chu Chow is on the direct line of strategic places for both parties. The situation is very grave. Our men are doing Red Cross work. All schools closed nad general anarchy prevails, we need your prayers now. Help the society now as rents are very high in Shanghai.

Chas. S. Early, of Hill City, Kan., would like to hold meetings in the North or East in the spring. He reports that the home church has prospered during his absence of several months and that the meeting now in progress is already doing well. There have been twenty-nine responses. Mr. Early will hold a meeting in Plainville, Kan., in January. This is the seventh meeting that has been held at Hill City under Mr. Early's ministry.

B. W. Rice, who was ordained seven years ago in a Disciple Church, has been holding union meetings in Idaho. He recently had a meeting at Caldwell with a Methodist church during which twenty-nine were immersed. Mr. Rice will remain with them for a time when he will hold a meeting for the Congregationalists in Boise. Another meeting is projected in the country with the object of consolidating all the Christians of the community under a comon name and faith. Mr. Rice has proposed that the communion table be spread every Sunday, that all who will may observe the ordinance.

W. J. Lhamon of Drury College, Springfield, Mo., who recently delivered the Bondurant Lectures at the University of Illinois, writes most encouragingly of the religious conditions in that institution. John R. Mott's recent visit to the University resulted in the committment of some 300 students to the Christian life. He believes that universities are not hostile to religion though dogmatism, traditionalism, and obscurantism meet with scant respect. The lectures of Mr. Lhamon were most favorably received.

John H. Booth has recently made a tour through the Southeast with a view to observe the conditions and report to the board of Church Extension. He was greatly surprised at the promising outlook and predicts that a mighty empire is to be built up in that territory. The Church Extension Board has loaned $150,040 in that section, thus assisting in the erection of 113 churches. Additional loans of $46,650 were recently granted to twenty-eight churches in this territory, but the money is not yet in hand. As soon as it has been contributed by the churches, it will be sent to the applicants. Other national agencies are assisting in developing the work there.

J. E. Davis of Beatrice, Neb., has accepted a call to the Central Christian Church of Spokane, Wash., and will begin work with them in March. The Central Church is the strongest of the seven Christian churches in Spokane, and one of the three largest in the city. Mr. Davis will go from a very successful work in Beatrice. Six years ago the church numbered 400 members, while at present there are 1,500. The most remarkable part of the work of the church, however, is its missionary activity which includes some work done by the church on every continent of the globe. Their missionary offerings are in excess of their total budget for local expenses, including all items. The official board accepted his resignation with regret and adopted resolutions of the strongest character commending the work done.

Sunday, Dec. 17, was a great day for the cause in Fort Smith, Ark. The Echols Memorial Church was dedicated in the morning and in the evening the new $4,000 pipe-organ at the First Church was heard for the first time. William J. Echols was for forty years the strong supporter of E. T. Edmonds in building up the cause in this city and was identified with every good enterprise of the community. A year ago his widow asked the privilege of building a chapel in his memory. Lots were purchased in the growing eastern section, a handsome chapel, which seats about four hundred, was built and furnished. The total cost, some $10,000 was paid by Mrs. Echols and her children. A. S. Chisholm of this city was the architect. Howard Peters, a C. W. B. M. misionary, and the "Living Link" of the First Church, is serving as pastor, and has already gathered a congregation of fifty to inaugurate the work. Mr. Peters' past record gives hope of a self-sustaining church in a few years. Money for the organ was raised by the Whatsoever Circle of the First Church and partly by a gift from Andrew Carnegie. Edward B. Bagby dedicated the Echols Memorial Church.

Hammett Place church of St. Louis, held its annual meeting in the church on the evening of December 7. The meeting was characterized by enthusiasm because of the healthy condition of all departmets of the church's work as revealed by the annual report. Hammett Place church is not strong numerically or financially. Many of the older children of the Christian Orphans' Home are numbered among its members. The amount of money raised for the year was $2,710.44, of this amount $567.53 was contributed for missions and benevolences. The Bible-school is full of life and vigor, numbering in the neighborhood of 300, crowding the house to the limit so that when the weather permits classes are held out of doors. The Auxiliary of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions has been on the Honor Roll for years. It raised $179.15 in the year. Total number of additions for the year was fifty-three. Present membership is 284. This marks the closing of the fifth year in this pastorate for C. C. Garrigues. Each year has been an improvement over its predecessor. In this year there have been 255 additions and an offering of $2620.47 for missions and benevolences. The church and consecrated minister are both deserving of credit and of a better equipment for the important work under their care.

Philip F. King has accepted a call to the church at Austin, Texas.

The new Christian edifice at Cleghorn, Ia., will be dedicated Jan. 14.

Roy Youtz, pastor at Palmyra, Mo., has resigned to accept a call to Canton, Mo.

R. E. Callitan of Richmond, Mo., has accepted a call to become pastor of the Christian church at Thorntown.

Russell E. Briney has accepted a call to the Forest Avenue Church of Kansas City, Missouri.

G. F. Bradford, pastor Main Street church, Waxahachie, Tex., has resigned to accept the pastorate of Central Church, Sherman, Texas.

The flames from the stove that had been placed to heat the building for the Christmas program set fire to the church at Altus, Arkansas. The building was consumed.

L. T. Flanders, of Wellington, Kan., has begun his leadership of First church, Billings, Mont. He was pastor at Wellington over five years.

Harvey B. Smith of Edenside Church, Louisville, Ky., goes to Glasgow, Ky., and Minor Ross, formerly at Pulaski, Va., takes the pulpit at Edenside Church.

Ground has been broken for a $55,000 building on Third Avenue in Cedar Rapids, Ia., to make a new home for the congregation where Walter M. White is pastor.

A novel bequest is that in the will of the late James Leedy of St. Joseph, Mo., who left $500 a year as a perpetual legacy to be used in holding revival meetings in St. Joseph.

The church at Havelock, Nebr., raised $1,400 on Sunday, Dec. 24 to pay off their church extension debt. This leaves $1,100 yet to pay and when this is cleared the congregation will have its $10,000 church paid for.

Samuel Troth, a member of First Church, Philadelphia, passed to his reward Thursday, Dec. 6. He had been a faithful and devoted teacher in the Sunday-school, one of the elders of the church and president of its official board.

A unique young people's service was held in Independence Boulevard church, Kansas City, on Christmas eve. The three branches of the C. E. Society united and the cooperation of the Juniors was secured by having one of them light a candle every time a senior arose to speak. Thus the room was gradually lighted up.

The first of the year is always the time when many changes of preachers are made. Among others we note the following: J. C. Harris goes from Panora to Storm Lake, Ia., Wm. H. Knox leaves Storm Lake for Highland Park, Des Moines, Ed. Keiter moves from Higbee to Hannibal, Mo., and A. K. Williams has resigned from the work at Joplin, Mo., to acept a call to the Third Street Church of Little Rock, Ark.

J. O. Shelburne has been granted permission by the board of officers of the Central Christian Church, Dallas, Tex., to conduct a campaign among the students of the University of Texas at Austin, during the last week in January. The campaign is a part of the Men and Religion Forward Movement, and is directed locally by the four university churches, the Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian and Episcopal, all of whom united in the call to Mr. Shelburne.

James M. Philputt, formerly pastor at Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, who with Mrs. Philputt, has spent nearly two years in Europe and the Orient, returned to the homeland last week, landing in New York, as he says, "safe and sound." This last adjective we have no doubt applies to his theology as well as to his health. His coming at this time is partly in response to a call received at Geneva, asking him to supply for First Church, New York City, and to aid in consummating the consolidation of this congregation and Lenox Avenue Church. Dr. Philputt was for nearly fifteen years pastor of the latter church, having been the leading spirit in its founding. He will, no doubt, bring his good offices to bear to conserve all the interests of the Disciples in New York.

I find earth not gray, but rosy;
Heaven not grim, but fair of hue;
Do I stop? I pluck a posy.
Do I stand and stare? All's blue.
—Robert Browning.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS. THE WINTER OF 1912 SURPASSES ALL RECORDS

Need of Social Awakening

It is impossible to state too strongly the need of a great awakening to the social mission and the social duty of the church. It is time for all of us who call ourselves Christians to come right out into the open as to the need for reform in our social and industrial institutions. But in order that we may be strong for and equal to this work we must not forget that the very power of the church today to do her social work in this world lies in the fact that she stands for much more than that. It is the mission of the church first of all to speak to men of God, to bring them into relation with Him. And then the church must stand for human service, for everything that brings God down from heaven into the lives and affairs of men. That is the very meaning of the religion of the Incarnation, God coming down into the lives of men to identify himself with them wholly. Inevitably the church must always give its strength for better government, for honest business methods, for better living conditions for the poor, for the fight to stamp out tuberculosis, for more playgrounds and parks for the children in our cities; for all that helps toward the doing of our task here on earth, even as it is done in heaven. But in order that she may use her true power on men's lives, it must be her first business to bring men to their knees again before God, to help them to realize His personal relation with them, that they shall understand fully the privilege and the duty and the joy of worship.—Rev. Dr. W. T. Manning.

—Mrs. Susie Peek of Eufaula, Okla., claims the distinction of being the youngest "grandmother of fifty grandchildren," in the United States. Mrs. Peek was seventy-one years of age, September 30. She had five children and she has fifty grandchildren and ten great-grandchildren.

MONINGER MEMORIAL DAY

Special attention is called to the following splendid responses relating to the Moninger Memorial enterprise. It is hoped that every Sunday-school will have fellowship in the raising of the $25,000 in honor of this brilliant leader so recently taken from us. January 28 is the day announced for the taking of the offering. Supplies may be had for the asking. Every dollar given will go permanently into the fund. Inquiries and offerings should be sent, plainly marked to

THE ENDOWMENT A WITNESS.

Herbert Moninger rendered a unique and marvelous service to his church and left the Sunday-school world greatly indebted to him. His memory will be lovingly cherished by those whose fortune it was to know him.

Nothing could be a more fitting memorial to him and to his work than the proposed endowment of a chair of Bible School Pedagogy. By faith Herbert Moninger offered unto God a most excellent sacrifice, the endowment will be a witness, God testifying of his gifts, and by it be being dead will continue to speak. E. K. WARREN.

Three Oaks, Mich.

A HAPPY AND PRACTICAL IDEA.

It was both a happy and practical idea that suggested the endowing of a Chair of Bible School Pedagogy in Bethany College as a memorial to Herbert Moninger, who however will be remembered without such a memorial, for few men among us in recent years have rendered such valuable service.

To endow a chair to the memory of one to whom the Bible School was an abiding passion and who stood as a leader in this great work among the Disciples of Christ and other communions as well, is eminently fitting, and for this to be at Bethany College too, his Alma Mater. But the chief force of such a suggestion is the value of such a chair. PETER AINSLIE.

Baltimore, Md.

COLLEGES ACCEPTING RESPONSIBILITY.

There are two reasons why such a Merorial should be erected:

First, because of the worthiness of the work itself. In the coming days every Christian College I believe will have a Bible School Chair. The Bible has practically been taken from our public schools and the only institution which now stands for its teaching is the Bible School. A Bible School, of course, is not the reservoir of Bible study but rather the dynamo. If the Bible School was discontinued, religious education would be almost, if not altogether, paralyzed.

Second, because of the worthiness of Herbert Moninger and the great contribution he made towards the Bible School work. His life was cut short and his ministry was very brief. During this brief ministry, however, he made I believe the largest contribution that any man has ever made in the same length of time to the Bible School work. His influence has been felt in every part of North America and by every Protestant denomination. W. C. Pearce.

Chicago, Ill.

LET US CATCH MONINGER'S ENTHUSIASM.

"The great work that Herbert Moninger

The Divinity of Christ

is the new work on religion by EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES which bids fair to be even more generally discussed than the same author's "Psychology of Religious Experience."

It is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

did was certainly worthy of the proposed monument in his memory. And how beautiful a monument is proposed! One that will materially help in securing competent superintendents for our Bible Schools; and will hasten that day when a majority of the teachers will know the lesson and be qualified to teach it. If a few of us catch the spirit of Moninger's enthusiasm and resourcefulness we shall soon have a Chair of Bible School Pedagogy at Bethany."

Detroit, Mich. J. T. McGARVEY.

MAKE IT FOUR TIMES AS LARGE!

"I need not say I am in favor of the proposition to endow a Chair of Bible School Pedagogy at Bethany College. I think it is imperative that every one of our Colleges supports religious education.

By all means endow the Moninger Chair —make the endowment four times as large as is proposed if possible. The churches have a right to expect that their preachers shall be trained Bible School men and the College that refuses to grant this training is unworthy the support of our people. The churches should richly endow any institutions willing to undertake this work. I want to see the Moninger Chair succeed—it would be a sad commentary on our brotherhood if the enterprise should fail."

WALTER S. ATHEARN,
Des Moines, Iowa. Drake University.

THREE REASONS FOR IT.

"For three great reasons the endowment of a Chair of Bible School Pedagogy at Bethany College ought to meet with response from every man and woman who has the interest of our cause at heart.

First, because a thoroughly trained, leadership for our Bible School forces is one of the most urgent, if not the first need of our churches.

Second, Bethany College needs and deserves and rightly should be given this Chair of Bible School Pedagogy in memory of her own son, Herbert Moninger.

Third, a grateful brotherhood should, in this practical and appropriate way honor the memory of the man who aroused it to an appreciation of the greatness of our oportunity and responsibility in the Sunday-school. MINER LEE BATES.

Hiram College, Hiram, Ohio.

IT OUGHT TO BE ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND!

"Of course it is clear to those of us who have had experience in school work that an endowment of twenty-five thousand dollars will not at all adequately provide for the chair. In the splendid department of Drake, over which our Professor Athearn presides, the amount expended during the past year would have taken an endowment of from sixty to eighty thousand dollars and while we are wonderfully happy in the progress thus far made, I am sure that it has only been a splendid beginning. I take it, however, that nothing more than the twenty-five thousand dollars could well be projected and of course in addition to all other funds even that will not be raised without some pressure and difficulty. At the same time the exceeding sacredness of the appeal will quicken the response I am sure." CHARLES S. MEDBURY.

Des Moines, Iowa.

A WORD FROM MARION LAWRANCE.

"I do not know how the Disciples of Christ could erect a more suitable monument to the memory of this dear brother than to endow a chair of Bible School Pedagogy at Bethany College. It is the best of all ways open to his friends to perpetuate his strong and beautiful life. If such a thing were done, it would simply be continuing and multiplying his influence through the years and ages that are yet to come; and I am sure his many friends will be more than pleased with this opportunity of showing their affection for our dear brother, and their loyalty to the work for which he gave his life." MARION LAWRANCE.

Chicago, Ill.

A FITTING MEMORIAL.

"I think it is entirely fitting that a memorial of this kind should be established in memory of one who has done so much for Sunday-school work as did Herbert Moninger. His name is so closely identified with the Sunday-school work that it is opportune now to enter upon the undertaking. I think it is also most appropriate that that memorial be established at Bethany College, which was his Alma Mater, and I hope the enterprise will be brought to a successful conclusion." THOMAS C. HOWE.

Indianapolis, Ind.

Helpful suggestions, including programs and coin pockets for use on this day, may be had by applying to Robert M. Hopkins at address at head of this article.

All funds should be sent to Mr. Hopkins and care should be taken to state plainly that the offering is for the "Moninger Memorial Fund" in order that it may in no way be confused with the missionary offerings. This is a special fund for a special purpose and every one should have a part in it.

Ministerial Relief and Its Right-of-Way

That we might the more adequately meet the winter's demands, the January payment to the old preachers this year has been divided into two parts. The first part was made December first, and the second part will be made February first. Our idea is that January will bring returns that will enable us to make two payments much better than the Jenuary payment alone. Whether your offering be taken in December or January, we urge prompt remittance that we may know how to measure this February payment. This is the most needy season of the year and the time we ought to make our largest payments.

The first six days following our offering day, Third Lord's Day in December, the receipts were $761.93, as against $1,120.49 for the same six days of last year. In receipts, September is usually the best month. This year we want January to be the best, and logically it always ought to be so. We ought to have five thousand new contributing churches this year in meeting that most wonderfully generous proposition of the good brother who offers to give one dolalr for every five dollars the brotherhood gives between $20,000 and $30,000. If this proposition is met this year, and the good man lives, then it holds good for the next year, and the next, and so for five years. There must be no failure this year, and that means that your congregation must send its offering. We do not see how there can be a failure, for seven thousand preachers know of this proposition and of the needs of the work, and we believe they can be depended upon to inform their people and to lead them into the fellowship of this ministry. What we especially urge is a December or a January offering if it is possible. This is the proper time for this matter, and then it gets it out of the way of other interests which must also have attention and support. Brethren of the ministry, know that your Lord depends upon you as leaders of His people, and you cannot afford to fail him. A. L. ORCUTT,

President of the Board.

The Bible College of Missouri

(As an Investment.)

The Bible College of Missouri presents itself to the Disciples of Christ as a gilt edged investment. To the person who is interested in giving his money rationally, and in seeing others do the same, the following brief, but pungent arguments will be appealing.

I. The geographical location of the school is ideal. It is buried in the very heart of the Missouri brotherhood, so that it can minister to all parts equally, and prove deserving of their equal interest. A circle described with Columbia as its center, strikes three corners of our great commonwealth, and rightly marks the Bible College of Missouri as the "Hub of the Wheel."

2. This institution is the result of a stroke of economic genius. It stands beside a strong university which furnishes it over three million dollars' worth of secular instruction free of cost. Hence every talent invested in the Bible College of Missouri, makes other ten talents. Each dollar invested in this school begets three dollars' worth of instruction in the great university. Thus we see that a $100 gift to our Bible College accomplishes exactly what $400 would, if given in an ordinary way.

3. Moreover, the Bible College of Missouri, possesses the immense economic and spiritual advantage of pursuing two vital aims. The same round of religious instruction which sends ministers and missionaries out to their labor, brings within its circle hundreds of lay young people, whose lives are profoundly affected by the instruction they receive.

4. Finally, the Bible College of Missouri, is actually practicing Christian Union in the field. Without sacrificing any creed or confession of faith, because we have none in the formal sense; without sacrificing any of our fundamentals, because these, rightly interpreted, are universal, it offers its courses free of charge to Baptist and Methodist, Catholic and Jew.

For these reasons, simple but weighty, few but powerful, to him who thinks, those persons who desire to give rationally, to give vitally, to sow where the harvest will surely come, should consider the plea of the Bible College of Missouri, the "Hub of the Wheel."

Field Secretary.

A Little Nonsense

"What is Billy Hardatit doing these days?" asked Smithers. "Oh, he's working his son's way through college," said little Binks.—Harper's Weekly.

In a prayer-meeting an exhorter arose to speak, and began his remarks thus, "As I was sitting on a thought, a seat passed through my mind."

She (in art museum)—"They say that famous marine artist was once a plain farmer's boy. I wonder where he developed his talent?" He—"Probably drawing water on the farm."—Boston Transcript.

"Satan," said Brother Dickey, "comes lak' a roarin' lion." "I don't 'gree wid you on dat," said Brother Williams, "kaze I never 'lowed he was a-comin' 'twell he had me."—Atlantic Constitution.

The Professor's Wife: "The professor is in the laboratory conducting some chemical experiments. The professor expects to go down to posterity."—(From the laboratory): "Br-r-r. Bang!" The Visitor: "I hope the professor hasn't gone!"—Harlem Life.

Cassidy had just been injured in a blast. "Poor b'y!" exclaimed O'Hara, consolingly. "'Tis tough luck to have yer hand blowed off." "Och! Faith, it might have been worse," replied Cassidy. "Suppose Oi'd had me week's wages in it at the toime!"—Birmingham Post.

The teacher of a Sunday-school class approached one little fellow who was present for the first time and inquired his name for the purpose of placing it on the roll. "Well," said the youngster, "they call me Jimmie for short, but my maiden name is James."

"A good turkey dinner and mince pie," said a well-known after-dinner orator, "always puts us in a lethargic mood—makes us feel, in fact, like the natives of Nola Chucky. In Nola Chucky one day I said to a man: 'What is the principal occupation of this town?' 'Wall, boss,' the man answered, yawning, 'in winter they mostly sets on the east side of the house and follers the sun around to the west, and in summer they sets on the west side and follers the shade around to the east.'"—Washington Star.

A most successful pun is attributed to Charles Jerome Bonaparte. Mr. Bonaparte was presiding at a Johns Hopkins commencement dinner. A remarkably absent-minded member of the faculty was to speak. When introduced, he confessed to the audience that he had forgotten entirely that he was to make an address; he intended the night before to write out a speech, but it slipped his memory, and he went to the opera. With that he sat down. Mr. Bonaparte arose, and spoke these three words: "Opera non verba." There was a slight pause, and then a roar of laughter filled the hall.

It was at dinner, and there had been chicken for dinner. Of that fowl the little daughter of the house was particularly fond. She had partaken of it with great freedom. And then she said: "Please, I want some more chicken." "You've had all that's good for you, Margery," said her mother. "I want some more." "You can't have any more, dear. But here's the wishbone for you and mamma to pull. That will be fun. You pull on one end and mamma will pull on the other, and the one who gets the longer end will get her wish. Why, Margery! You got the big end! Now, what did you wish for?" "More chicken," said Margery. She got it, too.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

—Mrs. Archibald Mackirdy is at the head of the movement to build a woman's hotel in London. This hotel, which is primarily intended as a home for working women, is to be known as the Mackirdy House and will be opened in the near future by the Duchess of Albany. The house will be under the management of Mrs. Bramwell-Booth. It will accommodate about fifty guests when opened, but it is hoped to increase the capacity within a short while.

John's Last Letter

CHICAGO

The Divinity of Christ

is the new work on religion by EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES which bids fair to be even more generally discussed than the same author's "Psychology of Religious Experience."

It is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says:

"Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Baptist World says:

This book is interesting, among other things, in that it rejects both Trinitarianism and Unitarianism. The author says, "Each alike accepts the underlying dualism, and without questioning its validity has chosen to champion opposite extremes." He contends that the who of Jesus is not to be decided by his human birth, but by his divine relations. An insidious, strong putting of the theology in the author's local atmosphere.

The Independent says:

"Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says:

"Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says:

"These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says:

"It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

The Higher Spiritualism

Our environment is not what it seems. It is a mistake to assume that it consists of those houses and people and institutions in the midst of which our physical body happens to live. Our real environment is our ideal environment.

The world in which we truly live is the world that our thoughts dwell in. The people and things that are palpable to ourselves and which an outside observer would probably describe as our social and physical environment may, as a matter of fact, touch our life very lightly.

It is not those persons and things that people and furnish our town that constitute our enviornment, but the persons and things that people and furnish our imagination. The contents of our imagination may be drawn from the contents of our town, they are indeed likely to be so derived, but again the two may be sharply diverse. Our imagination is our real world. In that world the soul finds its most real life. Nothing takes its place as a part of our world, of our environment, until it takes its place in our imagination. The real universe is thus essentially an imagined universe.

This is not to say that the world is unreal—any thing but that. It is to show that the real world is not a geographical, a physical fact, but an ideal, a spiritual, fact. It is the soul, not the body, that is environed by the true world. The imagination is the soul's town, her universe. Things and people of the physical world and the social world enter into the soul's world by being caught and encompassed by our imagination. Of course the tendency is for those things and persons that belong to our immediate physical environment to make up the soul's environment too, but no great man or bad man or good man has his environment thrust upon him; he selects the people and furniture of his world, and they may be totally unlike those people and objects with which he is in immediate physical contact.

It is important to call our attention to the fact that what our world shall be rests with ourselves, in so far as our imagination is in the control of our will. While the prodigal son was dwelling at home he was not in vital contact with his father's world or his brother's world. His soul was reveling in imaginative visions of pleasure and luxury and money-making and swagger good fellowship in a world far away from that in which he seemed to live. What happened to him when he had spent all and came to himself, was the discovery of his father's house; it was a new world to him, this old home in which he had always lived. And he arose and entered it.

If a boy like Abraham Lincoln breaks away from the obvious environment of his home, or neighborhood or school, and comes to be the kind of man that cannot be explained by his palpable environment, it simply means that his real environment has been all the while something different from his apparent environment. He has been dwelling in the invisible. Through books or the momentary vision of a hero his imagination has been stretched beyond the boundaries of the materials given it by the senses. He has peopled his imagination with ideal persons, he sees himself living among them and his soul grows with the picture. His breaking step with his mediocre associates was because, as Thoreau would say, he heard a different drummer.

How meager a reality do so many persons in our sensuous world have for us! We think of them hardly as persons but as symbols only. The conductor is a device for collecting our fare. The butcher is a symbol of the roast we buy. The minister is just an object to be avoided!

But to the conductor's wife and the butcher's children and the minister's friends they are persons, not symbols, not means to ends, but veritable souls with a warm, throbbing inner life of their own. And the difference is that with them the conductor and the butcher and the minister dwell constantly in their imaginations while with us they do not.

And our friends, our beloved, are present vividly with us even when they are not sensibly discerned. With them we hold communion though they be far distant. When we purchase clothing it is their taste we consider. If news, good or ill, comes to us, we think at once of their interest in it. In a thousand ways they enter into our lives and communicate with us through our imagination. Our conduct is determined by their vivid presence in our soul's world.

Here is the basis for a higher spiritualism, the possibility of communion with our friends, our dear ones, who have departed from out our sense world into the unseen. We may be sure that that uncanny and coarse thing that passes under the name of spiritualism, with its dark cabinets, its table-rappings, its slate-writing, is either illusion or a fraud. More fundamental than any specious-looking evidence is the moral faith that the universe does not choose to make its supreme revelations through vulgar mediums and by clandestine methods.

But whether our dear ones still live depends, perhaps, quite as much upon us as upon the universe. The absence of their body need not take them from us. They may reappear in great moments of vision. In the crises of our life they will stand beside us and give strength to our purposes and sight to our eyes, if we will open our imagination to the invisible world. Many are the great hearts who live in the power of unseen companionship, holding fast to a love that will not let them go.

Not in crises only, but in the daily hum-drum, these souls will work by our side. If we water our memory of them, if we study their ideals, if we pick up their unfinished tasks and carry them on, we shall keep a perpetual sense of their presence.

In this way we shall find companionship in the great cloud of witnesses who watch with eager and strained interest how we run our race in the stadium below.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

Men and Religion Movement Issues

The social message of the Men and Religion Movement is attracting large attention wherever the teams go. Such social experts as Raymond Robins and Chas. Stelzle are touring the country for the Movement and their work is to call attention of the church in each community to the social questions which are specially urgent in that particular locality. In Maine they purpose making a fight against the iniquitous law on usury which permits loan sharks to locate there and do business in other states. It is said that 200,000 people in New York are now in the hands of these leaches. In Des Moines the team called attention to the lodging house conditions and as a result there was an immediate visit made by an authority to the Chicago municipal lodging house that the methods employed here might be used in Des Moines. In some cities there will be scientific surveys inaugurated to correlate all the information with reference to the city. In many cases the church will do its work by stirring up the municipality to do certain things it has hitherto neglected. In fact, it is almost an axiom that the church should not undertake any social service which it can induce the community to take up in the bigger, broader way. There will always remain, however, a multitude of worthy tasks where public sentiment is not yet ready to compel action by the municipality, where there is pioneer and experimental work to be done, and in this field the church can well enter to begin work and prove its value that the whole community may at last take it over as a community enterprise. This is to vindicate the leadership of the church in social matters, while it frees the Christian community from burdens that might become excessive as time went along.

The Phosphorus Match

We had thought when the match trust had relinquished voluntarily its right on certain patents that would enable us to manufacture matches without a certain deadly form of phosphorus, that the way was open to secure congressional action upon the matter of forbidding the dangerous chemical to be used. However, the last Congress closed without action. An incurable disease called "phossy jaw" results to the workmen in the most sanitary factories from working around the white phosphorus. The jaw-bones decay under this disease and the workman is permanently disabled. The disease is loathsome in appearance and odor. It is as bad as though the individual had contracted leprosy, save that it is not contagious. The substitute for the white phosphorus is sesqui-sulphide of phosphorus which is not poisonous. The use of this latter chemical, however, is slightly more expensive and the matches made from it are a little harder to light. It is the additional expense which prevents even the trust, which once owned the patent, from using the new material. It is proposed that Congress, under its internal revenue powers, put a prohibitive tax upon the poisonous phosphorus and thus tax this kind of match out of existence. At this coming session of Congress there will be many other interests to claim consideration, and the political maneuvering will occupy the minds of our worthy solons, so we shall have to make more than usual clamor to secure even such obviously advantageous legislation as this is. One by one the dangerous occupations should be hedged about with prohibitions so that the toll of human life shall be as light as possible, and this is the next place to strike. The demands of brotherhood and our common Christianity should lead many to write to their congressman with reference to the proposed measure.

The Cure of Crime

The treatment of the criminal after he has offended against the law is an important matter. Blackstone mentions 160 offenses that were once punishable in England by the death penalty. If these penalites were designed to be deterrent or to weed out the criminal stock, they signally failed. We do not believe that the ordinary penitentiary is much of a cure for crime since so many men return. Shall we have a death penalty? Shall we have penitentiaries? The death penalty imposes upon an executioner the task of taking human life. Perhaps in primitive society when their was no other means of preserving society, there may have been the right to take life in the name of the state. Nowadays we have many states of our union which have no death penalty and we have countries in Europe where it is not inflicted. It can be shown by statistics that the infliction of the death penalty increases murder in the community and that on the other hand the abolition of this penalty results in a decrease in percentage of homicide. We believe that the period of enforced separation from the world should be a time of education and moral improvement for the criminal. When he leaves it, it should not be in the ignorance and rebellion with which he came. If the criminal is allowed to work in prison or upon prison farms, and to have part of his earnings for his family, we furnish him with the same set of motives with which he is to begin an honest career for himself in the outer world. Then we think the chaplain of the prison might be a man of real efficiency, not some friend of a politician who had failed in other religious work and who could not hold a crowd unless they were in chains. The possible service of a prison chaplain who is socially aware and religiously fervid is beyond computation. The prisoner when he is discharged should not leave with tuberculosis, as they often do leave state prisons, but should come out with robust body, a trained hand, an ennobled mind and the grace of God in his heart. When this is the work of the penitentiaries, we shall regard them as deserving of the honorable name they have taken for themselves.

The Break-up of the Home

A well-known sociologist, whose name would be known to all our readers doubtless, said not long ago, that were he not a Christian, he could not believe that the home as an institution would survive in the cities more than two more generations. The break-up of home life is one of the most alarming facts of our modern life. Nowhere is the question more acute than in the United States which has more divorces than all Europe. Some of the forces leading to this deplorable result need to be studied. The faults of the men have already been observed. The number of divorces granted for drunkenness and unfaithfulness in husbands is a terrible indictment of American manhood.

Not so well recognized are the shortcomings of the women. Among the forces leading to easy divorce are the novel and the theater. We would not condemn these indiscriminately, for among the greatest preachers of the times are the great actors and the great novelists. But many of the novels and plays abound in hair-breadth adventures with adultery. They are full of stories of infidelity. The fallen woman is no longer killed off as in ancient fiction. In a book we drew from a public library in a respectable suburb, not long since we had three different women who found peace at last in infidelity to their husbands. Since two-thirds of the theater-goers and a much larger per cent of the novel readers are women, the relation of cause and effect is obvious.

Then there are the famous "Women of Unrest" now being studied by sociologists. It has remained for a woman, Ida Tarbell, to characterize best this kind of woman as a person tired of the business of being a woman. There has come the heresy in feminine circles that it is more blessed to be a man than a woman and many sorry women are trying to be men to the wrecking of their homes and the breaking of hearts. In fixing the responsibility and applying the remedies for the current break-up of the home let us by no means regard man as the solitary sinner. As always in history, he is neither very much better nor very much worse than the women who furnish him with his ideals.

Cigarette-Smoking Boys Not Wanted

John Wanamaker, Philadelphia, the Larkin Company, Buffalo, the Globe-Wernicke Company, manufacturers of book-cases and office furniture, Cincinnati, the mail order houses of Montgomery, Ward & Company, and Sears, Roebuck & Company, Chicago, are some of the most prominent business men who refuse to hire boys or young men under twenty-one, who are addicted to the cigarette habit. Some of these firms employ 5,000 to 8,000 people, several are so emphatic in their disapproval of cigarette smoking that they refuse to employ men of any age, young or old, who are addicted to the habit. In the Chicago post office in the special delivery department, in which nearly 300 boys are employed, there is a ban upon cigarettes and other forms of tobacco. The wholesale hardware establishment of Hibbard, Spencer & Bartlett, Chicago, the Tobey Furniture Company, and Alexander H. Revell & Company, manufacturers and retailers of furniture, Chicago, discriminate against cigarette smoking in engaging and promoting employees.

The Resignation of Dr. Sheldon

The resignation of Rev. Chas. M. Sheldon from the pastorate of Central Congregational Church, Topeka, Kan., is an event in which all Christian people will take an interest, for the author of "In His Steps" belongs not to any denomination, but to the civilized world. The letter in which he informs his congregation of his purpose to resign and his reasons therefor is a model of the simplicity and sincerity for which the Topeka pastor is universally beloved. He addresses his congregation as "Dear Friends and Fellow Disciples," and says:

I deeply regret the conditions which seem to demand at this time that I ask you to relieve me from the active duties of the pastorate of this church for the following reasons:

For twenty-five years I have served the church as minister; twenty-three of the number here in Central Church, which has now reached a place in its growth where I do not feel able to continue my service and at the same time do the work which I believe I am called upon to do in responding to calls which come to me from other parts of the kingdom out in the world, from other churches, temperance organizations, Y. M. C. A.'s, universities, labor organizations and other bodies, to bring them my message. If I could administer the detail work of this church with the help of a competent assistant and at the same time do this other work, I would not hesitate to accept the responsibility, but it is not possible for me to do effective work in both positions, and for that reason I am asking you, my people, to grant me freedom for what I believe is to be my work for the rest of my active usefulness.

I do not need to say that in taking this step I have not lost faith in the church or its supreme place in the world. I believe in the church as the greatest institution in the world. I shall always believe so, but the detailed duties and obligations of the ministry in a pastorate are so many that I dare not undertake them and the public work to which I feel that I am called.

This is not the place nor the time for me to express to this church my personal feelings toward my own people. All that I could say would not tell the story of my undying sense of obligation to all the splendid men and women who have helped to make this church what it is. The friendships and companionships that have grown up here are among the priceless possessions of my life.

Dr. Sheldon then mentions the fact that there has been no complaint or criticism and closes by saying that he will continue his services a sufficient time to enable the church to look for a successor.

To a reporter for a city paper Dr. Sheldon said that he expected to make Topeka his headquarters and home as long as he lived. He added that he had calls from various places and felt that he must answer some of them. "My writing," he continued, "has all been done under great pressure and I expect to have more time to devote to that line than heretofore. In fact I hope to do even more writing than I have done in the past."

A Discriminating View of R. J. Campbell

The United Presbyterian has the folowing to say of the successor of the famous Joseph Parker, of the London City Temple. What ever may be said of Dr. Campbell he has an unflagging interest for all classes of people. The critics have been trying to classify him, but thus far in vain. He is a law to himself, theologically, and cannot be measured by conventional standards. On this point our contemporary speaks as follows:

"It is very unfortunate that Dr. Campbell ever ventured into this realm of philosophy or of dogmatic theology. He is not built for that sort of thing. He is a preacher—a preacher with the vision and heart of a poet. In his pulpit, when dealing with the problems and heart-aches and sorrows of the people, he is masterly. And when he is not trying to discuss the metaphysics of religion, he seems instinctively to preach a sweet and tender and true gospel. We heard him several times in his pulpit in London some years ago, and the messages were simple, direct, heart-searching, and with a wonderfully appealing warmth about them. And we caught no utterance in any of these sermons that the most orthodox Calvinist could object to.

But when the man gets over to his fad of later years, when he ventures into metaphysics and the abstruse problems of our religion, when he tries to explain the mysteries of the Divine Personality and the relation of the Divine to the human, he simply loses himself and becomes inconsistent and oftentimes unintelligible.

We have recently read the report of a sermon he preached since coming to this country. In it he attempts to discuss the personality of Jesus Christ, and the relation of the human personality to the Divine. In part the sermon is about as hazy and indefinite as some of Mrs. Eddy's discussions of mind and matter and God. For the most part it is simply metaphysical moonshine. As one attempts to make his way through the mysticism, he feels as helpless as Noah's dove when she found no rest for the sole of her foot. Nothing substantial, clear-cut, or well-defined seems to emerge. It is mysticism doubly veiled.

There seem to be many indications that this great preacher is throwing less emphasis on his philosophical abstractions and is coming back to a simple heralding of the Gospel. We hope that as he speaks in this country, he will hold to his great work and let his doctrinal vagaries alone."

An Undiscriminating View of Dr. Campbell

The following from the Journal and Messenger (Baptist) is as one sided a view of a great man as the view of the United Presbyterian is comprehensive. It is an excellent illustration of that mental temper which would sweep into the discard everything which does not bear the stamp of denominational peculiarity. Dr. Campbell is neither regular nor orthodox, but he has a great message, and is showing himself a real preacher whose words are falling into perplexed and troubled hearts like rain upon the thirsty land. These different views are interesting to every man who would study the progress of the different schools of thought as revealed in the denominational weeklies. Here is the estimate which would banish Dr. Campbell from our shores:

The article in another place entitled "The Rev. R. J. Campbell on the Atonement" is by a layman in Eastern Pennsylvania, and is a just criticism of the vagaries of the Londoner. We are glad to give our friends the privilege of reading so able an article. But it has occurred to us that we are making far too much of the Englishman. The only reason for it is that he occupies a pulpit made conspicuous by the late Rev. Joseph Parker. But it is evident that Campbell is no fit successor of Parker. He is of a poetical temperament, the logical faculty having been left out of his mental mechanism. His imagination is vivid, especially when he thinks that genuine and experienced Christians will accept his contradictions. He seems to care little what he says, so he says something that the "Athenians" will snatch at and talk about. He can say one thing in one "sermon" and something quite contradictory of it in another sermon. "You pays your money and takes your choice." He keeps a ten-cent notion store and sells everything at the same price, from a wheelbarrow to a jack-in-the-box. He has come to this country for a sensation, and he will have died out before he takes ship for home. Let him go.

—The statistician of the Methodist Episcopal Church (the Northern branch of Methodism) shows that the net increase in membership for the year recently closed was less than one per cent. The total membership is now 3,518,099. The Sabbath-school enrollment is reported at 3,950,936. The Epworth League, the young people's organization, showed a decline of more than twenty thousand. A friendly writer in one of the church papers says these statistics suggest that the great army has ceased employing militant tactics and has adopted a policy of digging trenches and throwing up fortifications of a defensive sort.

—Not alone the colleges and libraries are being provided with endowments. It is stated that a lady who recently died has left the First Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., $100,000, the income from which sum is to be applied to meet requirements of the congregation's work. It is not a feeble organization, as would appear from the fact that in a decade it has received 933 members and has raised $536,141. The pastor is Dr. L. Mason Clarke. There are fine fields for similar investments elsewhere.

—St. George's Church, New York, which has had as pastors, such distinguished men as Stephen H. Tyng and Wm. S. Rainsford, has just celebrated its centennial. It has always been characterized by liberality and aggressiveness in its work and never more so than now. Once the church of the richer folk it is now more the church of the poor, although wealthy men continue their connection with it and make it the channel of gifts. It has an institutional plant. Its present rector is Doctor Birckhead.

—Dr. Hugh Black of Upper Montclair, N. J., who is a professor in Union Seminary, has consented to continue as stated supply at First Congregational church, Montclair, six months longer. He has been supplying there along with his seminary duties since before the death of Dr. Amory H. Bradford.

—Dr. and Mrs. J. Wilbur Chapman spent Christmas in this country. They leave early in the new year on an evangelistic tour around the world, beginning with an extensive campaign in Australia.

—Miss Helen M. Gould has given $10,000 toward a $150,000 Y. W. C. A. in Richmond, Va.

The Christian's Rule of Faith and Practice

To call the Bible the Christian's rule of faith and practice may be misleading. It may cause us to discredit the capacity of the soul to discern the truth. The Bible as understood by spiritually minded persons is a guide to eternal life. The Bible as understood by superstitious persons may be a hindrance to progress in Christian living. Then, we must beware of the word rule. It has in it a suggestion of legalism. Most absurd and cruel deeds have been done by sensible and kind hearted men and women because they thought they were obeying biblical injunctions.

The mind of Christ is the truth of the scriptures. It is our duty to inquire how a disciple possessing the spirit of the Master ought to understand a command or a promise. An ignorant old toper was forbidden by his physician to take more than two ounces of whiskey a day. He asked his son how much that was. The boy got out his arithmetic and reported that an ounce was sixteen drams. The old gentleman was highly pleased with the wisdom of the physician who allowed him thirty-two drinks a day. We sometimes interpret the Bible as accurately as this toper did the order of his physician.

There is no way of getting away from ourselves when we read the Bible. What we get out of it depends upon ourselves. We know that for the hearing of music and the reading of poetry the ear and the heart must be cultivated. The botanist reads the plants with an accuracy impossible for the man untrained in botany. There is no magic that enables a man who refuses to cultivate his soul in the things of righteousness and good will to appreciate the teachings of the Bible. If the Bible does teach us to be righteous and to realize God, only those who love goodness and thirst for the living God can do justice to the Bible.

The man of the One Book must also be a man of many books. What God has said to us in Holy Scripture is intended to make us wise unto salvation. We are living in a world of men and women, not in a vacuum. The saved man lives in right relations with other human beings. Now the Bible does not tell us the conditions of the present age. Its men and women lived in an environment very different from that of the United States of America in the year 1912. They needed God, as we do, and some of them found him. They can help us to find him. But we shall give a sorry exhibition of our faith if we endeavor to ignore the conditions of the present. And is not this just what is wrong with some of us? Do we know how to speak to our own hearts of the God of the Bible? Does not our language of religion often seem strange to ourselves? The fault is not with the Bible but with ourselves in that we do not relate its message to the social and intellectual movements of our day.

The inspired word is profitable for correction. This it does by showing us the kind of life we ought to live. Bishop Brooks was invited to speak to a company of intemperate men. He spoke on the manly life and made it appear so attractive that every man with a spark of sense left had a longing to live that life. Near the close of the address intemperance was mentioned as an enemy of the manly life. In our reading of the Bible we shall go astray if we put the emphasis upon its denunciations of evil. The first passages to read are those that open to men the way of eternal life. Even in reading the prophetic denunciations of oppression, the chief advantage comes from the passion for righteousness which glows in every word of condemnation. Jesus' criticism of the formalists of his day serves to emphasize spiritual values. [Midweek Service, Jan. 17. 2 Tim. 3: 14-17; Ps. 119: 97-105.] S. J.

The Meaning of Baptism

XV.—DID CHRIST COMMAND BAPTISM?

Our last article was a study of a text, the text of the so-called great commission of Jesus to his disciples which describes him as sending them forth on his authority to preach to all nations, to make disciples, to baptize them into the triune name, and to teach them to observe all his commandments. It was found that there exist many cogent reasons for regarding the words of this text, or at least that portion of it dealing with baptism and the triune name, as unauthentic. Even though the facts adduced may not fully convince the reader of the later origin of this commission, they do without doubt make it exceedingly precarious to use the literal text as a legal statute for regulating the procedure of the church in all time.

It is not the purpose of these articles to take sides in this textual controversy. No feature of our argument is at stake, whichever way scholarship may finally decide the question. If two minor features are excepted we believe that the whole commission, just as it stands, might have come from the lips of Jesus, whether it actually did or not. These two features are (1) the trinitarian formula, which, as has already been said, is entirely foreign to the mouth of Christ and the speech of the apostolic age, and (2) the dramatic and unreal tone of voice in which Jesus is made to speak, asserting his possession of "all authority in heaven and on earth" and assuming thus the attitude of an earthly potentate. This aspect of the picture entirely lacks verisimilitude to those who have discerned that Jesus always asserts his authority through the reason and the conscience of men. Compared with his usual attitude the appeal to legal superiority is an unreal and weakly pose.

But neither of these considerations affects our inquiry. Whether the two exceptions are valid or not, the meaning of baptism is the same. Not only so, but the relation of the will of Christ to baptism is the same. Indeed if we concede for the sake of the argument that criticism has effectually invalidated the whole of Matt. 28: 18-20, this will not in the least affect the essential facts to which this text refers. Nothing could be more premature than the triumphant announcement that, because Matthew's text of the commission is proved unauthentic, therefore baptism was no part of the will of Christ and of his program for the future. To this superficial way of thinking we would reply that baptism was, must have been, a part of the divine plan. If it had not been explicitly formulated by the Master it would have been invented by his disciples.

Apart from all legal authorization, it would have been impossible for them to carry out the manifest will of their Lord and the burning passion of their souls without baptism. There is nothing strange at all in the presence on the lips of Christ of an injunction to administer baptism. It would have been strange had he taken counsel with his disciples concerning the carrying of his gospel into the world and omitted to say anything at all about inducting their converts into a communal life.

The reasons certain readers stumble at the authorization of baptism by our Lord are two. In the first place, it is pointed out that Jesus himself did not baptize during his ministry. In the opening weeks of his public life his disciples did baptize, thus continuing and extending the as yet unfinished work of John, but it is probable that the practice was soon discontinued. No allusion is made to the rite again. If baptism was a part of the ministry of Jesus it would in all likelihood have been referred to in his commission to the seventy (Luke 10: 3-16). Manifestly, baptism was not a significant part of his pre-resurrection ministry. Hence it seems difficult to explain the prominent place given to the rite in Christ's final program.

The second reason for this difficulty is that baptism is conceived as a mere sacrament, a detached institution with its meaning in itself, and assumed to produce by its intrinsic virtue a beneficent effect upon the soul of him who submits to it. Or, if it is not conceived in this way it is regarded as a mere physical act of immersion in water performed in obedience to an assumed divine command.

Those who stumble at baptism in Christ's final program cannot believe that he would have fixed upon his followers an ordinance with either of these meanings. His whole ministry was directed against the sacramentarianism of the first conception above. And the imputation to him of an arbitrary command to perform a sheer physical act in his name is morally repugnant. We have seen in these articles, however, that both of these conceptions of baptism are false, that baptism is neither an independent sacrament nor a physical act, but an auxiliary rite in a religious order, performing the service of initiation into the order. When we hear the word on the lips of Christ, therefore, we must consider whether in this its true meaning it is incongruous with the spirit of his ministry. That it is not incongruous, but perfectly natural, even inevitable, it is our purpose to show.

As to the first named difficulty above, that of the silence of Jesus on baptism prior to his final leave-taking, it will, we think, be made clear that that silence was perfectly consistent with the later express injunction.

We prefer, therefore, to take the essential content of Matthew's commission as it stands, regarding its subject-matter as every way credible, even though scholars may trace the authorship of this particular grouping of words to tradition working upon the text long after the gospel itself was written. Each main item of the commission as it stands is congruous with the highest conception of the ministry of Christ, and if these precise words were not spoken by him there can be no reasonable doubt, in the light of subsequent events, that he did impart to his followers their essential meaning. We find no greater difficulty in believing that it was the expressed will of Christ that his disciples should baptize than that they should go into all the world, and make disciples, and teach them to observe his commandments. Baptism, taken in its true sense, as a social ceremony of induction, as the conferment of a community status upon a candidate, or more concretely, as the church defining itself in the social order, belongs by logical and moral right in the program of Jesus. We need not hesitate to affirm, therefore, quite apart from what criticism may do to certain texts, that it is backed by his authority.

Christ's mission is described by himself in the words, "I am come that they might have life and that they might have it more abundantly." At the outset of his public ministry he resisted three great temptations that would have deflected him from this divine program of giving life to mankind. With marvelous consistency he kept the spiritual, inward, vital character of his ministry constantly before him. Popularity with the multitudes did not deceive him. They were following him, he discerned, from motives of curiosity or of greed, "because of the loaves and fishes," and not because they grasped his message or cared for it. He might have promoted an organizing propaganda among the people with enormous success. He could have established a religious order, a cult, or a church. John's success proves this, and at the first, while Jesus was yet in the position of a disciple of John and preaching John's message, he made more disciples than the Baptist himself.

But Jesus refused every suggestion to draw men together in an organized community under his leadership. He escaped from the multitude when they would have made him king. He saw clearly that he could promote or allow organization only at the expense of the revelation he had come to make, at the expense of the redemption he had come to mediate. The life, he perceived, must precede organization. It was his task therefore to impart life, to sacrifice numerical and organizational success to the sure planting of the divine life in the souls of men. He may have cherished at the first the hope of imparting this life to the multitude. But when they betrayed their crass motives he deliberately tested their fealty with a "hard saying." And as the people forsook him he turned to the twelve with disillusionment and pathos in his look and asked if they also intended to go away. His searching question brought an answer from their leader which bound them to him with renewed devotion, "To whom shall we go, Thou only hast the words of eternal life."

He did not wish to draw masses of men into an organization, into a religious community, by principles of social contagion or accretion. The key to his life's success was in getting individuals, as such, to see, to understand his message, and to possess the power of his own divine life. The crowd followed him by the constraints of social psychology. But Jesus wanted the inward, independent, moral loyalty of individual men. Here at least, in these twelve men, were signs of discernment, of spiritual vitality. He determined, therefore, to devote himself to this small group of men, to get them to understand him, to impart to them his life. He must create a lump of leaven, ever so small, to fold into the dough of human society. It will leaven the world, he sees. But if he starts an organization before he has effectually imparted the life men will be engaged by the mechanism of the kingdom and miss the power thereof. If, on the other hand, he makes sure of imparting the life, the organization will take care of itself. The life will provide itself a body by natural law and divine grace.

Here, then, we have a point of view from which, if we look out over Christ's ministry, we shall see plainly why his teaching activity contains no use of baptism or allusion to it, and why at the last he makes it an integral and prominent part of the program his disciples are to carry out in the world. The absence of baptism from his three years' ministry is explained by the absence of organization. Where there was no organizing activity or purpose there could not be any baptism. For these three years Jesus had been sowing seed in individual hearts. He asked for no public committal. He kept his little company perfectly informal. They were his friends, his disciples, that was all. The only evidence of organization that we can find is Judas' treasurership. Christ was working upon these individual souls. He had no expectation now of converting the multitude. He never drew the net, but went on teaching his disciples from day to day, living his own life intimately before them, using the multitude with their diseases and distresses and sins as a sort of clinic from which these few might learn the secret of his own divine inner life.

This marks a striking point of difference between Jesus and John. The latter led a movement. He was called "the Baptist" because he commanded that all men should be baptized, that is, initiated into his order of penitent men. But his order was premature. He did not impart to men the permanent power of penitence. He did not give men the abundant life. He demanded a harvest without sowing the seed. He was impatient, peremptory. Therefore his order was temporary; therefore, he must decrease while Jesus increases. John's was the short-sighted vision. Jesus' was the long look ahead. He saw the importance of imparting the life before organizing the church. And this made him the Savior.

But when the roots of divine life and grace were fairly planted in the soil of these human souls that had companied with Jesus throughout his public ministry, then he was ready for the church. They must go out and carry to the world the life that he has imparted to them. But they must have organization. They are many; he is one. He, being alone, could work with them by a relationship purely individualistic. They, being many, can work with others only by following the laws of social order. They too must impart the life—"make disciples of all nations." But in addition they must draw men together in a freemasonry of love on the basis of the new life they possess in common—"baptizing them." It is not enough to impart the life. They who receive the life must be unified in a social community for purposes of power and fellowship. Only thus can the life be conserved. Left to isolated individuals the life would eventually be lost, dissipated, or corrupted. Therefore when a disciple is made let him be inducted into the community of believers, let the social status of a Christian be conferred upon him.

In this way would the Christian community define itself in the social order, becoming a haven of comfort and inspiration and instruction for its members, and a definite and calculable force to hurl against unrighteousness in the world. All this is involved in the command of Jesus to baptize. If, holding Matthew's commissions in abeyance, it be said that we have no evidence that Jesus commanded baptism, then it must be said that the sheer, spontaneous, uncommanded impulse of the disciples to impart the life to others which they had received from their Master would inevitably involve the practice of baptism. Social law is sufficient to account for baptism without Christ's authoritative mandate. But given the social necessity of baptism in the fulfillment of the spiritual purposes of the disciples it seems not unreasonable to assume that Christ had anticipated their experience by defining for them their program.

In this view of the vision and purpose of our Lord in his parting conversations with his disciples, it becomes almost profane to suggest that he commanded them to immerse their converts in water! Such a command could have no conceivable relevancy to anything that had gone before or was to follow. It is totally foreign to the speech and spirit of our Saviour and unworthy of him. He had no intention of fixing a physical act upon his followers. He did not have in mind the form of baptism but the meaning of it. To put immersion into his mouth here, before his ascension, is to break down his exalted ethical and spiritual consistency, and to break it at the climax of his life. That any other form except immersion for the administration of baptism had occurred to Jesus or to his disciples, is highly unlikely, but all the evidence, both as to the meaning of the word "baptize" in its scripture usage and the interpretation of this occasion on which our Lord is assumed to have used it, makes the immersionistic construction of the Master's command impossible.

Finally, we have reached a point where we are able to see the fruitlessness of the question whether or not Christ instituted Christian baptism. This problem engages the commentators at great length. It is, however, a fictitious problem. Jesus plainly did not institute baptism. The Jewish rabbis practiced it. John used it. It was the same baptism all the way along. The baptism of John was the same as the baptism the rabbis used in the case of proselytes. The baptism authorized by Jesus and practiced by the apostles was precisely the same, as baptism, as that of John and the rabbis. The differences among these baptisms were differences in the order the candidate was baptized into. In the rabbis' baptism the candidate was initiated into Judaism. In John's baptism he was initiated into discipleship to the Baptist. In Christian baptism the candidate was initiated into the church of Christ, the body of Christ or, as Paul likes to say, into Christ himself. But as baptism these ceremonies are identical. Later on, as we shall see, a distinctive symbolism grew up around Christian baptism, which stamped it with the great facts of Christianity, but its essential character remained the same, though much enriched and beautified by the meanings imaginatively imputed to it.

Who is Responsible?

The church at Berkeley, Calif., is experiencing some inward strain in its attempt to practice the plea for unity to which it and all Disciples of Christ are committed. The newspapers of the Pacific Coast have been reporting the situation as a much more serious division of sentiment than actually prevails. The pastor, Rev H. J. Loken, voluntarily resigned his lectureship in the Bible College connected with the State University there, in order that the school might not be embarrassed on account of the step the church wishes to take.

We are not in possession of facts more authentic than those appearing in the daily press. It seems, however, that the sentiment for the practice of Christian union has been for some time growing in this congregation. Mr. Loken, the pastor, who is known as one of the most competent and consecrated ministers on the Coast, has assumed no active leadership of this sentiment, but, cherishing the ideals of Thomas Campbell for a united church, he found much satisfaction in the decision to which he saw his people moving. Whether the forward movement in the congregation will be opposed by a minority to the point of division, we are not in a position to say.

A church should think long and prayerfully before it takes a step that means the dividing of its forces. As a rule the unity and peace of the local congregation is to be preferred above any other duty. There are even among Disciples, sad to say, those who are not willing to practice Christian union. How a congregation wishing devoutly to obey Christ in his expressed will for the unity of his followers, shall determine its course when there are some who do not see with the majority it is not for us, but for each congregation, to decide for itself.

That there will be strain and trouble in some instances it is safe to predict. But it does not follow that those who in a Christian spirit plead for a more Christian practice are responsible for division if it occurs. The Christian Evangelist overlooks the plainest principles of progress as well as historical precedents and its own example in an editorial criticism of Mr. Loken in its issue of December 21. Rather than argue the case with our St. Louis neighbor, we are printing its criticism and folowing it with a quotation from a contemporary Disciple organ and adding four quotations from organs of long ago, one of them very ancient.

December, 21, 1911.

The seed-sowing by our Chicago contemporary, the "Christian Century," is beginning to bear fruit in a divisive movement in the Christian church at Berkeley, Cal., according to a report in the San Francisco "Examiner." The pastor of the church, it is stated, has declared himself in favor of departing from our practice in insisting upon immersion as a condition of church membership. Of course a part of the church opposes this new departure and division will be the inevitable result of this theory of promoting union. . . . . One who has not learned that this was one of the theories and practices abandoned by the leaders in this Reformation in order to inaugurate the movement which has made its influence felt in the world, needs to study our history a little more carefully. These half-baked attempts of young men to "reform the reformation" by abandoning its principles, have been before, and will be, but happily they are short-lived.

The seed-sowing of our St. Louis contemporary, the "Christian Evangelist," is beginning to bear fruit in a divisive movement that threatens the unity, not of single congregations only, but of the entire Disciples' brotherhood. That paper, it is well known, has declared itself in favor of departing from our traditional practice in two important particulars. It advocates Federation with other religious bodies and a representative delegate convention for ourselves. Of course a part of the brotherhood opposes these new departures and, led by the Christian Standard whose commercial interests are at stake in the delegate convention proposal, division will be the inevitable result of this theory of promoting union. One who has not learned that these two practices were abandoned by the leaders in this Reformation in order to inaugurate the movement which has made its influence felt in the world, needs to study our history a little more carefully. These half-baked attempts to "reform the reformation" by abandoning its principles, have been before, and will be, but happily they are short-lived.

The seed-sowing by our Cincinnati contemporary, the "Christian Standard," is beginning to bear fruit in a divisive movement in many churches, especially in Kentucky and Tennessee, according to reliable reports continually reaching us. The pastors of a number of churches, it is stated, have declared themselves in favor of departing from our practice of singing in public worship without instruments and in conducting our mission work as independent congregations. They are actually introducing organs and banding their congregations together in a missionary society. Of course there is always a part of each congregation that opposes this new departure and division will be the inevitable result of this theory of promoting union. Isaac Errett should know that these human inventions were abandoned by the leaders of this Reformation in order to inaugurate the movement which has made its influence felt in the world. He should study our history a little more carefully. These half-baked attempts of young men like the editor of the Standard, to reform the reformation, have been before, and will be, but happily they are short-lived.

The seed-sowing by our Bethany, Va., contemporary, the "Christian Baptist," is beginning to bear fruit in a divisive movement in Baptist churches in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky and other states, according to reports coming to us from a hundred sources. The pastors of many churches, it is stated, have declared in favor of departing from our practice in insisting upon subscribing to a human creed and wearing a human name, and in teaching a view of baptism which we cannot tolerate. They also teach that the church should be united. Of course a part of the membership of the churches opposes this new departure, and division in many churches will be the inevitable result of this theory of promoting union. Alexander Campbell needs to study our history a little more carefully. These half-baked attempts of young men like the editor of the "Christian Baptist," to reform the Baptist church by abandoning its principles, have been before, and will be, but happily they are short-lived.

The seed-sowing by Rev. Thomas Campbell of the Presbytery of Chartiers in Western Pennsylvania, is beginning to bear fruit in a divisive movement in the Brush Run church, according to reports now reaching us. Mr. Campbell, it is stated, has declared himself in favor of departing from our practice in insisting upon receiving at the communion table only those who are our particular kind of Presbyterians and has, it is further reported, issued a statement which he and his supporters call a "Declaration and Address," in which a united church is set up as the goal and ideal of the Church of Christ. Of course a part of the church opposes this new departure and division will be the inevitable result of this theory of promoting union. Rev. Thomas Campbell needs to study our history more carefully. These half-baked attempts of young men to reform the Presbyterian church by abandoning its principles have been before, and will be, but happily they are short-lived.

FROM THE JERUSALEM JOURNAL
A. D. 60.

The seed-sowing by our misguided brother, Paul of Tarsus, is beginning to bear fruit in a divisive movement in the churches in Asia Minor and Greece, according to reports reaching us from members of the Jerusalem church who have been visiting in the North. Paul, it is stated, has declared himself in favor of departing from our practice in insisting upon circumcision as a condition of church membership. Of course a certain part of all the churches opposes this new departure and division will be the inevitable result of this theory of promoting union with uncircumcised Christians. Paul needs to study our history a little more carefully. Such a half-baked attempt of a young man to reform the faith once for all delivered to the real apostles by abandoning its principles, has never been before, and probably never will be again and happily this one will be short-lived.

Come in Dr. Powell, the Fellowship's Fine!

The Christian Standard is making heretics at the rate of one or two a week. The latest judgment handed down from this self-appointed court of orthodoxy, condemns Dr. E. L. Powell, of First Church, Louisville, for a quarter century the most prominent pulpiteer among Disciples. Dr. Powell's offense consisted in having a Unitarian minister, a Jewish rabbi, and Col. Henry Watterson, the nationally famed editor, participate in one of the services of dedication of the new temple of worship in which the national conventions of the Disciples are to be held next October.

Concerning the Unitarian and the rabbi, the Standard gives its "hearty assent" to a statement of an organ of the anti-missionary society Disciples, which it quotes as follows:

> Think of dedicating a house to Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God, and having a man assist in the ceremony who rejects Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God! So far as accountability to man is concerned, it is unquestionably the right of Dr. Powell and his church to go in this direction if they want to; but as they advertise themselves as a Christian church and ask the public to follow them, the public has the right to know where they stand and which way they lead.

The speech by the famous editor of the Courier-Journal contains nothing more heinous than broad humanitarian sentiments and tolerance toward different beliefs, commonplaces in the best thinking of our time, and stated in Mr. Watterson's best style. He introduced himself by saying he was "born in the Presbyterian church, baptized in the Roman Catholic church, educated in the Church of England in America, and married into the church of the Disciples." A good-natured bit of autobiography, frankly recited by Mr. Watterson, seems especially to have aroused our Cincinnati neighbor:

> Whilst I was yet too young to understand, I witnessed an old-fashioned baptism of the countryside. A person who had borne a very bad character in the neighborhood was being immersed. Some one, more humorous than reverent, standing near me, said, as the man came to the surface, "There go his sins, men and brethren, there go his sins;" and having but poor eyes I thought I saw them passing down the stream never to trouble him, or anybody, any more. I can see them still floating, floating down the stream out and away from the sight of men. Does this make me a good Baptist, I wonder? I fear not, I fear not, because I am unable to rid myself of the impression that there are many roads leading to heaven, and I have never believed in what is called "close communion." I have not hated and am unable to hate any man because in religious opinion he differs from me and insists upon worshiping his Creator according to his conscience. I suppose I must have been born an insurrecto. Pursuing the story of the Dark Ages when men were burned at the stake for the heresy of refusing to bow to the will of the majority, it is not the voice of the Protestant, or the Catholic, that issues from the flames and reaches my heart, but the cry of the suffering man—my brother. To me a saint is a saint whether or not he wears wooden shoes or goes barefoot, whether he gets his baptism silently out of a font of consecrated water or comes dripping from the depths of the nearest brook, shouting, "Glory, hallelujah!"

Concerning this address Doctor Powell expressed himself at its close as follows:

> It is in strict accord with the great utterance of the Master: "You shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." This is the highest note of real Protestantism—individual liberty, subject only to divine authority, as that authority may be interpreted by the individual soul. I have not been more stirred in years, not only because the speaker is a distinguished man and my friend, but because of the everlasting truth of this message. That is my understanding of the religion of Jesus Christ.

And so the Standard brands with anathema the Louisville preacher on the ground that he has compromised with "opposers of the faith as it is in Christ!" The great and rapidly increasing company of those who rest under the ban of this interesting newspaper unite in extending to the distinguished recruit a hearty welcome.

Remarkable Feat for the Old Ship

In an editorial which starts out "to call attention to the ruinous work that is going on here and there as a result of the Chicago propaganda," the Christian Standard declares that it is too late in the day to discuss the question of authorship of the gospels; that the battle has been won "for truth and righteousness"; that only "small-bore guns" are heard now in this battle and they only "occasionally"; that to refer to Doctor Willett as an authority in these matters is "really amusing," he being only "an echo of German rationalism," and his "admirers," knowing absolutely nothing of themselves, are able only to "re-echo the echo." The article waxes eloquent and reaches this superb climax:

> "The good ship Zion had to sail between the Scylla of open and avowed infidelity and the Charybdis of partially latent skepticism upon her own decks, but she has about weathered the storm, and is entering the waters of the peaceful and calm sea of faith, with her prow toward the quiet haven of triumph."

This sentence, from one who has settled all the problems of dates and authorship for himself and his brethren is destined to take its place beside that classic exclamation of the famous congressional orator: "I smell a rat, I see it floating in the air; and I propose to nip it in the bud." What lucidity its author could bring to the discussion of critical questions, what breadth of view, what profound erudition! The ship of Zion has performed many remarkable feats in her long and perilous voyage, but never anything to be compared with her passage between Scylla and Charybdis, with Charybdis on her deck! By what process that historic whirlpool was derricked from the age-long fastness of its depths to the deck of the old ship of Zion, must be left in mystery with those other processes by which our editor has settled for all time the problems of biblical scholarship.

And be it further observed that this marvellous passage was made in a storm! Was it faith or folly that bade the faithful throw prudence to the winds, and risk such a passage in a storm? But what boots it now! The grand old ship weathered the storm, keeping Charybdis seeurely on her deck meanwhile, thus reducing the external dangers one half, and "is entering the waters of the peaceful and calm sea of faith." All's well that ends well. Hooray for the old ship! It is good to note that her prow is toward the haven of triumph, for were there any possibility of the old ship's coming in stern first, her friends would feel deeply embarrassed, while scholarship and its horrid crew would enjoy the discomfiture of the faithful.

But be not discouraged, dear brethren; the worst is past. Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter:

> "Some of our internal foes have jumped overboard, and some are still clinging to her sides, but they have done their worst, and the danger is getting less and less."

No wonder the passengers leaped overboard, or hung to the rail. With a deadly whirlpool on deck, can we blame poor human nature if it seeks safety in flight, or makes choice of a less grisly death? We presume the faithful prolonged their days by taking to the rigging. Had we been conscious of such dangers to the old ship, we would have chosen the main-truck as our station during the entire voyage. With its great work of restoring apostolic Christianity, the Standard should get Charybdis off the deck of the old ship and restore it to its proper place. Dallying with mythological whirlpools is not as dangerous as dallying with questions of dates and authorship, especially when an editor shows himself as unfamiliar with one as with the other, but it is far more embarrassing.

By the side of this learned editor, Doctor Willett is a mere echo! If our brethren of all the denominations ever learn that the Disciples have in their exclusive possession a man who can import the far-famed Charybdis upon the deck of the old ship of Zion, and then with a master hand can guide, or help to guide, the heaving craft between Scylla and Charybdis, while the latter slumbers upon her own deck, he will be in great demand by all schools as an authority upon any question which has vexed the mind of man from the dawn of creation down to the present time. We hope that our brethren will see to it that such a valuable man will not be permitted to escape.

Editorial Table Talk

A Characteristic Controversy Over Words

On what slight grounds Disciple newspapers can be provoked into a controversy is again illustrated by our Cincinnati and St. Louis contemporaries. The Standard has been exploiting a circulation scheme under the guise of a "Light-Bearing Church" campaign. A "light bearing church" is defined as a church that attains a certain standard in its Sunday-school, its church attendance, its officiary, its missionary giving, etc. The Christian Evangelist is exploiting precisely the same things, but under the title "Front Rank Church." Recently the Standard gravely characterized the Front Rank idea as containing unscriptural implications. "Let your front rank shine," is not in the scripture, it said, but "let your light shine!"

The following week The Christian Evangelist made earnest charges against The Standard for refusing to coöperate with the organzed Sunday-school work of the Disciples on the sole ground that the latter paper did not promote the "Front Rank" standard! Paul's counsel to Timothy to "hold fast, the form of sound words," has been much used as a preaching text by Disciple ministers. Perhaps the totally unwarranted interpretation often given it is ressponsible for creating in certain minds a sort of idolatry of the letter, whether of scripture or some other formula. Here, at any rate, is a typical instance of debate and ill-feeling over mere words when the meaning of the words is precisely the same. It is a characteristic controversy.

Meanwhile thoughtful and earnest people are wondering whether all this use of the newspapers for the exploitation of "Front Rank" activities is wholesome. They are wondering if it does not carry over into the sacred field of religious education the same corrupting influences of which our evangelism is today a victim.

One Day in Seven

There will never be a very vital contact between the church and the laboring classes so long as we have a twelve hour day and a seven day week. Any one working on this schedule is exhausting the vital powers to such an extent that he has little or nothing to give to the higher life of the community. Pastors in industrial centers will invariably bear this testimony. We seem to have more immediate prospects of securing a ten hour day than a six-day week. Some industries are very difficult to manage upon a six-day week for the whole force, as for instance the steel industry, or the street railway service or many other enterprises that we might mention.

Our present laws were passed in defense of the Lord's day. They have served a useful purpose in the past, when industry was chiefly agricultural and labor might go forward upon the basis of rest on the Lord's day. Now that labor is coming to be increasingly factory labor and urban labor, there is reason to believe that we need new legislation. We need laws that will prohibit the employment of a man for over six days a week. The working force of a factory might not all rest on any given Sunday, but if all rested one day in seven they would live in the spirit of the sabbath legislation of the past if not according to the letter, and should pay such honor to ancient standards as is possible under modern conditions.

It seems a bit absurd that we have laws in most states to regulate Sunday baseball games and none that are efficiently regulating the rest day of the toilers. As soon as we establish the rest day, all the interests of the higher life will take a move up. The man who is not able to attend church every Sunday will at least have energy and inclination to utilize other opportunities to cultivate life in its more ideal phases.

—In harmony with the principle of making as much as possible of the points of agreement between oneself and those with whom one differs, we wish to join hands with The Christian Standard in its exposure of the fallacies of the so-called "membersip in the congregation" or "associate membership" plan. If our neighbor runs out of arguments it can find some good ammunition in the files of The Christian Century of a year or more ago. This paper is not able to conceive of any reason why any person, a member of the Church of Christ, who applies for fellowship with a congregation of Disciples, should be shunted off into an unscriptural annex especially devised for unimmersed people! It is like keeping a member of the family in the wood-shed.

—It is reported that remarkable progress has been made during the year just closing in efforts to regulate child labor. In a number of states there has been legislation, which should result in protecting youth from moral peril as well as physical overstrain and consequent stunting. In eight states laws have been passed forbidding using boys in messenger service at night in cities. In ten states hours of labor for children have been shortened; in five regulations of street trading have been adopted. In six states children under sixteen have been forbidden all night work. It is to be hoped that all these safguards may result in great good to the classes effected.

—That the new day of an educated ministry among the Disciples has fully dawned is evidenced by the large number of our young men now attending higher institutions of learning. In the University of Chicago the Disciples have long held second place to the Baptists. Now comes the report that they are running almost "neck and neck" with the Congregationalists in Yale. Out of 101 students registered, there are twenty-seven Congregationalists, twenty-five Disciples, twenty-four Methodists, eleven Baptists, five Presbyterians while nearly a dozen other denominations are represented among the divinity students.

—Four teams entered the field for the Men and Religion Movement when the second part of the campaign started on January 8. The week just ended has been given up to conferences of members of the teams themselves, when mistakes of the fall campaign in the west have been gone over, and new methods evolved from them. The four conventions to be held immediately are those of Portland, Providence, Springfield and Worcester, and these are to be followed on the succeeding week by the conventions in Boston, Hartford and Rochester. For the Boston meeting two teams are to be engaged.

—"The delicate form, the nimbus of white hair, the youthful face, the luminous, intent eyes, the seerlike countenance, the gently modulated voice, the finely phrasd sentences and prophetic thought, the attitude of one uttering communings from above himself, left an impression which disarmed crticism, commanded esteem and won ardent friendship"—these are the items in the summary of a Peoria, Ill., reporter's estimate of Rev. R. J. Campbell, who recently spoke in that city.

—The energy with which our Cincinnati neighbor goes about excommunicating the brethren from the "Restoration movement" is paralleled only by that Scotch church which began turning its members out for heresy until there were only two left. One of them on being asked concerning the state of religion in his community, replied: "There are nae Christians here except mysel' and Sandy, and I hae ma doots aboot Sandy!"

—The Christian Standard's anathema has gotten to be the most entertaining joke now extant in Disciple circles. When men like E. L. Powell are gravely excommunicated some of the rest of us who have taken our own plight with due seriousness and humility feel like lifting up our heads again!

—Since the first of January this year automobiles in Greater New York have been held responsible for the death of eighty-nine persons and the serious injury of 855 more.

—One thousand students of the University of Notre Dame, Indiana, ended a week of prayer with a pledge of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors.

A Modern Temple of Literature

The New Public Library Building of New York

BY ARTHUR T. FOWLER

An event of more than local and even national interest has been the dedication of the New York Public Library. One of our leading reviews characterizes it as "the greatest library event in library history measured by material standards." The library is located upon the site of the old Croton Reservoir, on Fifth Ave., which for years was familiar not only to New Yorkers, but also to visitors in the metropolis. Here stands this magnificent and beautiful edifice surrounded by the tall buildings of commerce, swept by the surging tides of humanity and business traffic; its long, solid facade and marble whiteness proclaim a new note in the life of this city and nation. The most casual observer cannot but feel a sense of civic pride to know, when today so much is made of the dark side of our city life, that it is possible to carry forward to complete success an institution, which stands as a most remarkable, disinterested effort in the cause of philanthropy.

The New Library Building, New York City.

The Tilden Fortune.

The task of combining the resources of the Astor and Lenox libraries and the Tilden Foundation, and building up one great library on Manhattan began to take form soon after the death, in 1886, of Samuel J. Tilden, who left the bulk of his large fortune to the city of New York in trust without restrictions for educational purposes. There were many difficulties to be overcome both legal and traditional, but the boldness of the conception and the largeness of the undertaking insured success where a less formidable plan would have failed. Of course there are other libraries in the city, such as the library of the Historical Society, the Hispanic Society, and the library of Columbia University, all worthily housed.

In 1895 the union of the Astor, Lenox, and Tilden foundations was completed and incorporated under the name of New York Public Library. In 1897 the city gave the site upon the condition that it should be kept open in the evenings as well as in the daytime, and on Sundays and holidays. In June, 1899, work was begun with the removal of the old reservoir, and the spring of 1900 saw the new foundation going in, and in November, 1902, Hon. Seth Low, then mayor of New York, laid the corner-stone. Except for some sculpture and minor decoration the present time sees the building completed.

Massive Proportions.

To estimate the grandeur, the massive proportions and æsthetic qualities of this splendid building it must be seen. Even to depict it adequately is difficult, so skilfully has utility been blended with the æsthetic. It is a rectangular structure with two interior courts and four main floors, exclusive of the cellar. It fronts on Fifth Ave., 390 feet long and 270 feet deep. It covers an area 115,000 square feet. It cost over $8,000,000, exclusive of the site. There are more than 200 rooms and halls. The main reading-room, which is the crowning glory of the building, 295 feet long and seventy-five feet wide, and fifty feet high with ceilings painted to represent the cloud-drifted sky, is the largest reading-room in the world. Underneath this is the main stack-room, divided into seven floors and fitted with sixty-three miles of shelves, with a capacity for holding 2,700,000 books. Other book-rooms have a capacity of about 800,000 more, making the library, as it stands, the home of approximately 3,500,000 volumes. Some one has estimated that the shelves would extend, when placed end to end, from New York to Philadelphia. The whole is fireproof, as far as metal and stone will allow, even the book-shelves being bronze.

The Entrance.

As one appraches the main entrance he is impressed with the sculptured lions designed by E. C. Potter, and by a series of easy steps is brought to the front vestibule and under three massive arches which form the entrance. Above this entrance are seen the three inscriptions commemorating the names of the founders. On both sides of the entrance are niches in which sculptured fountains by Frederic MacMonnies are to stand, which will represent "Beauty Overcoming Ugliness" and "Truth Overcoming Falsehood." There will be sculptured groups in the pediments of the pavilions at the north and south corners to represent "Art" and "Science." On the attic sculptured work and at the ends single figures of heroic size will represent "History and Philosophy," "Drama and Poetry," and "Religion" and "Romance."

On entering the building the impression of richness and dignity is deepened, as the visitor stands in the long hall finished in white marble, with its vaulted ceiling of the same material and simple decoration. Upon this first floor are administrative offices, special reading-rooms and galleries. In the basement are the facilities for the circulating library and the great mechanical plant which furnishes the light, heat and power.

Beauty of the Building.

The building has to be studied in order to appreciate its beauty, especially if one expects to find variety or warmth of color. There is variety of color, but it is characterized by refinement, the result of technical and painstaking skill. Here it stands out in contrast to the Library of Congress, in its absence of that which seems like an approach almost to gaudiness. It is a building the beauty of which grows upon one as it is studied. Many of its notable features must be pointed out before they are really observed. For example, every layer of stone runs level throughout the building, dividing walls, pillars and piers both inside and out of the building. Such a plan involved the minutest calculation. The marble vaulting of the main hallway called for a use of steel and stone adjusted with such nicety that the masonry alone would bear the strain put upon it, making it one of the finest examples of barrel vaulting in the world.

Volumes of Specifications.

The plan of unifying the various parts of the work under one executive officer for securing harmony and economy was most effective. On an expenditure of $3,000,000 for the interior work, there was only a charge, it is said, of less than $600 for mistakes. That every detail had to be foreseen and planned for is one of the marvels of modern structural engineering, and it is no wonder that it involved upward of 12,000 pages of specifications.

It is impossible in a short article to attempt a description of the interior of such a building. All of the rooms are planned and treated so that each one is a constant surprise to the visitor. From the brilliantly-lighted dome and painted ceiling over the main stairway, to the smallest piece of molding, there are dignity and charm combined with simplicity.

Decorations.

The color scheme has been carefully planned as to light effects. It is based upon ancient conceptions wrought out with modern impulse and feeling. The climax is reached in the ceiling of the reading-room where a bold color design in gold, blue and red has been worked out, suggestive, it is said, of the ceiling in the Basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore in Rome. The walls of this room are as yet undecorated, but will ultimately have painted upon them illuminated maps after the manner of the ancient Venetians.

What has been said of the color work is also true of the sculpture. It is a contribution of some of the best modern sculptors, based on classical models yet modern in feeling and execution. To some there comes the impression of the classical, or the academic, upon others the opposite effect is produced. This is illustrated when one sees the marble vases on each side of the entrance with their graceful lines, yet each fulfilling a purpose. It is here that is seen the philosophy of modern architectural style—usefulness and beauty.

The Soul of the Building.

To the thoughtful observer, however, there is another consideration, and that is the institution of which this building is to be the home. The architectural charm, richness of decoration and delicate tracery have their place, but the real value is in the library itself and the intellectual enrichment and moral inspiration coming to those who use it. When we think of the thousands who use the reading-rooms, and not only these volumes but the 100,000 in the district libraries every day, we see something of the vast influence which this institution may have in the intellectual and moral uplift of a great city. This was expressed in the words of President Taft at the opening ceremonies when he said: "It is not in the number of pamphlets, or manuscripts that this library stands out first in the world, for I believe, considered from that standpoint, it is only the sixth or seventh greatest collection; but it is in the facility of circulation and in the immense number of books that are distributed each year for use to the citizens and residents of New York and vicinity that this library easily takes the first rank."

Rare Treasures.

This account would be incomplete without a brief reference to the many rare treasures which find a home in this building. The Lenox Library, celebrated for its rare collection of Americana, contains copies of every book obtainable prior to 1700 bearing on the New World. To these have been added George Bancroft's famous historical library and the noted Emmett papers relating to the American Revolution. The files of newspapers form in themselves a rare collection, and begin with the year 1710. While some of the earlier files are fragmentary, yet there are no fewer than 1,000 volumes of papers published prior to 1800.

Besides these valuable possessions which deal with the early history of America, this library contains many rare books and folios and many collections, among which are some 3,000 volumes of Shakespeariana. There are 10,000 volumes of music, 8,000 volumes of Bible collections, and a marvelous collection of geographical material of 21,000 volumes, with many thousand maps from the earliest times to the end of the seventeenth century.

IN LINE OF PROMOTION

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON

In the United States navy the death or retirement of an officer moves the whole row up one notch. The man next below takes the vacant place and every one moves up. Each man can tell just how many people are between him and a particular coveted place above, and in what order, barring demerits, accidents and certain exceptions with which I am not familiar and which are unimportant in our present study of conditions, he may hope for advancement.

In Ministry No Promotion.

But it is not so in the ministry. We have no system whereby the theological fledgling having served two years in a church of fifty members shall be advanced to one with 100 members to which he may expect to minister three years, after which he may move on to one of 200 to 500 members, and so by degrees till he becomes a theological professor, religious editor, or a saint in heaven. Promotions are made by all sorts of experiments and in every known order.

There lies before me a biography. It is written by a minister, and he assures me that it is not his own story he is telling. I should have felt sure of it anyway, for he is not a man to complain about himself; but just to assure me that he is talking of some one else, he tells me the real name of the minister who is laboring there.

Now if any pastoral committee of any church in Larger Village wants the name of Rev. Solid Merit and will send me a stamped and self-addressed envelope, I will tell them his real name. I do not know him except through the following letter and a note which accompanies it. Read the letter:

"Painful But Commonplace."

"The pastor has just left Larger Village and a new pastor is to be engaged in his place. At Smaller Village, distant an hour's ride by rail, lives Rev. Solid Merit. He is several years along the road to a long pastorate. His record demonstrates plainly that he is of the long pastorate variety of preachers. He is a graduate of a well-known college and of a high-grade Theological Seminary. No short pastorate is debited to his account. He is known to the church of Larger Village as delegate to occasional conventions, and by rather infrequent exchange. Once he gave efficient aid in evangelistic services when souls were born under his preaching. With several of the members of the church in Larger Village he had formed a strong personal friendship. He is likable, genuinely good, and in every way qualified to serve as pastor in Larger Village. His present salary is only a trifle smaller than that at Larger Village. Mrs. Merit also is worthy of the name. She was born and educated in Chicago. For years she taught in the Chicago public schools. Any church might well be proud to have her as pastor's wife. By every principle of fitness Rev. Solid Merit should be sought by the church of Larger Village. He is the logical successor to the vacant pulpit.

The Way Churches Are Fooled.

"But he is not even thought of. Rev. Brilliant Flash has been mentioned to the committee by the home missionary superintendent. Rev. Flash comes from distant Small Village. It is hinted to the committee that he has a wonderful education, though no details are mentioned. He has been in his present field sixteen months. (That sounds much longer than to say, a little over a year.) He desires better educational advantages for the young Flashes. (The young Merits are in a similar case.) He preaches two brilliant sermons; he sings. It is said that Mrs. Flash plays. He is on his way to larger fields, and must be engaged at once if at all. At a business session held the same Sunday evening some credentials are given. It is said that he has been five years in the ministry, but the church has almost no information further than this. By about a two-thirds vote a call is extended As far as the church is concerned the contract is made. It so happens however, that Rev. Flash, after some dallying declines. Then the church invites Rev. Dash from Distant Small Point, and still Rev. Solid Merit is not considered. All this is painfully commonplace. But Query: How shall Rev. and Mrs. Solid Merit ever gain deserved promotion?"

Now you have read the tragic story of Rev. Solid Merit as it has been told by our correspondent. What would you advise him to do? What would you do if you were in his place?

Ministers have their ambitions. Their families grow up and wear shoes one size larger every year, and outgrow their clothes and need larger ones, and all this costs money. Ministers need larger salaries as their families grow. They need and deserve a reasonable prospect of promotion if they are faithful. It is right that a minister should serve an apprenticeship; it is not right that he should be kept perpetually as an apprentice.

How shall Rev. Solid Merit get out of Smaller Village into Larger Village? Do you know the way out? Tell him, and his brethren. Shall he advertise himself? Shall he blow his own horn? Shall he cultivate the good graces of the newspapers? Or shall he say nothing and saw wood, and will his modestly growing woodpile attract the attention of the church committee in Larger Village?

Small Billy (at seashore)—Can't I have a ride on a donkey?

Mother—No, darling, father says not.

Small Billy—Why can't I have a ride on a donkey, mother?

Mother (to father)—Oh, for goodness' sake, David, give him a ride on your back to keep him quiet.

The Last Letter of the Beloved Disciple

A Study of the Third Epistle of John

BY EDGAR DEWITT JONES.

Students of the life and writings of John find three distinct periods in his career. The first when he was the constant companion of the Lord, the second after the death of Jesus when he was an exile in the island of Patmos, where he wrote the Apocalypse, and the third when in his old age he was the beloved leader of the church of Ephesus. It was during this latter period that the fourth gospel and the epistles that bear his name were written.

It is difficult to over value the worth of a letter from a beloved relative or a very dear friend. Next to meeting them face to face, a letter is most appreciated. The personal element is in it. As one reads the written page, it is easy to fancy the face of the writer appearing, and sometimes it seems almost that one hears the sound of the familiar voice. And what shall we say of the last letters that dear ones write? How we treasure them, how we take them out of trunk and other treasured places and re-read them!

Letters of England's Great Men

One of the rooms in the famed British Museum is given over to the letters, manuscripts and writings of England's great dead. It is an altogether hallowed place—letters of Gladstone, Tennyson, Browning, Dickens, Gray, Dryden, letters of kings, queens and princes. Once in that room it is not an easy thing to leave those precious papers. If it is also true that the letters of dying men attract and affect us deeply.

> "the tongues of dying men > Enforce attention like deep harmony,"

This third epistle is very likely the last letter that John wrote. If not the last, it is one of the last that we know. It is brief. It has fourteen short verses; two hundred and eighty-nine words. It can be read easily and intelligently in two minutes. This letter is addressed to one "Gaius, the beloved." This may be the same "Gaius" who was Paul's host at Corinth and is mentioned in Romans, the sixteenth chapter and twenty-third verse. Or it may be the Gaius of Macedonia, mentioned in Acts the nineteenth, or the Gaius of Derbe alluded to in the twentieth of Acts. But we do not know. He may have been one of these three Gaiuses or a different person from all four. We do know, however, that he was a faithful Christian, and a friend of John's.

Soul Prosperity.

"Beloved, I pray that in all things thou mayest prosper and be in health even as thy soul prospereth," Soul prosperity. How good of John to write that. What sort of prosperity is yours, is mine? Is it houses and lands? Is it stocks and bonds? Is it place or position? It that all? Then it is not enough. By and by, we shall have to leave these possessions, jewels, homes, books, broad acres, and when that time comes, character, soul-wealth, will be the only thing we shall be able to take with us into the great beyond.

When his age was eighty years, John Quincy Adams was met on the streets of Boston by an old friend, who, taking his trembling hand, said: "Good morning! And how is John Quincy Adams today?" "Thank you," the ex-President replied. "John Quincy himself is well, sir, quite well sir, I thank you. But the house in which he lives at present is becoming dilapidated. It is tottering upon its foundation. Time and the seasons have nearly destroyed it. Its roof is pretty well worn out. Its walls are much shattered, and it trembles with every wind. The old tenement is becoming almost uninhabitable and I think that John Quincy Adams will have to move out of it soon, but he himself is quite well, sir, quite well."

The Glory of Hospitality.

"Beloved, thou doest a faithful work toward them that are brethren and strangers withal who bore witness to thy love."

Gaius was a hospitable soul. His house was ever open to the weary traveler and sometimes persecuted Christians. They were in the habit of stopping with Gaius, these pilgrim Christians of that early day, and after rest, refreshment and a cheery conversation went on their way rejoicing. In Romans twelfth, the apostle exhorts us to be "given to hospitality," in 1 Timothy 3:2, he writes that a bishop or elder should be "given to hospitality," and in the Hebrew Epistle, we have this beautiful allusion: "Forget not to show love unto strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares." This reference to Genesis the eighteenth, and Abraham's fine courtesy in entertaining the three men who came very unexpectedly before his tent door, is very apt and picturesque in the highest degree. There is a wall motto that I like much which reads on this wise:

> "The beauty of the house is order,
> The blessing of the house is contentment,
> The glory of the house is hospitality."

Observe too, that the hospitality commended by John in this letter is Christian hospitality, that kind that is bestowed for and in the name of Christ for the extension of His kingdom upon earth.

Diotrephes, the Hinderer.

"I wrote somewhat unto the church, but Diotrephes, who loveth to have the pre-eminence among them receiveth us not. Therefore, if I come I will bring to remembrance his works which he doeth, prating against us with wicked words; and not content therewith, neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and them that he would he forbiddeth and casteth them out of the church."

Diotrephes, the presumptious! Diotrephes, the unruly! Diotrephes, the unlovely! Diotrephes, the domineering! Have we not all met such a character as this? Many a young church has been wrecked by one such member, who, full of arrogance and pride, presumed to lord it over his brethren. How un-Christ-like! How ruinous such a course! Paul in Romans thirteenth gives good advice. "For I say through the grace that was given me, to every man among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think, but so to think as to think soberly." Again, hear Paul in 1 Cor., the thirteenth chapter. "Love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly seeketh not its own." Try to measure Diotrephes by this standard and see how very small he becomes. How he dwindles. How he shrinks! There are a few people who seem to enjoy ecclesiastical authority, that do so like to sit in judgment upon their brethren branding some as "sound" and stigmatizing others as "heretics." Listen to John's advice after his reference to Diotrephes.

"Beloved, imitate not that which is evil but that which is good."

Demetrius the Helper.

But John contrasts with this hinderer a blessed helper, a man named Demetrius. "Demetrius hath the witness of all men and of the truth itself. Yea, we also bear witness and thou knowest that our witness is true."

One wonders if this is the same Demetrius of whom we have an account in Acts, that silversmith who made shrines of Diana and was the instigator of the furious uproar among his fellow craftsmen and turned them against Paul as one whose doctrine was hurting their business—one wonders if this is one and the same man. If so, and there is a strong probability that such is the case, what a striking example of the power of the gospel. The leader of the Ephesian mob, a pagan and an enemy of Paul, becomes a leader among the Christians, a faithful and devout follower of the Christ. Such a conversion, however, is no more wonderful than thousands of others, from Paul to Jerry McAuley, and from Augustine to John James Tissot.

A Hinderer and a Helper! Diotrephes and Demetrius! How their characters stand boldly out by way of contrast. Which are you? A helper or a hinderer? Are you lovable, humble and helpful, or are you presumptuous, headstrong and wilful? Diotrephes or Demetrius, which?

The Salutation an Exquisite Touch.

"I had many things to write unto thee, but I am unwilling to write them to thee with ink and pen, but I hope shortly to see thee and we shall speak face to face."

What an exquisite touch of refined and gentle nature. And have not many of us had a similar experience. How loath we are to try and put in writing some things that we would much rather speak face to face. If you were writing some dear friend today, whom you expected to see within a few days whether or not you expressed it so beautifully as did this aged saint, I think, indeed I am quite sure, you would feel just precisely as did John. You would wait till you met your friend to talk of some things rather than to write them.

Note particularly the last sentence of this letter. "Salute the friends by name." Now this is admirable. For the flavor is exquisitely personal and individual. "By name." There is a like incident recorded by Mark in his account of the visit of the Marys to the Savior's tomb, and the young man in white saying "Go tell his disciples and Peter." "And Peter." Peter singled out and individualized. I have not the time to enter very far into the significance of this incident, this mention of Peter, but if you will permit your mind to run swiftly over Peter's experiences as a disciple and particularly his show of loyalty when the mob came to take Jesus, his subsequent denials and repentance, I think the specific mention of Peter's name in this connection will edify and inspire you as well as affect the deeps of your emotions.

"Salute the Friends by Name."

In John the tenth chapter, Jesus likens himself to a shepherd and calls himself the good shepherd. In the opening of the chapter he refers to the shepherd calling his sheep by name and further on, in fact in the very heart of the chapter, Jesus carries fully out the striking analogy. "I am the good shepherd and I know mine own and my own know me." Here again is food for reflection and unspeakable comfort. Is it possible that God knows us so personally as this? Read the tenth of John again and again, and I think by and by you will lay hold of this truth in such a way that it will draw you very close to the heavenly Father. "Salute the friends by name."

We generalize too much in our Christian loves. We are not personal enough in our views of God and our relationship to Him through Christ.

In New York City there used to live an old printer, a Christian man who was a little eccentric in some things. He once printed a New Testament in which he inserted his own name in striking texts that had to do with conversion or discipleship. For instance, he "set up" John, 3:16 like this:

"God so loved the world that he gave His only begotten son that John W. Thomas believing on Him should have eternal life." Hebrews 2:3 he printed in this wise: "How shall John W. Thomas escape if he neglect so great a salvation?" Well, now, the old printer had gotten hold of the really big and vital principle in the Christian life, that of individual responsibility. "Salute the friends by name"—a fine touch this, a most blessed way in which to close the letter.

The glory of a quiet, old age is all over and all through this third epistle. The storm and stress is behind. The fine old character has been molded after Christlikeness, through struggle and strife, but peace is his portion now. It was with John as he wrote these words, the time of sunset and evening star. Nor is there any "moaning of the bar" experience for him.

"But such a tide,
As moving seems asleep
Too full for sound or foam,
When that which drew from out the boundless deep Turns again home."

The letter closes in an atmosphere of serenity of spirit that suggests a splendid sunset which promises a clear and cloudless tomorrow.

THE ROMANCE OF HADDON HALL

BY FRED MYRON COLBY

None of the old English manor houses are more interesting and few if any are statelier than Haddon Hall. It is situated in the midst of one of the loveliest of the English counties, occupying a delightful location on the summit of a low hill overlooking the River Wye. It has been called the most perfect and the best preserved of all the old baronial halls of "Merry England," but its chief interest and charm lies in the fact that it was the home of Dorothy Vernon, the heroine of one of Charles Major's popular novels. The story of the charming Dorothy is one of the most fascinating romances of the English peerage. The real facts are slightly different from those familar to the readers of "Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall."

Some more than three hundred years ago Haddon Hall was the residence of Sir George Vernon, one of the proudest and richest of English nobles, so famed for his lordly hospitality and the magnificent style in which he lived, that he was known far and wide as the "King of the Peak." He had no son, and two daughters, Margaret and Dorothy, were the heiresses of his enormous wealth. Dorothy, the youngest was the belle of the region, a wonderfully gay and beautiful girl, of a winning sweetness of disposition and the most engaging manners.

The two heiresses had suitors by the score, and the elder, Margaret, with her father's consent, finally became the affianced bride of Sir Thomas Stanley, the heir of the Earl of Derby. Pretty Dorothy, however, had lost her heart to John Manners, a second son of the Earl of Rutland, whom she had met by accident one day riding in the neighborhood. Young Manners went very frankly to Sir George Vernon and asked permission to visit Haddon Hall as Dorothy's suitor. But the king of the Park had designed a higher alliance for his youngest and loveliest daughter than with the second son of even a noble earl, and a decided refusal was given to young Manners, and poor Dorothy forbidden to have anything to do with him. But the ardent young lovers were not inclined to obey this arbitrary command. John Manners, in the disguise of a woodman, contrived to get empoyment on the estate of Sir George, and taking into his confidence the faithful nurse of Dorothy, managed to carry on some communication with her and to get an occasional stolen interview, several of which took place in the upper terrace, now known as "Dorothy Vernon's Walk." And now the harsh and cruel stepmother steps into the story. She suspected Dorothy although she knows nothing, and her surveilance is so close and wachful that the young girl's life was made most unhappy.

When her lover therefore boldly proposed to her that she fly with him and become his wife, Dorothy was not long in consenting, knowing how impossible it was to overcome her stepmother's objections, and believing and hoping that her father might forgive them in the end. It was accordingly planned that Dorothy should secretly leave her father's house on the night of her sister Margaret's wedding when, in the midst of the feasting and revelry, she might more easily make her escape unobserved. Meanwhile John Manners made all the necessary preparations to take away his destined bride, safely and swiftly, when once she gave herself to his care.

The night of the wedding came at last. Haddon Hall was filled with guests and gay with revelry. After the marriage ceremony had been performed in the chapel, the feasting and the merriment began and lasted for hours. Dorothy, of course, was obliged to be present at the opening hours, but later, when the music and the dancing was at its height in the great hall, she stole away unperceived and hastened to her room.

Everything was ready. Her devoted nurse covered her light ball dress with a warm wrap. There was a sad and hasty parting, and Dorothy Vernon ran down the now famous steps, flew across the dark pathway, and up the stairs that led to the terrace. In another moment she was safe in her lover's arms. There was no time for delay. The fleetest of horses were soon widening the distance between Haddon Hall and the runaway couple. Nor did they make any needless stops until they reached Aylstone. in Leicester Forest where, all arrangments having previously been made, faithful John and loving Dorothy were quietly married.

There were wonder and consternation at the Hall when the flight of the young heiress was discovered, but for a long time no information of her whereabouts came to her sorrowing father. Sir George had deeply loved his youngest daughter and when, after awhile, a letter came to him from her and her husband, asking forgiveness for marrying without his consent, he could not withhold his pardon, and in less than a year Dorothy returned to Haddon with her chosen life companion.

The early death of Margaret left Dorothy sole heiress of her father's wealth, and thus Haddon Hall and all the estates of Sir George Vernon passed into the possession of the Manners family, and from them descended to the present owner, the Duke of Rutland.

All the story comes back to one as he wanders about the ancient manor house. Pretty Dorothy's name is attached to more than one part of the old Hall. Here is "Dorothy Vernon's door," where she passed out on that faraway festal night; and "Dorothy Vernon's steps," descending into the garden, and out on the terrace is "Dorothy Vernon's Walk," where she and John Manners used to keep their tryst on many a dusk and many a moonlight night. So one of the noblest of the old English halls is best remembered on account of the love romance of a young girl.

Stately, beautiful, romantic Haddon Hall, its history, unlike that of most baronial residences, has always been one of peace and hospitality, not of war and feud and oppression: and however much its owners may, at one period or another, have been mixed up in the stirring events of the ages in which they lived, Haddon itself has taken no part in the turmoils. It has literally been a stronghold; but it has been the stronghold of home and domestic life, not of armed strife.

Very near Haddon Hall and almost overshadowed by its towers, stands Bakewell Church, where there is a handsome monument erected over the tomb of Dorothy Vernon, her husband, Sir John Manners, and their four children. Every tourist who visits Haddon Hall wend their way to the old church to shed a tear over the grave of the beautiful girl whose story invests Haddon with so much charm. The following inscription is engraved on the pedestal:

"Here lyeth Sir John Manners, of Haddon Hall, second son of Thoas. Erle of Rutland, who dyed the 4 of June, 1611, and Dorothie, his wife, one of the heires to Sir George Vernon, of Haddon, Knight, who deceased the 24 day of June, in the 26 year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, 1584."

Calcutta's Criticism

The news of the transfer of the capital of India to Delhi was received in Calcutta with an incredulity which soon turned into indignation. The European community to a man regarded the transfer of the capital to Delhi as unfair to Calcutta and mischievous in itself, whilst special resentment is felt at the secrecy with which a change so momentous was resolved upon. It is usual here to take the opinion of certain public bodies, such as the Chamber of Commerce, on even trivial matters; but no one was consulted regarding the degradation of Calcutta from its position of capital, and even the Bengal government were wholly ignored, and such treatment is strongly condemned as insulting to a great city. The commercial classes view with apprehension the removal of the government from all contact with mercantile and manufacturing interests. The annual migration to Simla has always been deplored here as placing the government out of touch with public opinion. Now the aloofness will be complete and the administration will be guided solely by the ideas of a small official coterie. Delhi will be merely a Simla in the plains, and people are amazed at the light-hearted manner in which the government regarded the enormous cost of political reconstruction. The blow which has fallen upon Calcutta has temporarily overshadowed the revocation of the Partition of Bengal, though many regard this as the gravest blunder included in the so-called boons. It is recognized, however, with satisfaction that the power of the government of India will be much diminished by the change, and that the growing independence of the provinces will receive a strong stimulus. The meddlesomeness of a supreme government has long been resented in Bengal—Calcutta Correspondent of London Times.

Come, heavy laden one,

Sweet rest will give.—Fanny J. Crosby.

Two Book Reviews

WOMAN AND LABOR. By Olive Schreiner. Among the publications of the year, the tion to labor is this brief and brilliant book most convincing statement of woman's rela- from far South Africa. With the same graphic touch with which she told her Story of An African Farm, the author tells of woman's ancient and traditional labors, when she helped her husband to bear the world on their shoulders, and was content. She asserts that as a result of the economic revolution of the past century, brought about by the substitution of mechanical appliances for hand labor, fully three-fourths of her field of work has shrunk away forever, and the remaining one-fourth still tends to shrink.

The labor problem before the modern woman is not the same as that of the unemployed male. Man, by virtue of superior training and other favoring circumstances (too numerous to mention here) can more easily adjust himself to economic changes than woman. At the worst, his problem is but that of the individual—the simple alternative before him is find labor, or die; there never has been, and there never will be a time, when the majority of males in any society will be supported by the rest of the males in total mental and physical inactivity.

But that menace faces the unemployed female; her choice is that between finding new forms of labor or sinking into a condition of "sex-parasitism"; the result of this parasitism has invariably been the decay in vitality and intelligence of the female, followed after a longer or shorter period by that of her male descendants and her entire society.

"In the history of the past, the dangers of sex-parasitism have never threatened more than a small section of the females of the race, and those of some dominant class—the mass of women beneath them being still compelled to assume some form of strenuous activity. It is at the present day, under the peculiar conditions of our modern civilization, that for the first time, sex-parasitism has become a danger to the mass of civilized women."

Sex-parasitism was, of course, seen in the old civilizations of the East, in the woman of the harem, with no necessity or desire for exertion—life to her was merely the gratification of her own appetites, and the stimulation of the appetite of the male by whom she was maintained. Even in free Greece and Rome, with no degrading polygamy to drag her down, we find women of the leading classes relieved of all motive for labor by the wealth of subject nations and the toil of slaves, the "most perfect and appalling picture of the parasitic female the earth has produced—a picture only less terrible than it was pathetic. It was inevitable that this womanhood, of types like Agrippina and Messalina, should at last give birth to a manhood as effete as itself, and that both should have been swept away before the march of a race whose women were virile, and could give birth to men."

"So, we find, that it has almost invariably been from the women to the men that enervation and decay have spread. It is the woman who is the final standard of the race, from which there can be no departure, for any distance, for any length of time, in any direction; as her brain weakens, weakens the man's she bears, as her muscle softens, softens his; as she decays, decays the people."

This female parasitism, which in the past threatened only a small section of earth's women, now threatens the whole mass. The female labor movement is in its ultimate issue, an endeavor on the part of a section of the race to save itself from inactivity and degeneration.

"It is the perception of this fact, that, not for herself, nor even for her fellow woman alone, but for the benefit of humanity at large, she must seek new fields of labor, which lends to the woman's most superficial and seemingly trivial attempt at readjustment a certain dignity and importance."

Her cry today, then, as voiced by this remarkable little book is: "Give us labor and the training which fits for labor. We demand this not for ourselves alone, but for the race."

UNDER THE PROPHET IN UTAH, By Frank J. Cannon.

There seems to be a growing sense of alarm about the menace of Mormonism in our land, and as a result much is being written about it today. The next book in the Home Mission study course will be on Mormonism, and some of our Woman's Missionary Societies will be looking this moral enemy of the dignity of womanhood and the purity of the home straight in the face.

At such a time at this, the publication of Under the Prophet in Utah is of exceptional interest. The author is Frank J. Cannon, an ex-Mormon, and son of George G. Cannon, one of the great leaders of the Mormon church. Mr. Cannon was the first United States senator from Utah, and was the man who made for Utah the pledges on which statehood was granted to her; there is no question, therefore, of his perfect familiarity with the subject on which he writes.

There may be, however, a wide difference of opinion with him in regard to the picture he paints of Mormonism prior to the admission of Utah as a state. He describes a Mormon community then practicing polygamy as being as innocent and virtuous as those who practised it in the days of Abraham. Polygamy was legal then and there was nothing clandestine about it, but most of us think that plural marriages even under such favorable conditions could not but be debasing to the individual, the family, and the state.

When Utah was admitted as a state in 1890, it was under the solemn pledge that polygamy would be abolished, and for a while it seemed as though the church meant to keep it; but it has been an open secret for a decade or more, that plural marriages were being made in Utah, with the secret sanction of the Mormon church. There is no discounting the darkness of the picture that Mr. Cannon paints of polygamy today—a picture which he reinforces by many specific instances of a heart-rending character.

A girl, brought up in the teachings of the Mormon church whose mother, perhaps had contracted a legal plural marriage, would be an easy victim for a man who sought to establish polygamous relations with her. He could give her no marriage certificate, for that would be evidence that he had broken the civil law. She is forbidden to name the priest who married her, for to do so would make him a criminal. Some day she must face the fact that the children born of her marriage are illegitimate, that she is no wife in the eyes of the law or society, and that both she and her children are social outcasts.

But Mr. Cannon does not rest his arraignment of the Mormon church on its broken pledge about polygamy; he charges it with being a political hierarchy, which enables its president, Joseph F. Smith to control the votes of a supposedly sovereign state; he tells how, at a word from him, it goes either Democratic or Republican.

And further he charges that this hierarchy has turned all the industries of Utah into a monopoly, completely controlled by their millionaire prophet, compared with which all other trusts and monopolies in the land are mere child's play. He reveals Mormonism as an open sore of social, political, and industrial corruption, entirely out of keeping with the ideals of twentieth century Christian democracy.

The female of the species is less numerous than the male, acording to a census bulletin giving the distribution of the population of the United States according to sex.

The numeration taken as of April 15, 1910, showed that in the United States as a whole there were 47,332,122 males and 44,640,144 females, or a proportion of 106 males for every 100 females. Moreover, the men are increasing their lead. In 1900 there were only 104.4 males to every 100 females. The figures for 1910 mean that if every one in the country was ordered to marry there would be 2,691,879 wifeless men left over in the rush.

In only five states and the District of Columbia do the women and girls outnumber the men and boys. Here is their relative strength:

State.	Males	Females
Massachusetts	1,655,226	1,711,190
Rhode Island	270,359	277,251
Maryland	644,225	651,121
District of Columbia ..	158,050	173,019
North Carolina	1,098,471	1,107,816
South Carolina	751,842	763,558

Ten years ago the females outnumbered the males in five other states: New York, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Virginia and Georgia. Now the tables are turned. The bulletin says in part:

"At birth the number of males always exceeds the number of females, but male mortality is always greater than female, consequently, through the excess of male deaths, the number of females gradually approaches that of males, and in the later years of life exceeds it. In the United States there is generally a lower death rate than in northern European countries, and the difference between the death rates of males and females is not so marked.

"The equality in the number of the sexes ocurs here at a later age than in European countries, and the slightly greater male death rate does not overcome the initial advantage which the males have at birth. The result is for the native white population of the United States generally an excess of males. The negroes, with their greater death rate, show the same result as is observed in European countries, namely, an appreciable excess of females in the population both in 1910 and 1900."

The bulletin shows that New England has 64,452 more females of middle age and beyond. It is fair to assume that there are more spinsters in New England than in any other section, but proportionately the excess of females, and presumably of spinsters, in the District of Columbia is even greater.

Immigration is the explanation of the larger part of the big excess of men in the United States. Almost every country which sends its sons and daughters to America furnishes more of the former than of the latter. Ireland is the only important exception to the rule of a large excess of males. In some instances there are three or four times as many men as women among the immigrants from old world lands.

The young men cross the sea to seek better opportunities for earning a living, and the women, for various reasons, are more likely to stay where they were born and reared. It is easier for the men to obtain money for the long journey and they feel safer in such ventures. Often they go to prepare homes for their sweethearts and in many cases they are not able to send for them, as they expected to when they left their native village.

La Follette for Woman Suffrage

In his speech making tour in Ohio, Senator La Follette declared for woman suffrage, in these words:

"I say that women have as much right to the ballot as the men. Do you know that there are seven million women in this country earning their own living by day wages and that they are adding to the wealth of the nation? For this reason they have a moral right to have a voice in the questions of government and all that goes to improve living conditions of the homes which are governed by legislation."

Women of Note

—When Mrs. Julia Kruttschnitt, wife of the noted railroad manager, recently went to New York she was asked whether she would enter society. Her reply was: "Society in the restricted sense, doesn't interest me. It bores me. What I term the highest social life is that confined to small circles of intellectually congenial persons —persons with some pursuit, some specific interest. It may be woman in some form; it may be science; it may be business; it may be housekeeping, but it must be something. No woman has a right to sacrifice her entire life to society. If I had the bringing up of a family of girls there would be no formal debuts. They should be brought up to interest themselves in whatever trend their thought and inclination took them."

—Mrs. L. C. Warner of New York has given $40,000 to Oberlin College to complete the Warner gymnasium, the endowment of which has already been provided for.

—Mrs. Elizabeth Davidson is said to be the only woman bank president in Maine. She is at the head of the York County National Bank.

—Miss H. K. Graham, secretary of the Church Temperance Union Society of the United States, is said to be largely responsible for the introduction of the lunch wagons now so common in our larger cities. The first night lunch wagons were sent out in New York City some ten years ago, seven of them being purchased and equipped by a $10,000 donation. The first year 35,000 ten cent lunches were served. Last year the number had increased to 386,618.

—Boxing among the girls of the Los Angeles High School has been put under a ban. Dr. E. C. Beach, physical director of the city high schools, said it was not the aim of the instructors to turn out a generation of feminine fighters and there was no desire to develop an unnaturally combative disposition, "which would interfere with the natural laws of the home."

—Mayor-elect R. H. Dow of Santa Monica, California, has announced his intention to appoint seven women to act in an advisory capacity during his term as mayor.

—Ellen Key, the great Swedish reformer and writer, lives at Alvastra, in southern Sweden. It takes two editions a year in America to supply the demand for her "The Century of the Child." This book in Germany is even more popular.

The young Indian who had risked so much in the enforcement of the law, and then deserted by men "higher up," was cleared by an attorney of the W. C. T. U., and his act justified. But all this seems to have embittered the representatives of Uncle Sam in that section and Mr. Johnson handed in his resignation, "with a few words," which show he is as good a fighter as Dr. Wiley was when attacked by the whiskey ring.

Boys and Girls

"A Baby Small"

"Only a baby small,
Dropt from the skies;
Only a laughing face,
Two sunny eyes;
Only two cherry lips,
One chubby nose;
Only two little hands,
Ten little toes.

"Only a golden head,
Curly and soft;
Only a tongue that wags
Loudly and oft;
Only a little brain,
Empty of thought;
Only a little heart,
Troubled with naught.

"Only a tender flower
Sent us to rear;
Only a life to love
While we are here;
Only a baby small,
Never at rest;
Small, but how dear to us,
God knoweth best."

The Reclamation of Bonnie

A TRUE STORY

BY MABEL ALLEN.

Just before the Doctor, who rooms at my house, left for his regular week-end at his beach home, he rapped on my door and said:

"Miss Allen, you are not afraid of horses, are you?"

"Indeed not." I asserted, indignant at the suggestion. "Why?"

"I've decided to sell Bonnie," he stated firmly. "I've been feeding her for the last five years and we don't use her once a month. You know my folks are afraid of her."

"Afraid of her?" I echoed. "I thought she was such a pet."

"She is until you put the saddle on her or hitch her to the buggy."

"What happens then?"

"Oh, the mare is all right," he went on hurriedly, ignoring my question. "They're not used to horses, that's all."

Flashes of past conversations regarding Bonnie's behavior seeped into my brain. The desire to hear what he had to say kept me silent, however.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," he continued. "I'll bring her up from the beach Monday morning and I'll advertise her for sale. You can show her to people. I'll give you ten per cent if you sell her. The entire outfit, buggy, harness and saddle, will bring two hundred dollars."

That seemed fair. I decided to risk it, and before he left it was all arranged. I found a place in the block where I could rent a stable for a dollar a week.

Some time Sunday the telephone bell rang furiously. When I answered it, I found it was the doctor's sister-in-law.

"Oh, Miss Allen," she began excitedly. "The Doctor says he is going to drive Bonnie to the city tomorrow and you are going to sell her. For goodness' sakes let me warn you not to try to drive that animal. Several years ago, the Doctor's wife turned her directly into an automobile. The buggy was smashed, but somehow in the mix-up the horse escaped unhurt, but since then she is deathly afraid of them. She will run in an instant. She shies and backs and turns around short. In fact, my dear girl, you'll sign your own death warrant if you attempt to drive her in the city. We never try to use her out here, several miles in the country, even."

She talked steadily for fifteen minutes about the dangers of trying to use Bonnie. Then central cut us off. I was glad. Still I wanted to earn that twenty dollars. Then I wondered if I could not sell her by riding her. The Doctor had a fine cross saddle. I borrowed a divided skirt from a member of the Out West Riding Club.

Early Monday morning the door-bell rang. The Doctor stood on the step. Bonnie was tied to a telegraph-pole in front of the house. I got in the buggy and we drove to where I had engaged a place for her. I didn't try to take her out the next day, knowing that she would be stiff and sore from her long twenty-mile drive. The next day I rode her several miles along an unfrequented road. Nothing very terrible happened. Next day I grew bolder and we went down town. My reputation was made for a real wild west rider before we came back. As we turned into our own block a small yellow car came snorting and puffing around the corner. We went home the rest of the way on two legs. Not mine, but Bonnie's hind ones. Ever since then people speak to me and men raise their hats who never before knew I existed. So much does the world admire fearless horsemanship. That night the Doctor inquired if I had driven her yet.

I evaded his question and said that I was waiting for him to drive her first. We hitched up the next night and drove down town. We had a dreadful time. I saw what was the trouble about the time we went up on the third sidewalk. He was afraid of her.

It was necessary that she should be newly shod if she were to be offered for sale. It fell upon me to drive her several miles that day. Every minute my eyes and hands were alert for some sudden lurch or plunge. I got home finally. I wasn't so much afraid the next day.

The Doctor had especially forbidden me to take any children driving, but the rig was so pretty and the children so coaxing, well, every child in the neighborhood was surfeited with buggy rides during Bonnie's stay. Then I tried to show her to possible purchasers. But Bonnie didn't want to be sold. Her actions were terrifying. All the neighbors held their breath and looked sad farewells when we whizzed past the corners. But we always got home safely. Then I began to see light.

Bonnie was very sweet and gentle, and I decided to see what I could do with her. The very first thing I did was to take off the check-rein. She held her head very high naturally, so it did not seem that it was a cruelty. But the first hill we climbed, down went her head and Bonnie pulled. On level road up went her head. We went out into the country for long drives. Whenever I saw a specially tempting wisp of grass along the roadside I guided her toward it. Before long she was nibbling here and there. She was such a confirmed runaway, the Doctor always tied her with double straps. When taking her around the neighborhood, I used to stake her out on vacant lots where the owners didn't object. I occasionally slipped the halter off. Bonnie followed me like a dog. Several times she broke the chain she was staked out with, but except for going over to get a drink where I generally watered her, she never strayed away.

I met an old lady one day, possibly four weeks after Bonnie's arrival.

"Did you get another horse?" she asked politely. "This one looks so gentle."

"It is the same horse," I laughed.

Doubt and incredulity covered her face like a mantle.

"Then you must certainly be a witch," she proclaimed.

"No," I hastened to tell her. "I just tried to look at things from her viewpoint. I let her do the things I would want to do if I were the horse and she were my driver. And she appreciates it."

"She certainly does," the old lady approved.

There isn't much more to say about Bonnie. The Doctor's family came to the house. I took them behind her. They were delighted. Today Bonnie is back in her luxurious home, the pet and pride of the family. A year has passed and her reform seems to be permanent. So it pays to be kind. I will always feel happy because I saved a really fine animal from becoming a city hack. —Dumb Animals.

Not a Busy But a Clever Bee

Mr. F. L. Stuebing of West Pullman, near Chicago, has been keeping bees for years and years. Mr. Stuebing is a great student of bee life and knows the little merchant of the sweet, sweet, as do few. He told the following about a bonny rover of the clover patches, to the beekeepers in session in Chicago recently, as published in a big daily.

Mr. Stuebing may be a nature faker of the insect world, but the following is very interesting reading:

"Bum was born," began Mr. Stuebing, "in 1894. He outlived thirty generations of ordinary bees, and, except for an untimely death, might still be buzzing around the old hive. I noticed him first one warm, sunny day when the rest of his relatives were out gathering honey. Bum wasn't. Instead, he was standing around kidding with the guards at the front of the hive, looking as if he didn't have a care in the world. It struck me as peculiar, and I sized him up.

"He had a hooked body and long flat wings. You know an old beekeeper can recognize bees just like a cowman recognizes cattle. It's easy when you learn how. After that first look at Bum I got interested in him and used to keep track of his goings and comings. They were worth watching. The average bee travels a mile a minute. Bum never went faster than ten miles an hour until he got within a hundred feet of the hive. Then he speeded up and shot down to the door so fast you couldn't see him. The average bee works himself to death in five weeks. Fact! Of course, it doesn't make much difference, because the queen is busy laying eggs at the rate of 2,000 a day, so there are always plenty of young fellows to take his place. In September, when the flowers are beginning to die, the bees which happen to be alive, start taking things easy, the queen quits laying eggs, and by the first of October there are about 20,000 bees left in the average hive. With good luck, nine-tenths of them will live through the winter, hardly moving a wing. Their only job is to take care of the brood—usually about 2,000.

"With the first flowers, though, they go on the wing again, and by the middle of June the most of the 20,000 are dead. I might add that the summer population of a good hive is about 60,000.

"Well, Bum managed to keep alive until September. He had too much sense to work himself to death. He made about two trips after honey a day, took things easy, and when the winter rolled around climbed in with the rest of the bunch and went to sleep. He got away with the same stunt the following summer. All the other bees were dead before they got wise to him. Bum slept through another winter, sneaked through another summer, and was starting out on his fourth season when he fell in with bad company. Maybe the other bees had been knocking him for his failure to bring in the goods—I don't know. Anyway, Bum got in with a bunch of robbers and started doing a little of it on his own hook.

"The robbers, you know, depend on their stealing abilities to 'swipe' honey from other hives. They have to get by the guards at the entrance and out again, but Bum was smart and succeeded for several weeks. Then, in the latter part of the summer of 1898—just about the time the Spanish war was ended—he got caught.

"I heard a big buzzing and ran out with the idea that one of the hives was getting ready to swarm. Instead, I found the whole population of Bum's hive fighting a life and death battle with the guards of the hive he'd been looting. ,

"Nothing like it ever happened before or since. It was ten minutes before it struck me that the hive had come to regard Bum as a sort of patriarch—an influential citizen—and that they were ready to fight for him. I got a smoker and broke up the battle, but when I started looking over the dead bees I found Bum's body. Under his wings was the honey that he'd just stolen from the hive.

The Island of Nothing-to-Do

Barren and rocky out there in the sea,
Bold and as cold as an island may be,
Loneliest island and sorriest, too—
Poor little island of Nothing-to-do.

Nobody wants them, for everyone knows
Nothing takes root there, and not a tree grows.
Nobody lives there. To tell the truth, who Wishes to stay where there's nothing to do?

The time was long past midnight.

"What was that terrific noise upstairs, darling?" exclaimed the nervous young man.

"I think it must have been papa dropping a hint," she replied.—Philadelphia Record.

Notes

A Social Revolution.

The enactment of the insurance law by the British Parliament creates a social revolution quite as important as the political revolution involved in curbing the powers of the House of Lords to estop all advanced democratic legislation. In this, as in some other respects, Great Britain is very much more progressive than the United States. We still let every old person, past the years of profitable labor, depend on charity or go to the poorhouse. Of course it has been bitterly attacked and severely criticized, but not even the Unionist Opposition has dared to attack the principle of it, only the details of the plan. Great Britain has never had an abler and braver Cabinet than she now has. They have amazing courage, and the two powerful men in it are Prime Minister Asquith and Lloyd George.—The Independent.

German Woman Seeks Votes.

For the first time the cry "Votes for women!" is to be a feature of a German political campaign. The Prussian Woman's Suffrage union, in an announcement, declares that it is the purpose to question every Reichstag nominee as to his attitude on the franchise question. It summons the women of the country to use their influence for the election of only such candidates as favor equal suffrage. After the campaign is over another inquiry will be made among the elected candidates with a view to carrying on a propaganda among the members of the new Reichstag. Until recent years the suffragist movement has made little headway in Germany, the majority of women being either indifferent or openly opposed to it.

Home Rule.

The differences between the religious faiths of Ireland no doubt present a serious difficulty. But it may be questioned whether those differences are as acute today as in the past. The church of Ireland has gained rather than lost by disestablishment. Catholics and Protestants will learn to work together as they are doing elsewhere when they are subjected to the same treatment. To favor one church at the expense of another is to perpetuate religious trouble, particularly if the inferior be preponderating in numbers and influence. Moreover, the Nationalist party has always included a Protestant element. Some of its most distinguished members have been of that faith. Yet political friendships have not been affected by dogmatic differences. At the present time the leaders of the Nationalist party are offering any reasonable security for Protestants upnder Home Rule, and have declared that a violation of religious equality would justify the interference of the Imperial Parliament. We shall certainly not diminish the power of the Roman Catholic church, or its hold upon the affections of the people, by refusing Home Rule to the Irish. It has taken a thousand years and more for the Northmen who conquered these islands to become reconciled to the Celts and earlier indigenous races. Perhaps we have now arrived at the last chapter of that hisand former Chairman of the Congregational tory.—Sir Joseph Compton-Rickett, M. P., Union.

"Aunt Mary, this is my friend, Mr. Spiffkins."

"I'm sorry, I didn't quite catch the name."

"Mr. Spiffkins."

"I'm really very deaf; would you mind repeating it?"

"Mr. Spiffkins."

"I'm afraid I must give it up—it sounds to me just like 'Spiffkins.'"—Punch

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. The Men's Bible Class at Christopher Church has a motto—"Do your religion." They are trying to make of value the social ideas of Christianity in relieving distress and poverty. Since the last of November, they have expended for this purpose approximately one hundred dollars to the satisfaction not only of the recipients but quite as well of themselves.

First Church, Danville, of which Willian E. Adams is pastor, was among those which observed an unselfish celebration of Christmas. The Sunday-school besides giving a large amount of edibles, made an offering of more than ten dollars in cash, and several classes for some some time preceding Christmas were busy preparing sleds and dolls for less favored boys and girls.

Four young men of Eureka College, preparing for the ministry, held a week's evangelistic campaign at Cooksville during the holidays, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. Favorable reports are heard of the young men in the community, both in the church and among the men and boys outside the services. The church is now pastorless since the resignation of Mr. Mitchell, who removed to Missouri where college work will be pursued at the State University.

News Editorial

Fraternal Courtesies.

First Church, Springfield, where F. W. Burnham was recently invited to remain for a second period of five years, attended in a body the First Methodist Church the last Sunday evening of the year. The down town churches had planned a union watch service, beginning at nine-thirty, where stereopticon pictures of Palestine were thrown on a screen and where addresses were made by the local pastors, the last of which, just preceding the midnight hour, was delivered by the pastor of First Christian Church. The occasion furnished the opportunity for the courtesy related in the first lines of this report. The incident, while not of great moment in itself, was apparently appreciated by the brethren of the Methodist church, and suggests one of the many happy ways of successfully illustrating our real desire for Christian union.

Christian union is not delayed for the lack of a suitable plan for its consummation, once it is desired. It is not hindered by the lack of a true theology, or a correct and satifactory theoretical basis for its accomplishment. It is delayed for the want of a body of people who exemplify real, vital Christian union in their attitude toward other religious bodies. A correct form of words, or a punctilious cleaving to a certain exegesis will not, of itself, advance Christian union, or vital religion. Christian union awaits today an organization of people who illustrate Christian union in their attitude toward other religious bodies—a body of people entirely unsectarian, practicing tolerance and fraternity without dissimulation.

We are hesitating today because no denomination has been able to show the world that it is capable of being trusted to practice thoroughly what it preaches. No denomination appealing for Christian union has ever been able to free itself from suspicion. In fact, the denominations preaching Christian union are more suspected than those denominations frankly avowing their acceptance of denominationalism, and who, therefore, practice it consistently. The business of the Disciples or any other body of Christians seeking to promote Christian union today, is not so much to prove our theology as to prove our sincerity. Whether justified by our attitude or not, the fact remains that we have been, and are even yet, in certain quarters, under grave suspicion. It is a duty imposed upon us by our very plea to create a trust in ourselves, and a favor for the plea by every conceivable courtesy and fraternal relation offered by our circumstances.

And Christian union, like the Kingdom of Heaven, need not fail of reality, because is may not immediately be universal. We may have as much of either as individuals or denominations will allow to be realized. The spirit of union will be consummated in individual Christians and local congregations, and in denominations, before it is universally accepted. Every pastor and every local congregation has the opportunity not only to live up to an ideal of Christian union, but also in a very palpable and far-reaching way to promote Christian union by exemplifying it.

The consecration of Mr. Shaw to his hard task for the past seven years is proverbial among Chicago Disciples. He is greatly beloved by his people.

L. T. Faulters writes most kindly of the church at Wellington, Kan., which he has just left for his work in Billings, Mont. Z. T. Sweeney was extended a call by the congregation of the Lenox Avenue Union Church, New York City at their meeting on Dec. 27, and will begin work with them on Jan. 6. Mr. Sweeney is one of the best known among the ministers of the Disciples, not only in his ministerial capacity, but also as lecturer, diplomat, and author. He is a member of the Victoria Institute, London, and of the National Geographical Society of Washington. At present he is Commissioner of Fisheries and Game for Indiana.

The South Side Church, of Lima, Ohio, where F. C. Lake is minister, has been very much interested in the local option elections. In a recent statement on the results of the contest in that state, the pastor showed the fallacy of trying to sustain the contention that there was more liquor sold when local option prevailed, but decided that the revulsion of feeling was due to the lack of sentiment in the given locality to follow up the victory with a campaign for law enforcement. It has not fully come to the consciousness of the voter that the whole duty is not done when the poll is secured. Citizenship demands more than casting a ballot and forgetting about the result.

The Christian, the weekly published at Uhrichville, Ohio, has recently been quite outspoken in the matter of the local option election. The county election has been arousing much interest and it was felt that the church should declare its allegiance to the side of the controversy that would best advance the interests of the community and the cause of Christ. "The church of Christ must stand for something," says an editorial, "or stand adjourned." At the same time there is a commendable spirit of tolerance in the paper that is willing for the other man to decide and to do so freely, but which insists that, before deciding, he shall hear the cause of local option stated in the strongest possible way.

Rev. J. W. Monser, one of the best known and most influential ministers among the Disciples, died just at the close of 1911 at his home, 514 Bellemontaine Avenue. He was seventy-three years old. His death followed a month's illness. Mr. Monser had been pastor of churches in Topeka, Atlanta, and Des Moines. Subsequently, he was librarian of the University of Missouri ten years. He had lived in Kansas City five years. He was the author of several books, which in-

Vital and Timely Books

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing. You need every one of this splendid list.

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST

By Edward Scribner Ames, Ph. D., author of "The Psychology of Religious Experience." 123 pages. Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. Dr. Ames treats the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy with a freshness and illumination that in itself makes his work a distinct contribution to religious thought. The book is more than a treatise. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all times must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

OF PERENNIAL INTEREST TO DISCIPLES.

cluded: "Follies of Free Thought," "Types and Metaphors of the Bible," "Encyclopedia of Evidence,' and "The Literature of the Disciples." His most notable literary work was "The Cross-Reference Bible," on which he worked five years, in collaboration with several English and American scholars. The book was published about a year ago, in England and the United States. A widow and five sons survive. The sons are: George, Kansas City; Charles G., Buffalo, N. Y.; Edward, Buffalo, N. Y.; Frank, Higginsville, Mo., and Harold E. of Champaign, Ill., an evangelist. The Christian Century extends sympathy to the sorrowing family and rejoices in the record of noble service.

From the Seat of China's Revolution

As I write a furious battle is raging in Nankin. The main position of the Imperialist troops is right in the vicinity of our property. The telegram just to hand says that fierce fires are raging and the fall of the city is inevitable. Dr. W. E. Macklin and Frank Garrett with about ten other foreigners have been in the city (Nankin) regarding the native Christians and mission property, but before the bombardment took place they all removed to the river side with the consuls.

F. E. Meigs and wife and Earl Meigs, D. E. Dannenberg and wife are living in our Yangtsepoo house (in Shanghai). Mrs. Frank Garrett and the children and Mr. and Mrs. Guy Sarvis are renting a house close to us in Kwenminb Road. W. R. Hunt and children are in the same terrace. Mr. Hunt has tried day after day to return to Chuchow (this is his home) but has been forbidden by the consul to travel in the district north of Nankin until the fate of the city has been decided, but he will leave the first opportunity. Mrs. Dr. Macklin has rented a house some little distance from us where she is living until she can return to Nankin.

The separation of these women from their husbands and of the missionaries from the native Christians and their work is very trying to them. Our Institute (this is our church and school and best building in Shanghai) is a veritable city refuge. We are sheltering a large number of students and preachers, who, on account of their hair (having cut their queues) were obliged to flee for their lives. Tens of thousands of refugees have been arriving in Shanghai weekly from the various provinces. Hundreds of foreign missionaries are here, having been brought down the river (Yangtse) and from far interior stations where the situation was fast becoming anti-foreign.

Miss Tonkin(one of our missionaries in Shanghai) is doing yoeman service in sheltering Miss Lyon, Miss Raw (missionaries from Nankin) and a large number of girls and women from Nankin. The situation is very grave and it looks very much as if everything was running to chaos.

The Chinese Church is appointing chaplains to accompany the army and I suppose for the first time in history, at least in the Shanghai branch of the Republic army, the Lord's day is being hallowed with the preaching of the gospel by the soldiers among themselves. Our Yangtsepoo evangelist, Zung Siao-ling, was one of the first to join the force against the tyranny of Manchus, and is greatly honored by his comrades for his fine Christian character. Sunday last he attended service in his regimentals and gave a fine address which was earnestly followed by the audience.

Do not be apprehensive about the workers. They are acting very wisely. In fact at this time all through the province the consular authorities are not allowing the missionaries to run the risk of the terrible boxer year.

Shanghai, JAMES WARE.

From Herbert Moninger's Personal Friend

"Nothing in all the Sunday-school realm so appeals to me as the tendency to bring it and our educational institutions closer together. No field in the religious work presents such possibilities to the man of education as the Sunday-school. Surely soon we will awaken to the fact that the greatest opportunity the Sunday-school leaders have is that of establishing in every one of our colleges a chair through which the lives of all Christian young men who enter these institutions may be inspired to do work in our Sunday-schools. This applies to the young man regardless of what business or profession he may propose entering.

"I am in most hearty sympathy with the movement which has for its object the establishing of a Memorial Chair at Bethany College in honor of Herbert Moninger. The name of such a man will in itself bring tremendous inspiration and it was a happy thought that connected the beginning of this important work with his name.—R. A. Doan."

Herbert Moninger had few friends who stood closer to him than R. A. Doan, of Nelsonville, Ohio. It was to Nelsonville that Mr. Moninger made his last visit. It is therefore especially gratifying to get this word from Mr. Doan regarding the enterprise it is proposed to erect in Mr. Moninger's honor. ROBT. M. HOPKINS, American Sunday-school Supt.

A London Preacher in Des Moines

On December 27, it was the pleasure of Des Moines ministers to entertain at one o'clock luncheon, Dr. R. J. Campbell, of City Temple, London. It was a day of good fellowship, when at the close of a splendid dinner we listened to our visitor, upon "A World View from the Christian Standpoint." The speaker prefaced his address by some remarks upon the trend of liberalism. He said it is a different thing from the naturalism of the past; that it is not a break with the teachings of the past concerning Christ. All the teachings held by any considerable number of people for any considerable time are essentially true. This is the dictum of liberalism. Dr. Campbell has no sympathy with a liberalism which ignores the Jesus of the New Testament: "To do so" said he "is to stand history upon its head."

His world view included three outstanding facts of modern life—the social consciousness, the dawn of a new internationalism, and the decline of organized religion. It is a fact that organized labor has found out its power if only its forces can be unified. Since labor produces wealth, when once it comes into its own labor will command and others must obey. As to the second feature our visitor declared that in a few years there would be a world citizenship amounting to united human family with common purposes and ideals. In former years, one civilization gave place to another one on a different spot of the earth's surface. If one became corrupt the new one could carry the victory further. But when there shall be one social life the world over, if society shall become corrupt whence will come the power to cleanse and purify? Then said he when the material foundation has been laid will occur the greatest spiritual awakening of all time.

The decline of organized religion may be temporary. In any case it does not mean the decline of religion itself. History records more than one instance where such decline has preceded a great revival. The great need is for ministers to look upon themselves as the dispensers of the mysteries of Christ, practical mystics who see the inner truth of God and are brave enough to make it known. We speak of our progress, well any way we are changing, but are we going up!

In the evening Dr. Campbell lectured at Plymouth Church on the Effects of British Civilization Upon Modern Life, and followed the lecture with one of the most beautiful spiritual sermons it has been my privilege to hear.

Concerning the lecture, full of interest, I content myself with one small section which came as a sort of digression and yet interesting to us Americans. It is said that in the days of Cromwell a ship was ready to sail from on English port for the new world. On board the ship was no less a person than Cromwell himself, but that on the eve of sailing a royal order forbade its departure. Had Charles the First foreseen the outcome of such prohibitions he probably would have allowed the ship to sail. But what then? The American revolution might have been precipitated earlier and the founder of the new world might have been, not George Washington, but Oliver Cromwell.

The sermon—He shall be called the Son of the highest, "The Intrusion of the Transcendental,"—for subject matter, for depth and clearness, for beauty, for sentiment, for fearlessness of utterance, was rewarding and refreshing. No doubt many in his audience heard some new things, but surely they were true things. Balanced and guarded he passed cautiously yet fearlessly into the depths of that most sacred theme, the annunciation of Mary, which he called the poetry of the Nativity. Did it really happen? said he. Most surely, though we may not know just how, the intelligence came to Mary.

There is another world of beauty and perfection, where things are known and brought to pass before they are seen on earth. When heaven bent low and the door of the invisible was for a moment thrown open, the light and music of the other world fell upon the eyes and ears of mortals.

In the assumption of the flesh there was necessarily limitation, a sort of shutting out of previous knowledge. "Did he ever," said the speaker, "feel the spell of a forgotten greatness? Did he ever catch the glimpse of a surrendered glory? Have you not all felt the same? I never met a man who has not." All that is said of Jesus is unquestionably true. It cannot be otherwise. But it is equally true of each of us in a lesser sense. And in this way Jesus came to help us to find our true selves.

Referring to the story of a city buried in the sea and the fisherman's tale of how he could hear the buried bells toll on calm days, so said he we are submerged in God and we can hear the tolling of His bells.

Closing he told of a twilight on Lake Lucerne where he saw what seemed a huge cross. It was a sombre picture., the dark skies, the jagged rock, the water covered by shadows. Later in the clear light of day he passed the same place. What seemed to be a cross was the figure of Christ with arms outstretched. Our lives are only in the twilight. In the gloom and shadow, the cross is over all, but in the light of that larger day we shall see that what seemed the cross is our Lord Himself.

It was a sermon with thoughts for thoughtful people, with tender emotions for the quiet hour when discussion and dogmatism have slipped away and the heart is at home with itself. J. M. LOWE.

Stirring News From the Foreign Society

Miss Rose T. Armbruster of Akita, Japan, under date of December 4, reports three young men baptized a week previous to that time at Akita and six young women baptized in Tsuruoka, November 15.

There were two baptisms in Fukushima during the month of November. So reports C. E. Robinson.

Miss Kate V. Johnson, of Tokyo, Japan, reports two young women baptized. They have united with the church at Sendagi.

P. A. Davey, Tokyo, Japan, writes: "We have just closed the most successful protracted meetinng from the the standpoint of numbers, interest and results, that I have seen for years. Thirty-seven will immediately be formed into a study class in preparation for baptism." P. A. Davey also reports three baptisms in Tokyo. He has a large class studying the Bible which meets weekly in his home.

G. H. Waters sends $600 for the support of a missionary in Africa for one year. This good man has shown a deep interest in this substantial way, and he has in his plans yet other gifts for the enlargement of the work.

C. S. Settlemeyer, writing from Shanghai, China, November 25, says: "We have had to close up the university and all our work in Nankin. The city is now surrounded with a Revolutionary army and it cannot be said when the city will be in peace again."

Dr. Elliot I. Osgood, Chuchow, China, under date of November 28, says, "The situation in China does not seem to improve, but rather the reverse. The legation have ordered all Americans to leave the interior and I suppose it will land most of our mission in Wuhu and Shanghai. Some of us are doing Red Cross work and staying by and being protected by both parties, the Revolutionists and Imperialists. This city (Chuchow) has asked me to take charge of this organization here and Macklin and Garrett work at Nankin."

Under date of November 27, Mrs. W. E. Macklin, writing from Shanghai, China, says: "The battle is said to be now on in Nankin Dr. Macklin is staying by his hospital work there. Having just received a note from him in which he says, "There is great satisfaction in taking a little risk and doing things. One of my assistants said that the neighbors are looking up to me. If I should go they would be in a panic. If I stay they will be at peace. We are treated with great courtesy and kindness of both imperialists and revolutionists. Our camp has gone outside the city to fight tonight. The result can hardly be doubtful. I hope the city may go over peacefully, but we cannot tell. Don't worry. Pray to God. I am in the line of duty and my work the past two weeks counts probably for many months work at other times."

Dr. Sun Yat Sen took the oath of office as president of the United States of China at Nankin, January 1. China begins the new year with most of the other nations of the world. The first act of President Sun was the changing of the Chinese calendar. This change was generally approved throughout the new republic. The new cabinet has been completed. Little did Dr. Macklin expect to see all these things happen in Nankin when he opened our mission there twenty-five years ago. God is in heaven and the world moves out into light. Many will agree with Thos. A. Edison, referring to China, when he expressed the opinion that the monarchies of the world will pass away within the next century.

Widespread preparation is now being made among the churches for the March offering for Foreign Missions, the first Sunday in March. The rallies are even better than in former years. The sale of missionary books is good. The calls for missionary addresses and literature are very encouraging. Let us move forward as one man in the conquest of the world for our Lord. In vain we seek to restore the New Testament Church to the world without reproducing the apostolic, evangelistic life and spirit. Everywhere and all the time we must preach the gospel to the lost. This is our one business. Times are good. The captains of industry declare that the prospects for the future are most hopeful. Please order your March Offering supplies now and be in line for great things in the name of the King. Address F. M. Rains, Secretary, Cincinnati.

For the first three months of the current missionary year there was a gain of seventy-five contributing churches and eighteen schools. The churches, as churches, show a gain in their gifts of $1,738. The total gain for December was $767.72.

Dr. W. E. Macklin and Frank Garrett were in Nankin all through the siege. They are heroes of the finest type. They saved many lives. It creates a fine feeling toward Christianity. Drs. Butchart, Wakefield and Osgood are also doing some red cross work at their hospitals and dispensaries. It is a splendid exhibit of love to the new China that is to be.

W. R. Hunt ha been doing Red Cross work on the battlefields near Nankin. Many of the Revolutionary soldiers are Christians. The wounded were frightfully mangled by quick firing guns, and rifles and bayonet. Mr. Hunt says it is the first time he had ever eaten camp bread with jam spread on by a sword bayonet. The Red Cross work is the mission work of the hour.

Most of the new government schools in Nankin were rioted and the furniture and fittings demolished by the imperialists before the capture of the city by the revolutionists. Fire and sword have left their sad seal on the imperial southern city, but the newer life to China will be free and bring blessings to the people. The opportunities for evangelization will be greater than ever and our missionaries are thrilled with hope as the night of heathenism gives way to new morning.

The expense of rents in Shanghai—high rated on account of the tremendous rush from all provinces—is a great tax on the missionaries. The Foreign Society should be receiving special gifts just now. It is a call for larger and more gifts. Let our brotherhood respond to this crisis and send a shout of cheer and a gleam of light into sad China at this decisive hour for her evangelization.

Dr. W. E. Macklin's translation of "Green's History of the English People," has had much to do with the moulding of the sanest principles of the present reformatory movement. W. R. Hunt's translation of the "Sychar Revival" is having a wide circulation among the Chinese ministry and is spreading the revival. Frank Garrett's work at the Bible College is building up the men who will mould and guide the future of the Christian church in China.

Shanghai is a veritable city of refuge. More than 250,000 of the population fled from Nankin. Many of the educated young men of the city were beheaded by the imperialists before the fall of the doomed city. Thousands of homes plundered and serious losses by fire. All mission property secure. The distress and want and suffering this winter will be beyond the power of words to describe.

A BROTHERHOOD SCHOOL.

The Bible College of Missouri has an almost unique claim upon the interests of the brotherhood of Missouri at large. It has grown out of the attempt of the brotherhood to solve the problem of religious education in Missouri. The Disciple dream of a great secular university having failed of realization, the leaders of educational endeavor in Missouri founded the Bible College of Missouri as a solution of the problem. Our Bible College thus belongs to the brotherhood of Missouri in that it came about through that brotherhood's attempt to "cut the Gordian knot."

How wise was the step taken the passing years have shown. In a brief decade and a half the baby school has grown into a sturdy Bible College, whose future is bright with promise of further growth. Thus the Bible College of Missouri deserves the interest of every member of the Christian Church in Missouri because it has made good in the attempt to realize a definite aim. It has saved the Disciples of Missouri from the hopeless attempt to raise millions for a great secular university. And yet the Bible College of Missouri, owing to its position beside a great university, can give the Disciples all that the raising of these millions could give.

How just, how reasonable, how modest is it then, when the Bible College of Missouri comes to its brotherhood, and earnestly pleads for a few hundred thousand, in order that it may do the work that ordinarily it would take millions to do. Because this institution has thus realized the fondest dreams of the patriarchs of olden times, because it does this at only a fraction of the cost that might have been incurred, because it lies at the heart of our great commonwealth, because it is actually practicing our aim of Christian union, for these weighty reasons the Bible College of Missouri appeals to the brotherhood of Missouri for appreciation, for friendship, for aid and support. R. W. GENTRY, Field Sec'y.

The Great Revelation for You

J. S. HUGHES.

To you who discern "the signs of the times," these words could not be more precious if they fell down from the skies, engraved on parchment of gold:

"The revelation of Jesus Christ which God gave to Him to show unto His servants and which He sent and signified to His servant John," bursts forth on this century under the searchlight of the Hughes method.

As the letter of Paul revived as from the dead, were the backbone of the Protestant reformation, even more so is the intelligible and joyful unveiling of 'the revelation' to be the cornerstone of the greatest movement now begun all over the world. It is perfectly true that believers in all the centuries past have looked forward to such a day when this book would make good its mighty claims to open our minds to 'wisdom' and fill our hearts with hosannas!

It was not the finding of the Rossetta stone that illumined all the hieroglyphics of the past centuries, but the true interpretation of it, and this was its real discovery.

So it is now with Christ's own self-revelation, and this new method of interpreting will place you upon vantage ground and give you a commanding view of the real attitude of Christ toward the world powers. A class scholarship is hereby offered for one year of free correspondence to those who apply at once. Enclose stamp, and address, Vision Study, 410 West Sixty-fifth street, Chicago."

The Divinity of Christ

is the new work on religion by EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES which bids fair to be even more generally discussed than the same author's "Psychology of Religious Experience."

It is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says:

"Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Baptist World says:

This book is interesting, among other things, in that it rejects both Trinitarianism and Unitarianism. The author says, "Each alike accepts the underlying dualism, and without questioning its validity has chosen to champion opposite extremes." He contends that the who of Jesus is not to be decided by his human birth, but by his divine relations. An insidious, strong putting of the theology in the author's local atmosphere.

The Independent says:

"Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says:

"Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says:

"These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says:

"It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

The Illusion of the Remote

ALEXANDER PROCTOR was the greatest interpreter of spiritual religion produced by the Disciples of Christ in the generation just past. He kept his mind on more intimate terms with his own experience than was the wont of those who felt bound by the letter of legal commandments. He therefore constantly interpreted the realities of religion in terms of his actual present life. This filled his preaching with a rare human quality and suffused his soul with an abiding and vivid joy.

A colporteur of religious tracts once approached the veranda of Mr. Proctor's house where the preacher, then grown quite old, was sitting, and introduced himself with the question, "Do you want to go to heaven?" "No, I do not, sir," promptly replied the seer, whose feet were even then taking hold on the threshold of the unseen, "I am already there."

This reply illuminates Mr. Proctor's spiritual genius. He had overcome the illusion with which most of us are obsessed, the illusion that the best things are the remote things. We despise the near—or ignore it. We imagine that heaven is far away in space and time. But heaven is crowding itself right into our commonplace lives if we were but aware of it. All the way to heaven is heaven, and there is no joy to be revealed to our souls in the future but the flavor and thrill of it may be a part of our experience even now.

Life's full meed of happiness and inspiration is lacking to most of us just because the rich value of the things we do possess is eclipsed by the illusion of the things that seem to be beyond. We strain after the remote. We disdain the treasures of our own city or our land and travel far to look on scenes and objects less interesting and often less significant than those we have at home. Meanwhile travelers are coming great distances to behold what we ignore. It is a proverb with travelers that strangers often know a city's points of interest better than her own citizens.

These nearby possibilities of happiness which we take as a matter of course, mechanically, spending all our idealism upon remote and inaccessible things, assert their reality in a very tragic way oftimes. When they are taken from us, then we awake to what they might have meant to us. Carlyle loved his wife. But she did not know it, nor did he know it himself. He accepted her as an article of furniture. Much of the time she was in the way. "Stop rocking," he said one day when he was writing. Being particularly irritable that day, even her breathing annoyed him. "Stop breathing," he said. And she did. But at her casket he cried, "O that I might have her back for just five minutes to tell her how much I loved her!" The measureless possibilities of happiness inhering in love—every-day love—had been overlooked because they were nearby.

With what glory does memory crown mother when she has gone! Her selflessness, her untiring devotion, her almost preternatural insight and the exhaustless fund of comfort upon which our bruised hearts were wont to draw—all these we measure and assess with new vividness when she has passed from our ken. But why could not our hearts have flung this idealism about her while she was with us?

Our human nature cheats us into sweeping the distant ranges of possibility to find life's values. Meanwhile the best values of the universe lie in our lap. The physicist with his microscope finds worlds of mystery in a rain-drop equal to that the astronomer with his telescope finds in the firmament. But Christ puts into our hand the instrument that reveals a world of happiness in our thousand a year, equal to that in our neighbor's ten thousand a year. Christ breaks the illusion that contentment and joy are found in things remote from us, and shows us that they are found in us. He makes us see that blessedness is not from without inward, but from within outward. What he does in our souls has the effect, so the apostle tells us, of making all things new!

If we learn of Christ aright we acquire the fine art of spelling out the great idealistic meanings of life's facts and events. Dull work becomes companionship with Him who worketh even until now. Love ceases to be a mere individual thing and becomes a bursting forth through us of the eternal heart of the universe. The little child in the home comes trailing clouds of glory and of mystery which abide over its cradle like the star over the place where Jesus lay. The mystery and the inspiration and the glory of life are not remote; they are near us all, accessible to us all.

How sorry a mistake it is to which our hearts have, perhaps unchangeably, grown accustomed—the mistake of thinking of God as "up there!" He is down here! His presence burns in every common bush. The manger was not too lowly to receive Him. And He was made known characteristically once by the breaking of bread! The whole meaning of the incarnation was to cure our obsession that God is far away and to teach us to find Him in our common life. We live in Him and move in Him and in Him have our being. We need a new mental imagery in our praying. That spatial imagery of a remote potentate is not Christian. We need instead the sense of God's gentle circumambient pressure upon our souls,

> "His fullness around our incompleteness,
> And round our restlessness His rest."

There is not one good thing that is far away in time or space. The secret of joy and contentment and inspiration is with us. It is not in heaven, that a miracle should be worked to bring it to us, nor across the seas, that some one should go on a long journey to fetch it to us, but it is nigh us, even in our mouth and in our heart.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

Sectarianism and Social Progress

One of the fundamental tasks of social progress is to remove the things that divide men into hostile camps. The feelings that war against brotherhood are the real enemies of the social spirit. The prejudices that arise through differences of language, color, occupation and a thousand other causes have ever threatened the peace of the community. It is rather shocking to the religious man to find sociologists sometimes listing religion among the divisive forces, and by implication, one of the things to be removed as the enemy of human brotherhood. It is shocking because we believe that the supreme task of Jesus was to create a brotherhood in a family where God is the Father.

If it be true that our religion is divisive and the mother of hatred and strife, then it is not the religion of Christ. The place where the divisive action of religion is most manifest in this country is in the villages of the middle west. Here hostile sects are still warring for foot-hold. There are communities where the Methodists and Baptists each have their own grocery store and sometimes even their village ticket in local politics. There are communities where Presbyterians would have but little commerce with Episcopalians and where some who call themselves Christians only (save the mark!) would write the question mark all over the salvation of the pedobaptists.

When religion takes on this divisive and intolerant spirit, it is truly the enemy of the rising social spirit and the only question is whether to up-root it or to reform it. Since the origins of Christianity are also the origins of the social spirit, we need not despair of reconciling fully and completely the modern movement of social reform with the ancient movement of the religion of Christ. They are mother and daughter, though we may not always recognize it. We might imagine a community with numbers of church buildings which really possessed the social spirit, and we might imagine a community with few spires with the divisive sectarianism. The problem is not one of roofs but of attitudes of the heart.

Professor Taylor's Book on Missions

In the missionary literature of the Disciples of Christ we have for the first time a book that avowedly champions the social methods in modern missions. We have long had missionaries that employed these methods with success, but it is a comfort to have a mission study book that will teach the young people, our coming leaders, that this is the correct way to carry on the world propaganda for Christ. We refer to the book by Professor Taylor on "The Social Work of Christian Missions," which was recently reviewed editorially in The Christian Century. Once mission work was carried on as a program of getting certain ceremonies imposed upon a population or a certain creed indoctrinated. The mission program of the Protestant church is today the largest expression that modern religion has ever found of the true ideals that are latent in the original gospel of Christ. The modern missionary who understands his task is busy building up a way of living. He is wise enough to recognize the connection of the physical with the spiritual. He sees that home life, education, benevolence, industrial life, these and many other social facts have deep significance for the program of Christian missions.

Professor Taylor has brought together in popular and readable form the substance of many monumental works on these things, adding his own interpretation and his interesting method of presentation. The wide circulation of his book may awaken still other questions. If this is to be the point of view of the church on foreign fields, how can we have a different point of view in the work of the church at home? Foreign missions are a half century more modern than the home churches. This is due to the lack of hampering traditions and the wisely chosen leadership of foreign fields. It remains for the home churches to grasp the full significance for their own work which is to be found in such studies as these in Professor Taylor's book.

Is Our Jury System Obsolete?

We have always regarded our jury system as one of the most valuable assets in Anglo-Saxon administration of justice. We have prided ourselves that we were not subject to the judicial tyrannies to which other countries have often been subjected. Yet we are beginning to realize that our system is about to break down. There are professional jurymen that hang about the court-rooms of the city. These men have come to be known by low-grade lawyers, and their presence on a jury accompanied with a bribe is sufficient to hang a jury, which will create a situation where the next trial more usually results in acquittal. The jury-bribing cases in Chicago never resulted in much on account of the difficulty of getting a jury to render a verdict against venal jurymen.

Numerous experiments are being tried to get higher grade and non-professional juries. In California they have been using women juries, without however, demonstrating that they are either better or worse than juries of men. They have elements of weakness all their very own. In Chicago the juries to try insanity cases have been made up recently of eminent citizens. One jury was composed of the city's most leading business men. Another jury was composed of religious leaders of Jews, Catholics, and Protestants. The selection of prominent citizens for jury service has always been attended with the greatest difficulty on account of the hardships many men would suffer by being out of communication with their business for a considerable length of time.

When the jury system was inaugurated, there was a less complicated business and industrial life. It is more difficult to get good men to serve now. Perhaps we must always rely on the jury system to check the work of judges. Shall we limit its function or extend it? We have been arguing over the recall of judges. Shall we subject the decisions of juries to referendum? Such is the radical proposal of some. We doubt whether the unreflective public is as likely to render a just verdict as twelve careful men who have heard the evidence. The public might only cast the vote of a half dozen editors.

The Social Life of the Rural Community

Superior means of communication and transportation have transformed the conditions of urban life. Cities can now be larger. They can be in touch with other cities. The express train enables the population to avoid congested conditions and live in suburbs. The telephone is a medium not only for business but for social intercourse as well. The delights of the city that have enticed the young from the farm have been precisely these advantages accruing from our modern conditions. But now it is becoming apparent that the country has the opportunity of securing most of these advantages. The cheap automobile promises to solve the transportation problem of the country when the good roads movement bears its perfect fruit. At least it will be a valuable addition to the facilities offered by the interurban electric lines. The telephone has already brought the farmer into touch with his neighbors and with market conditions. Many country homes have private water-works and even electric light plants, the two being installed now for a matter of $400. A modern furnace, modern plumbing and all the rest make the country home a most attractive place winter and summer. With all these advantages, little has been done to develop library facilities, access to lectures and concerts and the other things of the intellectual life. There is a great field for the social enthusiast to work out a rural program. Our new inventions have laid the foundations for a return to the country homestead system of the English. This movement back to the farm can never be complete on account of the birth of the modern factory but it should be encouraged as far as modern conditions permit. Better social privileges in the country will be a great aid.

—Christmas being by way of pre-eminence the children's festival, President Hyde of Bowdoin in the Congregationalist ventures this prayer:

> Child of Bethlehem, Lover of little children! May the gladness of thy birthday in our happy hearts and homes make us eager to give all children immunity from taint of hereditary disease and degeneracy; protection from injurious work, and guidance into congenial vocations; playgrounds, clubs, and leaders for exercise and recreation; schools that train together hand and brain, heart and will; courts and officers tactful to reclaim the delinquent; fathers and mothers who by Christlike sharing of their children's interests earn the power to impart to them Christian ideals.

There is here an opportunity to be fellow workers with God in carrying the Christmas spirit through the year and through all the years.

A Remarkable Ministerial Human Document

Rev. Dr. S. D. McConnell is one of the best known Episcopalian ministers in this country. In a letter to The Churchman he gives his personal experience of going to church as a layman for the past seven years. His article has called forth in the pages of that journal many responses, some favorable to Dr. McConnell's view of worship, others critical. What he says is full of suggestion to all churchmen. Dr. McConnell's testimony, given with the greatest candor, is as follows:

Where Shall I Worship?

During thirty-five years I was in the active ministry of the Episcopal Church. Seven years ago a physical breakdown obliged me to retire. Since then I have been a private Christian. During this period I have been learning, really for the first time, the way things appear from the pew instead of the pulpit. Formerly I wondered why men did not go to church; now I begin to wonder why they do. That they do go, in large numbers, is a very marvellous thing. The motives which impel them are not easy to discern or to describe. It is partly from habit, formed and inherited through many generations; partly from a dim sense of obligation; but underlying both these is the ethnic and universal desire to acknowledge in some form the presence and pressure of the Eternal Mystery. This elemental need will, no doubt, draw men to church for a long while after they confess to themselves that they obtain neither pleasure nor profit.

My experience of the last half dozen years has led me to the conviction that as things are in the Protestant Churches the provision for public worship is almost totally unfit to satisfy the elemental human need which has in all ages led men to say, "I will go up into the house of the Lord." This experience has been a surprise to me, and the feeling produced by it a shock and distress. When I first took my place in the pew among the congregation, I now know that I was still unconsciously feeling as a minister and not as one of the congregation. But as the weeks and months went on I found myself waiting and looking for something which I did not find. I asked myself, "What is it? What do I come to church for, anyway?" I could only answer that I came from long habit, and "for sake of example." But where was the intrinsic profit? Why should I by example encourage people to do what I could not justify to myself? And as I watched the congregation from my new viewpoint I saw that the majority were getting as little from it as I. Then I said to myself: "It is because it is such an old story for you. Use has dulled the finer sense. For half a lifetime you have been repeating forms until they have become meaningless to you." I thought this might be so, and to test it I would go to a Unitarian service—as unlike as possible to the one I was used to. There, indeed, I found a congregation less listless and more alert than the one I had left. But they did not seem to be on the alert for the same thing that I sought. So far as I could see, they were there to hear an address—and the address was well worth hearing—but the craving for devotion remained unsatisfied. Indeed I could not discern that either preacher or people felt any need therefor.

The service preliminary to the address was jejune, thin, unemotional. Indeed, it left the impression that any service at all was but a yielding to a religious custom. Two motives seemed to dominate the whole function—craving for intellectual satisfaction and a vague desire for the general betterment of the human lot. But I did not find what I sought, and I was convinced that average men would never in large numbers be found in a place which was neither a temple nor a lyceum, but an attempted combination of the two, which spoiled them both.

So I came back to Church and set myself once more to find what I sought.

The service began with promise. The opening sentences with their noble uplift were fitting invitation to the soul. The Confession, in the united voice of the kneeling congregation, with the official declaration of pardon following, appeased the hungry and anxious heart. The Venite Adoremus voiced the awakened hope and gratitude. All promised well, but there it was broken. There were four Psalms appointed for the day. One of them was a pæan of praise to God, valid at any time and for any people. But two of them were couched in terms unintelligible to any people now living, even to a modern Jew; and one of them contained such imprecations upon one's enemies as no Christian can use. Then followed the lesson from the Old Testament—2 Kings xix., it was. It purports to be the story of an episode in a war between two peoples at some indefinite time and place. In his extremity one of the combatants invoked the aid of a prophet. After a long homily the prophet promised help. The next morning, when the king opened his eyes he saw 185,000 of his enemies lying dead about the walls of his city, "smitten by the angel of Jehovah." How could I bring my soul back, after that, to the mood in which the Venite had left it? The Te Deum which followed might have done it. But that glorious pæan—the Marseillaise of devotion—was squeaked and tortured by a vested choir of seven girls and one man! The spell was hopelessly broken. There was nothing for it. The prayers, at once stately and sensible, led one on to the sermon. And the sermon—what shall I say? The preacher is a scholar and a gentleman, and a personal friend. For thirty-four minutes he read from a manuscript a composition, excellent English, sound in doctrine, self-evidently true, but leading to no practical issue, and touching no human emotion.

The sober fact is: "The hungry sheep look up and are not fed."

That men are giving up church-going in numbers can no longer be denied. A hundred explanations have been assigned. One reason at least is plain—they do not believe that what they would get is worth going for.

What can I and others like me do? For myself I will keep on going while I live. The habit of a lifetime is a potent motive. And, moreover, I am so firm in a belief in the necessity for the Church and for common worship to human society that I cannot but think this human need will someway find its fitting satisfaction. It is not finding it now in the Protestant Churches. In the Roman Church, in large measure, it does find it. If one could but forget the absurd claims of Rome, the materialistic theology upon which her doctrine of the Mass rests, her impudent meddling with the individual life, he might, maybe, bow himself with one of her kneeling congregations and find himself in the presence of God, in touch with human companionship, and the thirst of his soul might be slaked.

The supreme task of our Church at this moment is not to expand herself in a great missionary spasm, but to increase the flow of milk in her dry breasts for her own children.

S. D. McConnell.

Heckling the Church

At last the worm has turned, and the down-trodden, maligned, and much abused church has spoken in the person of Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick of Montclair, N. J. He has conferred a benefit upon all who have the welfare of the church at heart. Since it became fashionable in the popular magazines to say all the ugly things that could be said about the failures of the church, we have wondered whether one would arise to silence these detractors. We are glad that the cause of the church has found such an advocate. When it comes to criticizing the church, "fools rush in where angels fear to tread." Every man who has a grievance finds an avenue of communication. All who love the interests of the church know her shortcomings and failures. None lament them more than her best friends. Neither have any labored to correct them more than they. Most of the latter day critics have never contributed anything to the solution of her problems. It is easy to tell of her faults, but the church is on the alert for men who solve her problems, enter into her joys, inspire her membership, and make her what she ought to be—the mightiest factor in our civilization. The Presbyterian Banner has epitomized Mr. Fosdick's contribution so well that we give it in full:

This is the title of an uncommonly keen and convincing article in the December Atlantic by Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick, pastor of the First Baptist church of Montclair, N. J. He refers to the prevailing fashion of muckraking the Church, which has become the pastime of so many shallow critics. Just let anybody begin to discourse on "the failure of the Church" and expatiate on its "traditionalism," "formalism," and "sectarianism," and he will take himself seriously and may lead others to do likewise. Mr. Fosdick exposes several fallacies that lie behind this sort of talk. One "is the implicit and strangely mistaken understanding that the ecclesiastical situation used to be better than it is." In refutation of this assumption, Mr. Fosdick simply opens Hugh Latimer's sermons of the middle of the sixteenth century and parallels all our modern faults found against the Church intensified many fold. He opens Pepy's Diary of the middle of the next century and finds "Much discourse about the bad state of the Church, and how the clergy are come to be men of no worth in the world." These assumed better days were the "good old times, when for the quibble of a text men excommunicated each other, or for a difference about the sacrament made the ground run red with human blood." Another assumption lying back of this heckling is that "there are special ecclesiastical diseases, traditionalism, formalism, sectarianism, and such like" that are peculiarly the distress of the Church, whereas they are every one found in other professions and fields of action. As to traditionalism, where shall we find it in such extreme and exasperating forms as in the law, and as to sectarianism, where shall we find it so unreasonable and unyielding as in medicine? Of course all this does not help the Church, except that it shows that the Church is not a sinner above others and is only subject to common human infirmities. But it sould stop the heckling of these petty critics who are carrying on their business in ignorance of the past and of the real significance of the Church. The Church is the inevitable organization of the inescapable element of religion in human life, and it presents an immense and vital problem to be solved, not a target to shoot at. "Just one sort of man has the right to criticise and to be heard—the man who has earned the right by making some positive contribution himself to this inevitable and superlatively important problem."

How Shall I My Savior Set Forth?

This topic will be read by some, "How shall the preacher preach?" It will not occur to them that it is the business of every Christian to bear testimony to the value of his faith. The topic is designed to awaken the sense of responsibility in every one that has any knowledge of Christ's power to save. The church is often weak because many of its members have no part in the preaching of the gospel. They have yet to learn that only those who share the truth can enjoy its benefits in their own lives.

The messenger of Jesus must have first hand knowledge of the gospel. If he knows of its power only by hearsay, he will make a very slight impression on the world. The apostles spoke to the hearts of men because they had been with Jesus. Their experience was such that they felt all the world ought to share it. Christ meant to them freedom and power. They were sure he would mean the same to all who might believe in him. It was an inner constraint that sent them out to bear testimony to the faith that was in them. The command of Jesus to go met an immediate and glad response in the heart of the believer.

The public teaching of the gospel is an obligation resting upon us all. Those who have the ability and the opportunity should stand before the people and speak the words of life. For those who cannot preach there is the privilege of supporting those who are called to this form of service. To support the preacher is more than to give money for his salary. That is important. He is not an object of charity. He should be made to feel that he is a laborer worthy of his hire. To withhold money from his salary that we may spend it on our pleasures or hoard it does not minister to our spiritual growth. But we are just beginning to support him when we have paid his salary. We must let it be known that we stand for the truth he preaches. When he condemns sins, it is not our business to apologize for him and to make it easy for the sinner to continue to sin. We can help in preaching the gospel if we attend to the business of the church and allow the minister to attend to his duty as a teacher of religion.

There is something to be said for the religious journal as an instrument for the advancement of the kingdom of Christ. It may not be ideal. It may be narrow. Its editor is human and he has his prejudices which he cannot conceal. But the church cannot do its work without the printed page. A disciple cannot be intelligent unless he knows what is being done by other disciples. The religious journal can furnish him the information he needs. It is reasonable to ask that there be at least one religious paper in every Christian home. In this age when there are so many critics of the church, the church has a right to speak in its own defense, and this it does through its papers. When they are supported as they ought to be, they will speak for the church with greater effect. [Midweek Service, Jan. 24. Acts 5:22-32.] S. J.

XVI.—THE ONE BAPTISM.

Paul's formulation of the seven-fold bond of Christian unity constitutes one of the most remarkable texts in the New Testament. It is found in his letter to the Ephesians, chapter 4, verses 3-6.

"Bear lovingly with one another, and try hard to maintain in the bond of peace the unity which the Spirit gives. There is but one Body and one Spirit, just as there was but one Hope set before you when you received your call. There is but one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism. There is but one God and Father of all—the God who rules all, works through all and lives in all."

It is sad to think how such an utterance as this, aimed directly at the encouragement of unity, has been made the occasion of division among Christ's people. The "one baptism" has been torn from its context because it had a sound as if supporting the immersion dogma, and has been given an application wholly foreign to anything in the apostle's mind. Meanwhile its profound and vital significance for the church in all time, and in our time especially, has gone undiscerned.

No consistent attempt has, to our knowledge, been made by those who have misused this section of Paul's great utterance to interpret it intelligibly. It has been used by advocates of the immersion dogma not so much as a part of their argument as a rhetorical climax to the argument. After proving by the well-known methods that immersion was the primitive practice in contrast to the optional practice of modern denominations—giving to the candidate the choice of sprinkling, pouring or immerson—the disputant clinched his point by this quotation from Paul: "there is one baptism," leading his hearers and himself to believe that it explicitly condemned everything except immersion. Had he critically examined his use of Paul's words, instead of merely grasping at the advantage offered by their rhetorical sound, he would have discovered that, instead of supporting his contention, this text cannot be made to fit intelligibly into his dogma at all.

The immersion dogma, as we have seen, is based upon the assumption that the word "baptism" as used in the New Testament is always equivalent to "immersion." This assumption, of course, seals immersion with all the authority and importance which the scriptures assign to baptism. In some passages the substitution of "immersion" for "baptism" in the text does no violence to the sense. In other passages, as in the commission of Jesus and Peter's exhortation on the day of Pentecost, the substitution makes sense but is morally intolerable. In this passage the substitution is neither morally tolerable nor intelligible. If for a moment the reader will throw off the literalistic bonds which hold us all, more or less, and allow his untrammeled moral sense to freely judge of the affinity of the physical act of immersion with the august spiritual realities of this text, he will feel, we are sure, the incongruity of its presence in this catalogue.

It is inconceivable that the religion of Jesus, so thoroughly spiritual, should have lifted an arbitrary physical act into a co-ordinate position with the Faith, the Spirit, the Lord, and the Father Himself. Few, if any, of the pagan religions will disclose a defect so crass as this. It is inconceivable that Paul, whose great plea was the freedom of man from ordinances of all sorts, and who made the great argument for the spiritual character even of Jewish circumcision, declaring that "outward bodily circumcision was not real circumcision," that "the real circumcision is that of the heart, a spiritual thing and not a literal one"—it is inconceivable that Paul should here have elevated an outward physical act upon the level of the great structural factors of Christianity. It is morally improbable that the "one baptism" here can mean one immersion.

And, in addition, it would be safe to challenge any advocate of the immersion dogma to make the passage intelligible by the substitution of "immersion" for "baptism." Why should Paul wish to say there is but one immersion? What meaning could such an utterance have? No one regards it as a thrust at trine immersion, for all save trine-immersionists regard that procedure as of a considerably later origin. Certainly there is not the slightest suggestion of condemnation of any other form of administering baptism, e. g. sprinkling or pouring, for, in the first place there was at this time no hint of departing from the accustomed practice, and, in the second place, the text could not be made to mean that if there were. To say there is "one immersion" does not forbid saying also, "there is one sprinkling." The word "immersion" cannot be made in this context to fit into any thought process of the apostle. It is only as it is used in connection with the modern practice of these forms that the sound of the words "one baptism" seems vaguely to confirm the immersionist contention.

Not only the debaters with a dogma to defend, but the critical scholars and commentators have been baffled, many of them confessedly, by Paul's association of baptism with the august company of the Body, the Spirit, the Faith, and the Father. The tendency to minimize baptism is strong with them. In an ethical religion like Christianity, it is difficult to exalt a "mere ceremony," as they conceive baptism to be, into a co-ordinate position with those structural verities with which Paul here classes it.

All conceive baptism as a detached institution, standing by itself, with its meaning in itself, analogous, say, to the Lord's Supper. And the question is asked "Why did Paul omit the Lord's Supper from his catalogue of the unities? The only answer seems to be that the rhythm of the language in which Paul had cast his thought—two groups of three unities each and a third group of one unity with a three-fold ascription—had so fascinated him that he rejected the Lord's Supper rather than spoil the rhythm! And the implication seems to be that Paul included baptism not because it really had a meaning for his thought in this context but because it filled out the rhythm!

But of course this is but to play with the words of Paul. Commentators must not think that, like themselves, the apostle has any interest in filling space with words. His words are spoken with conscience and each one counts for reality. We can hardly imagine him, at the lofty altitude his thought has reached in this Ephesian letter, either rejecting or selecting his ideas according as they made or marred the rhythm of his utterance. Why then was the Lord's Supper not included? To ask this is to have our attention directed to the key that unlocks the entire passage and illuminates the presence of baptism in this august company. The difference between the Lord's supper and these seven is that it is an expression of Christian unity while these all are constitutive of Christian unity. That baptism should be grouped with those great factors which underlie and determine the unity of Christ's people shows it to belong not to the class of merely sacramental rites but indicates its function to be utilitarian as well. That is to say, baptism is a necessary factor in constituting the Christian order, as well as a helpful means of grace. And for Paul to say that there is but one baptism is to define the sort of unity that should obtain in the body of Christ.

Our study hitherto has so far familiarized us with the social character of baptism as initiation into a religious order that we are ready at least to try this meaning on this text. Baptism, as we have said, has a richer connotation than initiation; the words are not quite equivalents; the latter is the skeleton of the former. Allowing for this difference, we find that the whole text is made intelligible by reading, "There is but one initiation."

There is one body, says Paul, and it is a democratic body. There is but one initiation into it; when this initiation has been undergone the initiated stands on a level with every other member of the body, in an absolute freemasonry of the Spirit. There are no "advanced degrees" in the Church of Christ. There is no exclusive circle into which one may aspire to be initiated; no outer and inner court; no status for Gentiles and another for Jews, no status for masters and another for slaves, no status for men and another for women. There distinctions of race and society and sex all vanish in the one baptism by which we all become one in Christ Jesus. The baptized slave is as fully in the body of Christ as is the baptized master. The baptized Gentile is as fully in the body as is the baptized Jew. The baptized woman is as truly an organic part of the body as is the baptized man. There are no further baptisms, no further mysteries to be initiated into, no higher degrees to be conferred. Once baptized, the initiate is on a level with every other Christian.

Ideally, the church is thus in Paul's mind the realization of absolute democracy. There is no caste principle in it. The distinctions which separate man from man in the world outside are left behind at baptism. There are no further baptisms because there is nothing further to be baptized into. All the riches and mysteries of grace are open to him who has passed through this single gateway of the Kingdom of God. Progress after baptism is not measured by changes of social status, progressive initiations, the conferment of superior degrees, but by the enrichment of personal character.

How perfectly the social conception of baptism fits into this context! The "one baptism" is an actual ground and reason for maintaining the unity of the Spirit in the bonds of peace. It is as truly constitutive of unity as is the one faith, or the one hope or the one Lord. The Lord's Supper is not constitutive; it is expressive of the unity already existing, but it does not determine the unity. It might, conceivably, be dispensed with, without destroying the unity. But baptism could not be dispensed with without disintegrating the body; and with the disintegrating of the body faith and hope are dissipated; and with faith and hope dissipated the work of grace by Father, Son and Spirit is undone. If there is to be, then, a body of Christ, a church, an organized communion of believers set into the social order of the world and maintaining itself over against the world order,—if there is to be such a body, a definite, public, solemn ceremony of initiation in which the will of the individual shall meet and be embraced by the will of the body is a social necessity. This ceremony in the Scriptures is called baptism.

But social necessity does not limit the number of baptisms. Such a body might organize itself so as to provide successive social levels, with appropriate baptisms at the entrance to each order. Manifestly the unity of such a body would be unlike the unity we know as Christian. There would be aristocracy, patronage, pride, exclusiveness, all within the body. But Paul says we are all one in Christ Jesus. There are no levels, but one level. Our unity is grounded in the absolute freemasonry into which the one and only baptism admits us. Such a democratic unity is "the unity that the Spirit gives."

Paul's conception is worked out in greater detail in 1 Corinthians, chapter 12. There are differences within the body, he says. But these differences are functional not stational. It is a serious matter when those with conspicuous gifts assume that they have been exalted to a station higher than those whose gifts are more humble. All the parts of the body are essential to the well-being of the body. The eye cannot say to the foot, "I have no need of you." "It was in one spirit that we were all baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, slaves or free men." Here, so far as status goes, we are on the same level, and divergence of function must never deceive any of us into the notion that we are higher or lower than our brothers. In the Church of Christ there is no higher or lower. There is but one baptism.

In the face of the thirteenth verse of this Corinthian chapter and the high ethical idealism of the whole context it is amazing that the immersion dogma could so much as get itself formulated. Nothing but the most wooden legalism could tolerate the substitution of the physical act of immersion for Paul's reference to baptism here. The passage is absolutely opaque if this substitution is made. Clearly what the apostle has in mind is the social nature of Christian baptism. He sees it not as a physical act nor as a detached institution, "a secret vow between the soul and Christ," but as a social act of self-identification with the Christian community. The Spirit is the element in which this act takes place—"in one spirit are we all baptized," and the church is the end toward which the act is directed—"baptized into one body."

The essential nature of baptism is plainly not a physical act nor an independent sacrament with its meaning in itself. as is the case of the Lord's Supper. The meaning of baptism is found in the church, to which it points and for which it exists. It is an institution of transition; its meaning is beyond itself. The candidate is always baptized into something—"into Moses," into Judaism, into repentance, i. e., the kingdom or community of penitent men, into the church, into the body, into Christ himself.

"Unto what then were ye baptized?" inquires Paul of the Ephesian disciples of John who had some vague knowledge of Christ but had never been identified with the Christian community. They had received John's baptism only. On hearing the word of the apostle they were baptized "into the Faith of the Lord Jesus." Their baptism at John's hands had been precisely the same, as baptism, as that which Paul administered. In both cases the physical act of immersion was the same. And yet the former was not regarded as Christian baptism. The sole difference between them was psychical, social. The earlier had been an induction into John or John's community, the latter was an induction into Christ or Christ's community.

Editorial Table Talk

A Dangerous Precedent

A prominent Disciple minister has been called to an influential church in the South, charmed from his present field by a handsome salary and the gift of an automobile. With that salary and with the rights of the congregations, in matters of this sort, we have nothing to do. But in matters which jeopardize the future of this Restoration movement, as exhibited in the gifts of an automobile, we could not remain silent without being recreant to the trust imposed on us by the brotherhood.

Our gifted brother may make calls in his automobile if he pleases, but let him not delude himself that he has anything in common with his brethren who are devoting themselves to the furtherance of the plea. Imagine the Rev. Simon Peter, D. D., visiting the Jerusalem brethren in an automobile! From the day that these man-made titles came into vogue among us, we knew that automobiles were inevitable. All such departures lead to Rome. Such baubles may be becoming in the people of Ashdod, but for us who have eschewed both their speech and their principles to fall into such dangers is to invite destruction.

We have known for some time that in certain quarters there has been a growing tendency to become too intimate with the sects, and this, in turn, has developed a deep-seated longing for the flesh pots of Egypt. All of which we record with sorrow. We believe in the Disciples so devoutly that we will not harbor the thought that at this time, when victory is in sight, they will turn their back upon their splendid history, and surrender all that we have gained for the bribe of an automobile.

It is not yet too late to rally our forces and check this daring innovation before it gains headway. If we do that the sacrifice can never be in vain. While conditions remain as they are, the brethren may count on us to lead the fight; and we can assure one and all that victory will perch upon our banners, if the faithful will come boldly to the front and hold up our hands. Now is the time to subscribe!

Alexander McLaren's Devotion to Preaching

Dr. McLaren's noble and historic ministry must be classed with that of his contemporary Spurgeon. Both were Baptists, and both their ministries were characterized by devotion to the ideal of preaching. They made everything else subordinate. It was with the greatest difficulty that Spurgeon could be induced to leave his pulpit to deliver a temperance address. All overtures to him for lecture tours were unheeded. In this particular the lives of both these English preachers present a marked contrast to our own Beecher and Talmage who were lecturers as well as preachers, and in the case of Beecher, prominent in moral and political reform. Both made fortunes on the lecture platform. A Life of Dr. McLaren by his daughter has recently appeared, and is reviewed by Dr. Robertson Nichol in the British Weekly. From it we learn that the great preacher gave himself unreservedly to the making of sermons. "There is no denying that this dedication to preaching led to many criticisms and questionings. For one thing, Dr. McLaren was very little of a pastor; for another thing he was not in the first instance a writer for the press. Though Dr. McLaren was kind in helping his brethren, and exceedingly loyal to the Baptist denomination, of which he was so bright an ornament, it cannot be denied that his appearances in public were comparatively rare, and by no means willing. He regarded the temptations to speak in public as interruptions of the work to which he was really called." Commenting further on this devotion, Dr. Nichol says:

"The danger of ministers in these days is continual talking. A great stimulus has been given to expression in the countless associations and conferences which have been organized. Men learn to speak very easily and fluently about most things, but it hardly ever happens that they speak with decisive power. Feeling and thought are not properly ripened, and the standards are lost. Men become perfectly satisfied with themselves if they have been fluent, if they have kept the attention of their audiences, if they have been frequently cheered, if they have worked up a peroration. They do not perceive how second rate and how shoddy is the terture of their thoughts and words."

Making Christmas Christian

Methodist preachers of Southern California took counsel together to direct the Christmas celebrations of their people into truly Christian channels. The widespread feeling of revolt against the extravagance and frenzy of the Christmas time found voice in a series of resolutions. It is reassuring to note in this connection the many reports from Disciple Sunday-schools of a "giving Christmas." The old fashioned Christmas tree with its mixture of happiness for those who received gifts and heart break for those who did not has about passed away. It was both undemocratic and un-Christian. Following are the resolutions passed by the Methodist preachers:

"Whereas, Christmas, the anniversary of our Lord's coming, dear to every Christian heart, is extensively and ever increasingly exploited for gain by commercial business, and

"Whereas, the universal custom of making gifts without regard to symbolizing heaven's gift to save the perishing world, has taken on extravagances that impose heavy burdens on people of moderate means as well as the poor, and

"Whereas, fashionable giving imposes on recipients a feeling of obligation to reciprocate in kind and quality equal to the gifts received, working hardships in many cases that might be avoided but for the prevailing custom, therefore,

"Resolved, that we recommend to our people thoughtful moderation in bestowing gifts, and we suggest that they be limited to simple tokens of love in the name of our Redeemer, and we further recommend that Christmas celebrations in our Sunday-schools be conducted in ways not to excite expectations of gifts, but rather to afford glad opportunities for giving for the relief of the sick and the destitute, and for the support of homes and hospital wards for children.

"Resolved, that we invoke the co-operation of all churches and the press in bringing about a modification of the stress of Christmas times by discouraging expensive gifts and in restoring this Christian festival to a glad celebration of the coming of our Lord."

—One sometimes wonders at the tremendous preponderance of the American and English interests in the International Sunday-school conventions, and at the fact that the official work is all in our own language, with apparently no provision made for those who do not speak our tongue. The figures recently published as the official Sunday-school statistics of the world set at rest all wonder on these points. In the United States there are 1,451,885 Sunday-school teachers; Canada, 85,632, and in all the world 2,411,373. The United States has more than half of all the world. Great Britain has 684,342. The three countries have 2,221,859, leaving only 189,514 for all the rest of the world. Total scholars in the world, 22,572,858; total scholars in Great Britain, 7,450,374; total scholars in Canada, 684,235; total scholars in the United States, 11,329,253; grand total in these three countries, 19,463,862, leaving only 3,108,996 for the balance of the world.

—The Commission of the Protestant Episcopal Church on the World Conference on Faith and Order of the Church of Christ has circulated nearly 150,000 copies of the Report of Progress in the preparations for the Conference published last August by its Committee on Plan and Scope. These have gone all over the world. Thousands of cordial and sympathetic replies have already been received showing a deep and widespread interest in this effort to approach the unity of the Christian Church. The resolutions of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church suggesting the Conference, with the report recommending that resolution and outlining the purpose and scope of the Conference, has been printed in English, French, Italian, Swedish, Latin, Greek, Russian and Dutch. Copies of these publications may be had free by applying to the Secretary, Robert H. Gardiner, Gardiner, Maine.

—The appointment of nineteen new Roman Catholic cardinals, four of whom are Americans, indicates the aggressive policies of the Vatican toward America. President Taft, by attending a Thanksgiving mass at one of the Washington churches, has stirred up no little adverse criticism. The Congregationalist and Christian World in a recent editorial, demurs at the notoriety given to these appointments, and at the observance of the mass in one of our navy yards. American citizens who regard the principles of our government as applicable to all, will deprecate a policy that seems to favor any sect as wholly foreign to the genius of our history. The only safeguard in a free country against the encroachments of Rome, or of any other power, is the liberty of discussion, and special privileges to none.

—In none of the fifteen Massachusetts cities which voted on license this year was there any change from "wet" to "dry" or "dry" to "wet." But temperance workers are encouraged over the net gain of 1,551 in the "dry" majority as a whole.

Mr. Watterson on Christianity

Address Delivered at Dedication of New First Church, Louisville

EDITORS' NOTE: As reported in The Christian Century last week, no little stir has been caused by the reactionary press concerning the address of Col. Henry Watterson, at the dedication of the new house of worship of First Church, Louisville, Ky., and Dr. E. L. Powell's cordial commendation of the brilliant editor's words. Light will be shed on the controversy, perhaps, by the publication of the address itself. In the copy that we have received, the paragraph quoted in our issue of last week does not appear. It was probably a good-natured introductory word, not belonging to the main address. Its statements which the over-sensitive might object to, are therefore to be taken in the informal good humor in which they were no doubt received by the auditors. We would not regard Mr. Watterson's address as a systematic and closely woven statement of views. It contains flashes of insight, however, which are most interesting and true.

"The groves were God's first temples," the poet reminds us as he sings his Forest Hymn to the gentle rhythm made by the twitter of birds and the rustle of leaves.

I am not sure that the exaltation we feel in the completion and consecration of this noble edifice is wholly responsive to the spirit of God that before all else must envelope and permeate the religion and the life we call Christian. There are those who think that crude simplicity alone befits a sanctuary. The amplitude and the stateliness here may mark an unconscious dissonance between our state of being and our confession of faith; between our professed humility and our love of display; for they seem somewhat at odds with the lowly attributes of the Nazarene we adore and the apostles whose light still shines upon us from the stormy banks of Jordan and the far away shores of the Sea of Galilee.

"They didn't know everything down in Judee," another famous but impious poet tells us; and since twenty intervening centuries have set the pace for lordly dome and cathedral spire, for the pageantry, the pomp, pride and circumstance of the church, both militant and holy, it is not for a poor layman, like me, to venture an opinion, or to utter a discordant note.

Art Does Not Destroy Simplicity.

In my personal experience of many lands I have not found that the grandeur and beauty wrought by the hand of man have obscured from me the radiance of the Christ, or the glory of the heavens. I have not found that storied urn, or animated bust has ever diverted my attention from the wondrous tale of the fishermen, or that piles of marble and alabaster encircling the altar, instead of the earlier archways of nature above it, have come between me and the worship of God. Whatever we behold around us and about us, that alone which makes us good men and women is essential: the grace of God—of God in everything, but most of all, of God within ourselves, God in our eyes, God in our mind, God in our hearts; and, whether this comes to us as pealing anthem swells the note of praise, or is brought by the chant of the choir invisible from the tree-tops and the skies, the essential matter is that God shall be conveyed to us.

Mystery in Life and Death.

My reading of late years has embraced not a few works which seek, or which affect, to deal with the mystery of life and death. In my mind they leave a mystery still. For all their learning and research—their positivity and contradiction—none of the writers know more than I think I know myself and all that I think I know myself may be abridged to the simple rescript, I know nothing. The wisest of us reck not whence we came, or whither we go; the human mind is unable to conceive the eternal in either direction; the soul of man being inscrutable even to himself.

"The night has a thousand eyes,
The day but one,
Yet the light of the bright world dies,
With the dying sun;

The mind has a thousand eyes,
The heart but one,
Yet the light of a whole life dies,
When love is gone."

All there is to religion therefore is faith; all that there is to the church is the spirit of God shining upon us, through belief in Christ our Lord. There is nothing else. They tell us the church is losing its hold upon men. It that be true it is because either it gives itself over to theology—the pride of opinion—or yields itself to the celebration of the mammon of unrighteousness.

Christ's Present Supremacy.

I do not believe that it is the truth. Never in the history of the world was Jesus of Nazareth so interesting and predominant as at this moment. Between Buddha teaching the blessing of eternal sleep, and Christ teaching the blessing of eternal life, mankind has been long divided, but slowly, surely, the influence of the Christ has overtaken that of the Buddha until that portion of the world which has advanced most by process of evolution from the primal state of man to the miracles of modern discovery and invention, now worships at the shrine of Christ and Him arisen from the dead, not at the sign of Buddha and total oblivion.

A little while ago, in response to some remarks of mine touching my wonder that the Jewish people should continue to reject the single immortal Jew of the ages, a good rabbi in this city sent me an elaborate protest in which he undertook not, indeed, to revile Jesus of Nazareth, but to enumerate and emphasize the crimes of the church we call Christian. His communication was wholly controversial. It was not delivered, I thought, with the very best grace. But I could not gainsay its indictment of Christianity as history records it, and I printed the Hebraic screed without comment or reply.

Superstition and Controversy.

The blessed birthright from God, the glory of heaven, the teaching and example of the Prince of Peace, have been engulfed beneath oceans of ignorance and superstition through two thousand years of embittered controversy. During the dark ages, coming down even to our own time, the very light of truth was shut out from the eyes and hearts and minds of men. The blood of the martyrs we were assured in those early days was the seed of the church. The blood of the martyrs was the blood of man—weak, cruel, fallible man—who, whether he got his inspiration from the Tiber, or the Rhine, from Geneva, from Edinburgh, or from Rome, did equally the devil's work in God's name. None of the vice-regents of heaven, as they claimed to be, knew much or seemed to care much about the word of the gentle One of Bethlehem, whom they had adopted as their titular divinity, much as men in commerce adopt a trade mark. It was knock-down and drag-out theology—the ruthless machinery of organized churchism—the rank materialism of things temporal—not the teaching of Christ and the spirit of the Christian religion, which so long filled the world with crime and tears. I might have made that answer to my friend the rabbi.

Christ as Master.

I might have said to him, "What matters it whether Jesus was of divine or human parentage—a human being or an immortal spirit—he was a Jew; a glorious, unoffending Jew, done to death by a mob of hoodlums in Jerusalem; why should not you and I call Him Master and kneel together in love and pity at his feet?"

"I believe in God, the Father, Almighty; Maker of heaven and earth, and Jesus Christ, his only son, who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead and buried; He descended into Hell, the third day He arose again from the dead; He ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God, the Father Almighty; from thence He shall come to judge the quick and the dead."

"This is My Religion."

"That is my faith. It is my religion. It is my cradle song. It may not be—nay, it is not—your cradle song, nor your faith, nor your religion. What boots it? Can you discover another in word and deed, in luminous, far-reaching power of speech and example, to walk by the side of this the anointed one of your race and of my belief?"

"As the Irish priest said to the British prelate touching the doctrine of purgatory: 'You may go further and fare worse, my lord,' so may I say to you—though the stars in their courses lied to the wise men of the desert, the bloody history of your Judea, altogether equal in atrocity to the bloody history of Christendom, has yet to fulfill the promise of a Messiah—and, were it not well for those who proclaim themselves God's people to pause and ask themselves, 'Has He not arisen already?'"

What Shall the Church Do?

The world is at this very moment appalled by what is happening among the Confucians in China and the Christians and Mohammedans in Africa. The crusades—forms of collective insanity—were not half so barbarous and relentless. What shall, what may, the church do?

But what church? In Rome there is war between the Quirinal and the Vatican, the government of Italy and the papal hierarchy. In France the government of the republic and the church of Rome are at daggers drawn. England and Germany—each claiming to be Protestant—look on askance, irresolute, not as to which side may be right and which wrong, but on which side "is my bread to be buttered." In America, where it was said by the witty Frenchman we have fifty religions and only one soup, there are people who think we should begin to organize to stop the threatened coming of the pope, and such like! "Oh, liberty," cried Madame Roland, "how many crimes are committed in thy name!" Oh, churchism, may I not say how much nonsense is trolled off in thy name!

Absolute Power to None.

I would think twice before trusting the wisest and best of men with absolute power; but I would trust never any body of men—

Our Readers' Opinions

A Communication From Z. T. Sweeney

Dear Bro. Morrison: Issues of The Century for Nov. 2nd and 9th came while I was making an extended tour in the west and I have not had time to consider your articles of those dates until today. We have at last arrived at a place in this discussion where we can consider some controverted points.

Before doing so, I wish to call attention to your reply made by adopting a letter from Bro. J. S. Hughes as your own. The gist of that letter is that men in the apostolic days acted upon their visions rather than upon the commission of our Lord in receiving people into the church. I don't think this is correct, but suppose it is. What of it? Not one of them ever had a vision that led him to ignore or change any of the terms of that commission. They all preached the terms of that commission. They all admitted people into the church upon the terms of that commission. This fact ought to cause men who are having "visions" today, leading them to alter or change the commission of our Lord, to stop and think a little.

Bro. Hughes' whole article is answered by Jehovah himself in Jer. xxiii-28, "The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream; and he that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully. What is the chaff to the wheat? saith Jehovah." I never feed on chaff when I have plenty of wheat. This may make me a legalist, but I am not worried over that. A legalist is one who stands for close adherence to law, and when one is following a divine law, he cannot adhere to it too closely. It certainly is not a besetting sin with modern editors and preachers. Men today are trying to overturn the plain law of the Lord by substituting something else for it, and that is religious anarchy. As between legalism and anarchism, if compelled to make a choice, I am decidedly in favor of legalism.

Now for your own position. I have carefully analyzed it as far as I am able, and it is founded upon a series of simple, unadulterated assumptions that are at war with both the New Testament and common sense. They are pure Morrisonisms. Let us examine them.

I. (1) Assumption First: Baptism is a psychical act. This my brother, is the spinal cord in your whole contention. If that is false, all your position falls to the ground. This assumption has not a shadow of support in the Word of God. All the New Testament references to baptism show it to be an act performed upon the candidate by some one from without. Jesus told his disciples to baptize men. Peter told the Pentecostians to "be baptized." Phillip baptized the Eunuch. Ananias told Saul to "arise and be baptized."

(2) These and all other references to baptism in the New Testament show as clearly as daylight that baptism is something performed upon a man by another from without. A psychic act takes place within one. It cannot be performed for one by another. Only a physical can be performed on one by another. If baptism is a psychic act, every statement made concerning it in the New Testament is crazy and at war with the facts. In the process of turning to God there are two psychic acts and one physical act. Faith and repentance are psychic and baptism is physical. Not a mere physical act, but the physical act that expresses, or as you may prefer, "solemnizes" the inward psychic acts of faith and repentance.

(3) God always commands men to believe and repent because they are psychic, and no one can do these things for them; but he asks men to "be baptized" because it is a physical act that must be performed by another. If baptism is a psychic act, God would command man to baptize instead of be baptized.

(4) Now my brother, come up to the work like a man and show your readers a case of psychic or "inward baptism" [the expression "inward baptism" is not a quotation from The Christian Century.—The Editors] in the New Testament—a baptism that is performed by the candidate himself. This you must do to bolster up all your teaching upon baptism. And this, I predict, you will utterly fail to do. Moreover, you have repeated affirmed that baptism "initiates into the church." If you will turn to your dictionary it will tell you that initiation is "a ceremonial admission into a society." The same dictionary says a ceremony is "a formal act, rite or observance." A formal act is an act that has form. If it has form it can be seen, and is therefore a physical act. A psychic act can't be seen. Your assumption is not only unscriptural, but it is unpsychological. Psychology tells us that man is composed of intellect, sensibilities and will. The act of faith transforms the intellect from a state of unbelief or disbelief to one of belief; the act of repentance transforms the sensibilities from a state of indifference or hatred to one of love; the act of baptism transforms the will of man from an outward visible state of rebellion to one of outward visible subjection to the law of God.

In olden times when a man ascended the Turkish throne he proceeded to slay all that had any sort of claim to the succession. To establish your claim that baptism is a psychic act, you must destroy both the New Testament and our present psychology and reconstruct both on a different basis. This is a large task.

II. Assumption Second: "Infant baptism is valid where the subject having grown to an accountable age assumes the relations and duties of church membership."

That is another Morrisonism at war with the gospel, with psychology and with Morrison himself, as I will proceed to prove. In the same issue from which the above quotation is made you have an editorial condemning infant baptism for the following good and sufficient reasons, viz.: (a) "There is not the slightest New Testament precedent for it. Baptism was a rite applying only to adults." (b) The New Testament places the ordinance beyond the reach of infants. (c) The nature of the church bars the initiation of infants. (d) Baptism of infants arose out of the false doctrine of original sin and no benefit can accrue from it.

Those arguments are clear, logical and consistent and do credit to your editorial page. Yet you give this all away in the same issue by assuming the validity of infant baptism. You simply say that a man by assuming church relations and duties can render valid an act for which there is no divine authority—which is placed by the New Testament as an impossible thing—which is barred by the nature of the church—which arose in falsehood and is powerless to benefit. If that isn't facing both ways on infant baptism, I am an idiot. It is not only un-Morrison, but it is against a true moral philosophy.

It is an unquestioned principle of moral philosophy that a man is bound to live up to the best that is within him at all times and under all circumstances. If a man does well today he has only done his duty. If he does better tomorrow he has still done nothing more than his duty. Nothing but an act of restitution has anything of a compensative character in it. When a man assumes church duties and relations he only does his duty; there is nothing in that act to remedy any improper act either of his own or someone else previous to that time. Your infant baptism "validation" is therefore at war with moral philosophy. That it is at war with the New Testament your editorial clearly demonstrates.

Again, you will have to reconstruct the New Testament, moral philosophy and Morrison also, before you can establish your second assumption.

III. Assumption third: A large portion of the unquestionable membership of the Church of Christ is made up of those who have received no other baptism than infant baptism.

This again is another Morrisonism, an assumption that has no foundation in fact. You cannot prove it if your life depended upon it. It outdoes any sectarian advocate of infant baptism on earth. They do claim some sort of scriptural authority for the practice, but you say it is without New Testament authority; that the New Testament prerequisites bar it; the nature of the church bars it; that it arose out of falsehood and is utterly useless.

Who gave you power to overrule New Testament authority—New Testament prerequisites for baptism—and admit into the Church of Christ people whom the church by its very nature bars out? You must give your intelligent readers a little more than mere assumption before they will swallow such dough as that. The time is now ripe for you to show someone admitted into the Church of God—by divine authority—on his infant baptism.

IV. Assumption Fourth: In all the above assumptions you pose as a true and real representative of the Disciples of Christ.

This is another Morrisonism—a bald faced assumption that may be easy to assert, but utterly impossible to prove. As a practical test I challenge you to make a single quotation from any great representative leader of this people that sustains your assumptions. Give the name of any editor besides those of your own paper that will stand for your assumptions. Give the name of any college president or Bible teacher that will say you stand for the Disciples. Give the name of any pastor of any influential church among us that will endorse your assumptions. Give the name of any secretary or president of one of our national societies that will endorse your assumptions.

You can't fool the Disciples of Christ. They know the difference between a "fish and a serpent." If you wish to fire on the flag of the Disciples nobody will object if you will do it like a man from the outside instead of from the inside of their ranks.

I will thank you to publish this article entire as it is and reply to it in another article. Yours for Christ,

Columbus, Ind. Z. T. Sweeney.

Further Correspondence

My dear Brother Sweeney: Your esteemed communication of Dec. 22 is at hand. It was my wish to give the same to the readers of the Christian Century at once, as there have been, in the long interim since your latest letter appeared, many inquiries concerning your response, the editors having been censured for withholding the further communication which our critics assumed you surely had sent.

In undertaking to reply to your letter now in hand, however, I am at a loss to know how to construe the section which you call "Assumption Third." It has always been my understanding that the Disciples do regard as members of the Church of Christ multitudes who have received no other baptism than infant baptism. I do not remember ever hearing this view questioned by any of my brethren. The implication of your statements under "Assumption Third" seems to be that you deny that any one is a member of the Church of Christ who has received only so-called infant baptism. But I am not sure. Am I right in making this inference? I do not wish to spend my own and our readers' time in the gratuitous exercise of supporting a position that no one disputes. A brief statement from you touching this point will clear up a dark corner of the discussion.

If I am wrong in making this inference, and you do regard them as members of the Church of Christ, refusing, however, to accept their baptism as valid, will you please explain—to use your own expression—"how you get them in without baptism." This question was the main point in our editorial reply to your last article, and it seems to me that, for the sake of clearness in our correspondence, it should be answered before we present our respective views again to the public.

An early response will avoid any further delay in the publication of your communication. With Christian greetings for the New Year, I remain, Very sincerely yours,

December 29, 1911. C. C. MORRISON.

Dear Bro. Morrison: Replying to your favor of yesterday, I beg to say that I never knew of a congregation of Disciples of Christ receiving anyone into their membership who had received no other baptism than infant baptism. I never knew an editor or a representative preacher among us that admitted that any one was ever inducted into the Church of Jesus Christ by infant baptism. We have always questioned the validity of infant baptism for the following good and sufficient reasons, viz:

1. "There is no New Testament authority for it."
2. "The New Testament prerequisites bar it."
3. "The nature of the church bars it."
4. "It arose in falsehood and cannot possibly benefit anyone."

How can I as a rational man, believing the above statements, admit that infant baptism has anything to do with admission into the Church of Christ? Sincerely,

December 30, 1911. Z. T. SWEENEY.

Dear Brother Sweeney: I regret to consume any more time in direct correspondence before publishing your communication and our reply. But the point of inquiry seems to me of vital importance for clearness in our public exchange of views.

I seem not to have made my inquiry clear to you, for your reply does not apply to it at all. The question is not whether any congregation of Disciples ever "received any one into their membership who had received no other baptism than infant baptism." This question of fact is not in dispute between us. Nor is the question whether you, "as a rational man," can "admit that infant baptism has anything to do with admission into the Church of Christ."

The question as stated in my letter and in The Christian Century's response to your communication in the issue of November 9 is simply, Do you hold that there are members of the Church of Christ who have had no other baptism than infant baptism? Your letter just received leaves me entirely in the dark on this point. If you do hold that any such persons are members of the Church of Christ and refuse, however, to regard their baptism as valid, will you explain how they became members of the Church of Christ without baptism.

I am entirely at a loss to know how to respond to your communication until I have received an explicit statement from you on this point. I hope your reply may reach me in time to allow the publication of your article in the next issue. Very truly yours,

January 2, 1912. C. C. MORRISON.

Dear Bro. Morrison: Yours of the 2nd to hand. In reply will say that I do not hold "that there are members of Christ's Church who have received no other baptism than infant baptism."

I do not hold it because I am not authorized by Jesus Christ to hold it. You and I both agree that "without baptism there is no membership in the Church of Christ." You have repeatedly stated this. We further agree that infant baptism is no baptism at all. As soon as you can demonstrate that a man has been scripturally baptized I am willing to acknowledge his membership in the church. Until you do there is a question mark before his membership, with me.

I fully and freely recognize his piety, devotion and sincere intentions, but if he has failed to comply with gospel prerequisites for membership, I don't feel called upon to change the gospel requirements to suit his condition. God has limited me to the terms of the gospel, though He may not have limited Himself. Sincerely and fraternally,

January 4, 1912. Z. T. SWEENEY.

The Christian Century's Reply

The correspondence between Dr. Sweeney and Mr. Morrison which we print above in connection with the former's article is self-explanatory. Concerning the position which Dr. Sweeney finally assumes in his last reply to Mr. Morrison we intend to make further comment next week.

Dr. Sweeney evades Mr. Hughes' point as completely as his communication evades the point of our editorial. Mr. Hughes' position was that the formal commission held no such authoritative place in the early church as is assumed by legalistic writers; he even doubted that the commission was in possession of the apostles. Mr. Hughes did not suggest that the contents of the commission as we have it were contradicted by the procedure of those who received individual "visions." His point was that the failure of the New Testament record ever to refer to the commission after it was alleged to have been given, together with the necessity of frequent special communication to individuals of the very things so precisely itemized in the commission, goes to prove that no such authoritative regulation was in their possession, and thus invalidates any legalistic system which may be built upon it. Our reason for connecting Mr. Hughes' article and Dr. Sweeney's article was that the latter made of the commission a legal norm, using such expressions as: "It took Jesus thirty-three years to develop that commission;" and, "There is no authority to preach salvation from sin except what is found in that commission." It was not the contents of the commission that Mr. Hughes objected to, but the legalistic use of it. Dr. Sweeney our readers will feel, has not touched this point at all. Indeed it is doubtful if he comprehended Mr. Hughes' position, judging by his remarks on legalism above, which remarks will be considered in a further article promised above for next week.

The characterization of The Christian Century's position under the headings of four "simple, unadulterated assumptions" discloses on Dr. Sweeney's part some very interesting modes of reasoning. These "assumptions" and our brother's comments upon them we shall consider in order. The Roman numerals and the paragraph numbers have been attached for the reader's convenience.

I. (1) That "baptism is a psychical act" is not a statement of The Christian Century. Our statement is that baptism is essentially a psychical, social, spiritual act. We do not deny that there is a physical aspect to the baptismal act, some objective sign in which the will of the organized society called the church meets the will of the individual candidate. But we affirm that the particular objective sign is incidental as compared with the psychical, spiritual purpose. Over against Dr. Sweeney's statement that this position "has not a shadow of support in the word of God" we affirm that the word "baptize," in the New Testament regularly conforms to this definition. The articles on the meaning of baptism now appearing in The Christian Century are engaged, in current issues, in an examination of actual scripture usage to see whether this social conception of baptism is true or erroneous. All the scriptures so far examined approve such a conception and make the physical conception appear absurd.

Still, Dr. Sweeney's own statements contradict him. In his formulation of eight points of agreement between himself and The Christian Century, published in the issue of Sept. 14, agreement number seven is stated thus: "Baptism, to be Christian baptism, must contain [italics ours] the self-consecration of the candidate and his initiation into the church. It may contain more—I think it does, much more—but we both agree that it must contain that much." Before subscribing to this statement we substituted the word "is" for "must contain." But taking Dr. Sweeney's statement as he wrote it, he completely contradicts his present position that baptism is a physical act. A physical act cannot contain "the self-consecration of the candidate." That is a psychical, inward, spiritual thing, and yet in his earlier statement Dr. Sweeney stretches the concept "baptism" so as to contain it. Moreover in paragraph (4) above, Dr. Sweeney says "baptism" transforms the will from . . . rebellion to . . . . subjection." How can a physical act transform the will? The will is psychical. The fact is that the subject of baptism cannot be talked about, not even by Dr. Sweeney, without assuming a psychical meaning.

There are two or three statements in this section that must be considered. "Only a physical act can be performed upon one by another." This is a strange thing for a mature man to say. We can find no other word by which to characterize it than puerile. It is mere boy's thinking. We do bestow love upon another. We do give ideas to another—we are engaged in the ceremony of bestowing one upon Dr. Sweeney just now! We can endow another with authority—when President Harrison appointed Dr. Sweeney consul-general to Turkey he performed this act upon him. All these are psychical acts. They involve tokens of love, signs of ideas and symbols of authority, but the essential acts of bestowing love, giving an idea, and conferring authority are psychical.

Again, Dr. Sweeney appears to be badly confused in his reading of the New Testament commands concerning baptism. "If baptism was a psychical act, God would command men to baptize instead of to be baptized," he says. But Christ does command men to baptize, in the definite words of the commission: "Go ye . . . make disciples . . . baptizing them." If baptism is an act performed by men it must be, according to Dr. Sweeney's admission just quoted, a psychical act.

But what has become of our brother's wits when he assumes that because the act of baptism is performed upon the candidate therefore the candidate's part in it is purely physical?

What sort of obfuscation is this that describes the candidate as playing a purely physical part in baptism, because, forsooth, he is not the administrator of it? Does not the recipient of love participate in the psychical act of its bestowal? Does not the learner of an idea participate in the psychical act of imparting it? Does not the appointee of the state participate in the psychical act of conferring authority upon him by the state? Does not also the candidate participate in the psychical, spiritual act of baptism by which the status of a Christian is conferred upon him? Does baptism mean nothing to him? If it means nothing then let the church go out and lay hands on whomsoever it can, and baptize them, put them through the physical act. But if baptism means something to the candidate, this meaning, whatever it is, is psychical. And the meaning of a thing is always the essence of it.

We hesitate to continue to expose the puerilities of a man of Dr. Sweeney's dignity, and can find heart to do so only from the fact that he has approached the subject with the evident purpose of discrediting the right of this paper to represent the Disciples of Christ. In paragraph (4) Dr. Sweeney uses the words "inward baptism" in quotations. From whom he quotes does not appear. He does not quote from this paper. Such an expression is not ours. Baptism is, to us, an overt act—and none the less psychical for that. The challenge to find in the New Testament an instance of baptism performed by the candidate himself is not pertinent. The baptismal act is a joint-act, and we ask Dr. Sweeney to find a New Testament instance where it was performed without the candidate contributing his proper share of the total act.

There are two additional points in paragraph (4) to which we must advert. The first is the astounding line of reasoning by which Dr. Sweeney undertakes to prove that initiation is a physical act: Initiation is ceremonial admission; ceremony is a formal act; a formal act is an act that has form; form can be seen; what is seen is physical. Any school boy can point out the fallacy here. Because an act is formal it does not follow that it is merely formal. A ceremony of initiation is a formal act but it is also an act with meaning. It means something to the society and it means something to the candidate. This meaning is psychical and, as we say above, it is the essential part of the ceremony. Every intelligent act has both form and meaning—acts of social initiation are no exception. A society uses ceremony because it is only thus that the social mind can convey and execute its meanings, its purposes.

There is a singularly entertaining touch of reminiscence in Dr. Sweeney's appeal to psychology. The dictum, "Man is composed of intellect, sensibilities and will," strikes us like meeting a long lost friend. Here is the old veteran accompanied by its three logical children: Faith to change the intellect, Repentance to change the sensibilities and Baptism to change the will. But no sooner do we approach them to extend our greetings than they vanish, veteran, children and all. There isn't an element of reality in them. They are fictions, long since exposed by a more thorough psychology.

One need not be a technical psychologist to settle the matter for himself. If he will examine his faith he will find that it deals with the whole of himself, and not with his intellect primarily but primarily with his will. If he will examine his repentance he will see that it involves not a change of his "sensibilities" (whatever they are) but of his whole self, and primarily of his will. If he will examine his baptism, too, he will find that it involves his whole mental, spiritual life, the giving of himself—his self—to the kingdom of God. And if he will look a little deeper into himself he will find that to speak of his being "composed" of three elements which may act and be acted upon separately, not only does not answer to any reality in his soul but does violence to the obvious facts of his experience.

II. The whole of this section is irrelevant to our position. Dr. Sweeney failed to follow our statements. He gives the impression here that we affirmed that the assumption of the relations and duties of church membership by one who was "baptized" in infancy validates the thing that was done in infancy. This we did not affirm. We defined "infant baptism" in such terms as to make it essentially adult baptism. The following quotations from The Christian Century's reply to Dr. Sweeney will make our position clear:

"The only infant baptism which we regard as valid—or possessing any meaning whatever to the subject of it—does include both . . . self-consecration and induction."

"Without such personal assumption of relations and duties the act of sprinkling water upon the child is utterly without meaning—just as meaningless as the immersion of an adult would be who did not personally assume these duties and relations."

"When we see such an one actually inside the Church of Christ, assuming for himself the responsibilities and relationships which his parents and the church by faith pledged him to, we have no choice save to acknowledge that he has been baptized, howsoever irregular we must conceive his baptism to be. He must have been baptized because he is already in."

"For this is what baptism is: the actual self-consecration of an individual to Christ and his induction into the Church of Christ."

To say this is not to say that the ceremony as it was performed in infancy is validated or approved. It is simply to say that his actual membership puts his initiation or baptism beyond dispute.

Unless we are prepared to unchurch those who have received no other baptism than what they call "infant baptism" there is nothing for us to do but to regard their initiation as valid, though we need not regard it as regular or give it our approval for subsequent practice.

III. The context from which Dr. Sweeney quotes "assumption third" is as follows:

"The validity of infant baptism in this sense is beyond dispute. A large portion of the unquestionable membership of the Church of Christ is made up of those who have received no other baptism. The Disciples of Christ have always regarded them as Christians, members of the church of Christ."

We call attention to the words "in this sense," referring to our definition of the only kind of "infant baptism" we regard as valid. Concerning this kind of "infant baptism"—which by the terms of our definition involves the essential features of adult baptism—we find ample warrant in the scripture for regarding it as valid. None of the considerations urged against infant baptism as popularly conceived hold against the validity of the initiation into the church of those who come within the terms of the definition we are considering.

We mean to take Dr. Sweeney seriously in his request for names. Perhaps no more serviceable names can be found than those used in our previous articles: Washington Gladden, Jane Addams and Robert E. Speer. To these we might add three more: Henry Drummond, David Livingstone and John Wesley. These all, we affirm are or were members of the Church of Christ, admitted into it by divine authority with no other baptism than "infant baptism."

IV. As we have just said, it is our purpose to respond to Dr. Sweeney's request for names. The Christian Century is not more secure in any conviction than in that concerning the attitude of the great body of Disciples toward the Christian status of the members of the great evangelical denominations. We do not belong to a body of people who regard the Church of Christ as limited only to those who have been immersed at baptism. We therefore welcome the challenge in the fourth section of Dr. Sweeney's article. We could not ignore it if we would. Dr. Sweeney is himself one of the best known preachers among the Disciples, deserving from the standpoint of personal reputation to be considered a representative of his brethren. In respect to the position he takes in the above communications we dispute his representativeness. We affirm that the Disciples hold contrary views to those expressed by him. Dr. Sweeney asks us to give the names of representative Disciples who will endorse our "assumptions." Before doing so we prefer to take the issue out of its controversial form by making a re-statement in six affirmations which explicitly cover all the points of the discussion. These affirmations are as follows:

I. The Disciples believe that Presbyterian, Congregationalist, Methodist and other evangelical churches practicing affusion and "infant baptism" are churches of Christ.

II. The Disciples believe that the members of these churches are members of the Church of Christ, even though three-fourths of them—to use Dr. Sweeney's estimate made in a previous article—received no other baptism than "infant baptism," and the great majority of the remainder were inducted into the church by adult affusion.

III. The Disciples know of no other way of admission into the Church of Christ except by being baptized into it.

IV. The Disciples believe, therefore, that baptism as administered by Presbyterian and other churches of Christ is valid, that is, it actually inducts men into the body of Christ. Such baptism, however, is regarded as irregular or defective, in that the outward form by which it was solemnized is a departure from the primitive practice.

V. The Disciples do not believe that baptism is a physical act. They believe that it is essentially a social, a spiritual, and therefore a psychical, act, using however an outward physical form as a symbol and token of its spiritual meaning.

VI. The Disciples believe they have strong grounds for practicing only immersion as this outward physical form, and they urge all churches of Christ to abandon other practices and to practice immersion only, as a loving testimonial to Christ and a means to Christian unity.

The Christian Century puts forward these affirmations as representing the sentiment and conviction of the Disciples of Christ. On all save two points we affirm that Disciple opinion has been explicit. These two points have not been brought consciously to the Disciples' attention until recent times, but we affirm that they are implicit in characteristic Disciple thinking. They are, first, the distinction between irregular and invalid baptism and secondly, the social interpretation of the baptismal act. (See affirmations IV and V.

With respect to the second point it should be said that it is not involved in our correspondence with Dr. Sweeney. Whether baptism is a physical act or essentially a psychical act is the point at issue. We affirm that the Disciples hold the view that it is essentially a psychical act without having defined clearly what the nature of its psychical content is.

With respect to the first point, that relating to irregular and invalid baptism, it remains for those Disciples who may not accept this distinction to show how the great majority of Presbyterians and Methodists become members of the Church of Christ if their baptism was not valid.

With these explanations we affirm the six statements above as representing the Disciples of Christ. Dr. Sweeney denies that these statements represent his brethren and calls upon us to name prominent persons who will support them. It is our purpose to do more than he asks. The following names have been put down not because we have from any of them any specific statement of views, but wholly in the faith that we know the sentiment of the Disciples, and in the knowledge that these men are truly representative leaders of the brotherhood.

Dr. Sweeney asks for the name of an editor. We will give the names of our three veteran editors: J. H. Garrison, W. T. Moore and J. A. Lord.

He asks for the name of a college man. We give him the following list: Presidents Crossfield of Transylvania, Bates of Hiram, Underwood of Eureka, Oeschger of Cotner, Howe of Butler, Bell of Drake, Serena of Keuka, Cramblett of Bethany, Johann of Christian; Professors Haggard and Kirk of Drake; Paul of the Missionary Training School, Sharpe and Taylor of Missouri Bible College, Jefferson, Calhoun and Deweese of College of the Bible, Peckham, Snoddy and Stauffer of Hiram, Lhamon of Drury, Payne of Kansas, Coler of Ann Arbor, Forrest of Virginia.

Dr. Sweeney asks for the name of an official of a national missionary society. We mention: Chilton, McCash, Lewis, Hopkins of the American Society, McLean, Rains, Corey, Allen of the Foreign Society, Cowherd, Muckley, Booth of Church extension, Mesdames Atwater and Harlan and Miss Pounds of the C. W. B. M.

Dr. Sweeney asks for the name of a single pastor of an influential church. In an entirely unsystematic way we allow our mind to run rapidly over our ministry and gather this list, which is not extended into a sort of year book for the sheer lack of time and space: H. O. Breeden, F. W. Emerson, Russell F. Thrapp, W. Bayard Craig, Bruce Brown, J. L. Garvin, J. R. Perkins, J. J. Haley, R. E. McKnight—on the Pacific Coast, B. B. Tyler and G. B. Van Arshal of Denver, H. H. Harmon of Lincoln, J. G. Slater of Minneapolis, C. C. Wilson of Milwaukee, Charles S. Medbury and Finis Idleman of Des Moines, F. W. Burnham, Edgar D. Jones, J. H. Gilliland, D. H. Shields, C. G. Kindred, Austin Hunter—all of Illinois, B. A. Abbott, W. F. Richardson, George H. Combs, L. J. Marshall, B. A. Jenkins, T. P. Haley—all of Missouri, A. B. Philputt, C. H. Winders, H. G. Hill, J. Boyd Jones—all of Indiana, E. L. Powell, I. J. Spencer, E. B. Barnes of Kentucky, C. J. Tanner of Detroit, J. H. Goldner, John E. Pounds, W. F. Rothenburger, A. W. Fortune—all of Ohio, John R. Ewers and Wallace Tharp of Pittsburgh, L. E. Sellers and George P. Rutledge of Philadelphia, H. D. C. Maclachlan of Richmond, W. L. Fisher of New York City.

We call our readers' attention to the fact that these names have not been set down as endorsing "us" or "our views" or our "assumptions." Their names are set down as representative men who endorse the essential position contained in our six affirmations above as a fair description of the position of the Disciples.

A HOME MISSION SURVEY

A Survey of Neglected Fields, planned by the Home Missions Council, has just been completed. This enterprise was launched last June, when representatives of twenty-two Home Mission Boards, desiring to know the actual facts about religious conditions in territories where they were appropriating money, decided to send a deputation of investigators. The preliminary investigation was confined to the following thirteen states: Minnesota, North Dakota, South Idaho, East Washington and North Idaho, West Washington, Oregon, North and South California, Utah, Wyoming, Colorado, Kansas, Nebraska and South Dakota. Members of the deputation were Secretaries L. C. Barnes, of the Baptist Home Mission Board, H. C. Herring, of the Congregational Home Board, I. N. McCash, of the American Christian Missionary Society, Ward Platt, of the Methodist Mission Board, J. E. Mc Afee, of the Presbyterian Home Board. This company of missionary workers held a day of consultation in each of fifteen centers of the above named states, and met representative workers and those connected with official boards administering Home Missions. To cover the territory necessitated a journey of 8,155 miles, five weeks of time and forty-three sessions. In addition to the above, your deputator addressed one brotherhood, one banquet, five schools, ten gatherings of our own people; held six conferences with the state boards, and assisted at the funeral of our beloved brother, O. W. Lawrence.

Plan of the Survey.

The plan of the survey was to hold consultations as preliminary to a complete survey of the unmet religious needs in each state. Local workers brought to the consultations prepared facts and statistics concerning their rural communities, small towns, congested centers, mining and lumber camps, Indians, foreigners and social ministry. The morning session was devoted to the presentation of these facts, followed by a free, frank discussion of the conditions. The afternoon session was given to the organization of a permanent committee on survey, and school districts were chosen as the unit of investigation. A uniform date, July 1, 1912, was named in all the states as the time when complete returns should be made. Blanks were provided for all expected conditions, and ample supplies furnished the survey committee. When all the statistics are gathered, a complete tabulation of them will be made for the use of national boards and field workers.

Purpose of the Undertaking.

The purpose of such an undertaking is to secure facts by the inductive method, and apply these in a business-like way to the Lord's work. Hitherto appeals have been made to mission boards, and grants of men and money made by them in many cases to towns already "over-churched." If the facts in such cases had been known, adjacent communities without the gospel of Christ would have received at least a portion of such appropriations. With definite data in possession of all home mission boards, shameful overlapping of accessible centers, and unchristian neglect of the more remote regions will be prevented.

Some Discoveries.

Startling discoveries of religious conditions were of daily occurrence at the time of the survey. All of the states visited have some towns more accessible than others that have too many church buildings. Cities, however, in the same region are "under-churched," when their own population and adjacent territory are considered. Evidence was convincing that in country districts there is an appalling religious situation which makes the term "neglected fields" appropriate. A few examples will illustrate this fact:

Fourteen counties in the northwestern part of North Dakota have but three permanent places in each for worship. 4,000 school districts in that state have no religious privileges whatever. Thousands of foreigners in North Dakota have never heard the word of God. Indians in reservations have schools and occasional Christian ministration, but there are yet 50,000 of them in the United States who are sun-worshipers and pagans and have never heard of Christ.

The Oriental Problem.

Orientals on the Pacific coast present a most important missionary problem. Proof was found at Portland and other cities that Chinese converted to Christ in America have gone back to China in such numbers that they are the most effective missionary workers in the province of Canton. Results of their labors in that province surpass all efforts of regularly directed missionaries. This fact pleads the wisdom of converting immigrants of all nationalities, if they are to become messengers of the cross through that large and voluntary foreign missionary enterprise, viz: "Home-going."

Buddhist Propaganda in America.

Another remarkable discovery was disclosed at this preliminary investigation. It is that there is a Buddhist propaganda in America, with Seattle, San Francisco, Los Angeles as centers of operation. Regularly installed priests perform the rites and ceremonies of their temples. They give lectures in various parts of those cities, and are reaching a great number of Americans, especially women. Mohammedanism has its advocates and adherents in the same region. Hindoo priests, with approximately 10,000 Hindoos in the United States, are preaching their doctrines. America is thus being invaded by the religions and cults of the Orient. Christianity is put on the defensive, and is now in a struggle to cause the light to shine in places where shadows of paganism are beginning to fall.

Field workers, numberng from eight in Colorado to sixteen in Montana, testified in open session to having personal acquaintance with adult residents of the states named, who have never heard a sermon.

The above are a few facts substantiated by a multitude of witnesses.

Educational Effects of the Survey.

The time is too short to formulate a just comparison of effects, but some of the following are apparent:

The survey created and fostered a fraternal spirit among national secretaries of home missions and their boards; discovered to national boards that there is a geographic provincialism in the United States, evidenced by the varying strength and recognition of denominations in different parts of the homeland; actualized the fact that common factors enter into the home missions problems of all religious bodies; developed a wholesome appreciation and Christian regard among field workers, which will exalt the church of Christ; promoted unity for a divided church through co-operation and the elimination of competition; emphasized the joint responsibility of national and field leaders for the expenditure of money entrusted to them for the enlargement of the kingdom of Christ. Such emphasis in every consultation has unquestionably softened denominational asperities; brought to the religious leaders in the states visited by the deputation, in a most satisfactory way, the plan of co-operative advance in home missions recommended by the Federal Council and endorsed by ten boards. The bulk of support given American missions by these boards, equals five-sixths of all missionary endeavor west of the Mississippi river.

It is the belief of the secretary, that the leadership of the Disciples of Christ in such a practical method will do much to substitute co-operation, without compromising principles, for competition, which creates confusion and works ruin to the cause of Christ in so many communities.

When the facts have been gathered by the permanent committee, and they have been tabulated, there will be a substantial contribution to the knowledge of conditions in America worth many-fold the time and cost of their gathering.

Instead of taking isolated cases upon which to base an appeal, the needs of the whole field will be put before contributors to home missions. It is a remarkable forward step to be taken in a united effort on the part of all leaders of Protestantism, and is the advance guard of that unity of God's people, to be made visible to the unspiritual. I. N. McCash, Secretary.

An Appeal to the Church of the United States in Behalf of the Family

By the Committee on the "Family Life" of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

We rest our appeal to you on the proposition that the family and its development into the home lie at the foundation of human welfare. Religion, education, industry and political order must look to the family for their material. Still more. For, as the great constructive and destructive forces in the field of biology have their final expression in the work of the cell, so it is in human society. The home is the place where all that builds up or pulls down in the social order does its final work. Religion, science and general experience teach this.

Two present tendencies have given shape to this appeal. One is the encouraging fact that there is an increasing conviction of the importance of these truths, together with much effort to protect and develop family life. The other is the prevalence of great domestic evils. Our institutions of learning in their courses of study and our philanthropic societies in their practical work are giving increased attention to the family. Many are coming to see in the home the very crux of the social problem. The report of the census office on marriage and divorce, the disclosures of the Chicago Vice Commission and the complaints of experts in public education and religious training, set forth the grounds for the latter statement.

We, therefore, think it time for the churches to come to the front and do their duty to the family. We now, however, point to only three or four things that seem in most immediate need of attention and action.

1. A uniform marriage law has lately been prepared to follow the uniform divorce law now in process of enactment by the states. We recommend these measures, though they may not be wholly ideal, to your attention. The clergy have widely called for some such provisions to meet the evils of discordant legislation, especially as a protection against migratory marriage and divorce.

But we especially urge the need of a similar comity between the churches themselves so that persons who cannot be married by their own ministers will not resort to those of other churches for the object. Do not consistency, the responsibilities for social leadership and the obligations of Christian fraternity demand this course from all our churches? Shall we not in this way observe that comity between churches that we are demanding of the states?

2. We also urge at this time that great care in the marriage of persons unknown to the officiating clergymen and of those who are morally or physically unfit for married life.

3. The terrible evils of sexual vice are in urgent need of attention by the clergy, teachers and parents, in ways that are wise and efficient. We gratefully recognize the growing interest in this subject and urge the leaders of the church to become intelligent concerning it and to co-operate in all practical ways with the medical profession and with competent associations for dealing with it.

4. Only one thing more at this time. Our Churches should lead their people to see that the family has its true place in the activities of religion, education and public order. As implied in what we said at the outset, the vigor and safety of all other institutions depend on the extent to which they strengthen the life of the family. Every tendency in any of these that weakens the home should be resisted. Every plan for their own welfare should include a knowledge of its effect on the home. Because of its importance and because of its relative neglect, the home should receive more direct and positive attention.

We commend these brief considerations of a great subject to the serious attention of the churches of our country, leaving the practical details of their application to be wrought out by them as their several systems of administration may suggest.

We are, in the interests of our common faith, most cordially yours,

In behalf of the committee,
Wm. Croswell Doane, Chairman,
Samuel W. Dike,
E. B. Sanford, Secretary.

Religion in Education

Today we try to make worthy citizens of the millions of children in our schools without attempting to teach them even the most rudimentary religious principles. By religious principles I do not mean dogma, merely the most rudimentary rules of moral conduct, which our fathers and mothers learned, but which our children are not learning. We have confused theology with religion, consequently even the moral code accepted by us all is not permitted to be taught in the schools. The family life of many is now so complicated that children never learn the importance of regularity or of concentration. It is often necessary for the child to be taken out of the family entirely and placed in school, where he may have the very things which he should learn at home. In Colonial days the children studied the New England Primer. That primer was typical of the religious atmosphere of the time. In those days the home was the place where character building began. It may have been narrow; it certainly was not a place for display, but it did give the child the training which gave him an invaluable start in the right direction. There are two general theories of education in vogue today. One insists that every person should receive the same education, claiming that in this way his likes and dislikes will be overcome and that he will be equipped to meet any exigency in the battle of life. The other says that vocational training is essential; that some specific trade or profession should be taught each person, according to his tastes and abilities. I am inclined to think that the theory of discipleship of personal contact with some one whose character and attainments surpass those of the student, and consequently win his respect, is the best way to educate our children.—W. H. P Faunce.

There are 323,000 Indians in the United States by the latest returns. The great body of the Indians live between the Mississippi and the Rockies. One third of the whole number in the United States—117,000—are in Oklahoma, where the Five Civilized Tribes have so long resided. The next largest settlement east of the Rockies is in the Dakotas, where there are 28,000 Sioux. Minnesota has 11,000 Indians, and Montana 10,000, made up of Crows, Blackfeet, Cheyennes, and Flatheads. Between the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada there are 71,000, 57,000 of these being in New Mexico and Arizona, among whom are 30,000 Navajos, who have a reservation about the size of Pennsylvania. The chief reservations east of the Mississippi river are in Michigan and Wisconsin, where there are 17,000 Indians, mostly Chippewas, and in New York state, where the descendants of the Iroquois, in number 5,476, live on six reservations under one agent. The reservations in Maine, South Carolina, North Carolina and Florida have only a few hundreds on them.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

Her Opposition to Suffrage

Mrs. Humphrey Ward Writes a Pathetic Letter to The London Times.

The last London Times to reach the editor's desk contains a pathetic letter from Mrs. Humphrey Ward regarding the condition of working women, which she considers an argument against woman suffrage, but the majority of people would consider it an argument the other way.

Referring to a speech of Sir Edward Grey, Mrs. Ward says: "One wonders how much these great men really know of the lives of the people they are speaking about! Sir Edward talks of poetry and metaphysics! I have in mind a dreary street in South London. Round the gates of a factory hang a crowd of children, including babies of four and five years old, crying for their mothers. But it is only half past six, and it will be seven before the mothers come out. So the children hang on drearily in the rain and the cold. Presently out come the mothers, and the children fling themselves on them. The closed dark houses are unlocked, and during the two or three hours before the tired women themselves go to bed everything that home and children require of women has to be done. Some of them—the widows—have been earning the daily bread of their children; others have been supplementing the earnings of husbands half employed or unemployed. A few poor hours in which to comfort and wash, to cook and sew! Are you going to propose that some of them shall be spent in reading newspapers and going to meetings? Poetry and metaphysics! Has Sir Edward Grey ever read the report of Sir George Newman, Chief Medical Officer of the Board of Education? Does he realize that 20 per cent of the children of our urban populations are in a verminous condition, because their mothers —poor mothers!—are without either the energy or the power to keep them clean? And it is upon thousands of women so unable to meet the first requirements of their home life that you propose to lay the duty of listening to Parliamentary candidates and voting on the reconstitution of the second chamber."

But if these women could vote would they tolerate a labor system which kept them working in the factories until seven o'clock, while their crying children stood at the gate waiting for them to come out?

Mrs. Ward goes on to say, "All that you can possibly do by giving the Parliamentary vote to large sections of women in this country is to weaken the intelligence and therewith the power of English democracy; and to hand over fresh material for manipulation to the wirepullers of every party."

But this is the old argument which always was used against the extension of male suffrage.

In concluding Mrs. Ward says, "We know now, after nearly a century of voting, that the greatest and profoundest changes are those that are never voted on; and that, while the vote as an indication that the balance of political power is on the same side as the balance of physical force, is of greater importance than ever, in our crowded democracy seething with unsettled questions of men's life and labor, and set among other democracies armed to the teeth, the vote as an instrument of reform, both by what it has not done and what has been done without it, takes a far more modest place than was given it by the men of fifty years ago."

There is much truth in this observation, but it is no more an argument against woman suffrage than man suffrage. Mrs. Ward can write better than she can argue. She might about as well say that woman should not vote because she pokes a fire on top. Does the fact that one child out of five needs a fine tooth comb make it unwise to give London women the right to help comb the snarls out of English politics and economics?

Educating Little Mothers

The newest departure in Chicago public schools is "little mothers' " classes, in which the girls are being instructed in the care of babies and young children. In fifty-six schools these classes are being opened, the instructions to be given on Saturday mornings. Dolls will be the babies and nurses will do the teaching in the proper methods of bathing, dressing, feeding and entertaining, and show the pupils how to make babies comfortable and keep them well. The board of health furnishes the necessary equipment for the classrooms. All girls need training in "mothercraft" quite as much as in cooking and sewing, which have long been taught in the public schools. But such knowledge will be of most immediate and far-reaching service among the "little mothers" of the tenements who have to take care of the younger children while the mother goes out to work. The older sister is more responsible than we have realized for infant mortality and for the manners and morals of our future citizens. We hope other cities will speedily follow the lead of Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, Chicago's far-sighted superintendent of schools.

Women of Note

—George Eliot's connection with Coventry, England, where she lived when she translated Strauss' "Life of Jesus," is to be commemorated in changing the name of Uppingham road to George Eliot road. The town council is also to place a tablet on the house in which the "Life of Jesus" was translated. The great English novelist lived there between 1841 and 1849.

—Karin Michaelis, the author of "The Dangerous Age," says, there would be less need of divorce if there were not so many mercenary girls and foolish gray-beards. Miss Michaelis is not far removed from the truth in this statement.

—Mrs. Robert La Follette, who writes so sensibly for the daily newspapers, says that the married woman who is unhappy though "happily married," because of a husband's limited income, should pitch in and go to work. Working women don't have time to be unhappy or make other people miserable or have social aspirations or climbing desires or indulge in a lot of other foolishness.

—According to the czarina, Russia's troubles are due to the education of women. All girls, says she, should be taught to sew, to care for their homes and to become helpful wives and good mothers, but they should never be taught history, philosophy or science, "because these studies, when offered to women, only result in such terrible times as Russia is now passing through." We might say in reply: Education for woman fills her with a desire for a better country in Russia, a state of affairs this royal wearer of diamonds and sables is violently opposed to.

—Mrs. Florence L. Barclay, well known as the author of the "Rosary" and "Following the Star," is the sister of Maude Ballington Booth, and the mother of eight children. Her husband is the vicar of a small parish in England, and yet she holds that the novel does more good and likewise could do more harm than the pulpit. She thinks that nothing that could give the reader a lower plane of thought should come into the novel. Mrs. Barclay belongs in a frame of twenty great women.

—Louisa M. Alcott's "Little Women," dear to the hearts of small girls for the last fifty years, has been dramatized by Miss Marian De Forest and is to be produced by Miss Jessie Bonstelle, who has already signed the contract to this effect.

—Mrs. Anne Maria Fisher, who was in her girlhood the slave of Henry Clay, died recently and left $10,000 to Tuskegee institute. Mrs. Fisher lived in Brooklyn, N. Y., and is said to have left an estate valued at more than $75,000, much of it to charity.

Woman in the Spot Light

Looking over the "Readers Index of Periodical Literature" the other day, the array of articles about women is impressive. This catalogue is an index of the articles published in over 100 leading magazines. The last four years' index contains an astonishing list of 22 pages in fine type, cataloging articles about women, including "Woman Suffrage," "Employment of Women" and the like.

Turning back to the heading "Man" with accompanying subheads, it is found that the articles under these captions took less than a page!

Which seems to indicate that the magazine editors of the United States and England find that articles on the specific activities of women draw just 22 times as many readers as articles on the specific activities of men.

The Perverse Husband

John Collier, the secretary of New York's board of moving-picture censors, said the other day:

"It's no good getting up objectionable picture plays. We never pass them. In fact, we turn them down so invariably that it seems to me the composers of such plays are animated by a spirit of perversity. They remind me of old Uncle Jethro Husk.

"Uncle Jethro sat fishing on the bank of a tiny rivulet, when a stranger stopped beside him and said:

"'Is it possible that there are any fish in such a small stream as that?'

"'No, there ain't none,' Uncle Jethro grunted.

"'But you're fishing?'

"'Yep,' said Uncle Jeth.

"'What, then, is your object?'

"'My object,' said Uncle Jeth, 'is to show my wife I ain't got no time to sift the ashes.'"—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Suppose

By Grace W. Castle.

If all that we say
In a single day,
With never a word left out,
Were printed each night
In clear black and white,
'Twould prove queer reading, no doubt.

And then just suppose
Ere one's eyes he could close,
He must read the day's record through,
Then wouldn't one sigh,
And wouldn't he try
A great deal less talking to do?

And I more than half think
That many a kink
Would be smothered in life's tangled thread,
If one-half that we say
In a single day
Were left forever unsaid.

The Swarm

By E. J. Farrington.

"You would better clip Queen Bess' wings," said Mrs. Stone to her son, Phillip, one morning when the sun shone out unusually bright and warm. "O there will be no swarming for a month yet," was Phillip's reply. "However, I will use the scissors on Queen Bess in a day or two."

Phillip and his mother lived on a little farm and derived their income, to a large extent from poultry and bees, Mr. Stone having passed away several years before. Queen Bess represented an investment of five dollars made the previous summer and was depended upon to improve the quality of the apiary, for it is possible to replace all the fifty or sixty thousand common black bees in a hive with Italians in the course of a few months by using a single tested Italian queen.

Beginning with a few colonies of blacks, Phillip was ambitious to own an apiary filled with pure-blooded Italian bees, but the purchase of Queen Bess had been made only after careful deliberation on the part of mother and son, for so large an outlay for a single bee meant much to them. To lose her would be a calamity, and so the boy had planned to adopt a frequent expedient among bee keepers and clip her wings with a pair of curved manicure scissiors, so that when she should lead a swarm from the hive, she would be unable to fly, but would fall in front of the entrance, where she could be quickly found. However, a suggestion from Frank Hadley that they spend a few days on the island in the river opposite the Stone farm drove all thoughts of bees from Phillip's mind, for it was too early for active work in the bee yard.

The two boys owned jointly a little tent which they stowed in the bow of a boat and rowed across to the island, a distance of half a mile or less. The weather was delightfully balmy for early spring and the boys thoroughly enjoyed their outing, roaming about the island, which was several miles long, with a farm or two at one end, cultivated in a half-hearted way by two men who were not looked upon as very desirable citizens.

The third day dawned warm and bright, but by nine o'clock a stiff breeze had come up, which continued to freshen rapidly. Suddenly Frank pointed to a little black cloud over the water.

"That looks like a swarm of bees," he exclaimed.

Phillip's eyes excitedly followed his companion's finger.

"My gracious," he cried, " it surely is, and it's coming this way."

Evidently the bees were driven from their course by the high wind. They swept in toward the shore however, and finally alighted on a small tree, about ten feet above the ground, at the edge of the camp clearing. The two boys were standing under them in a moment.

"I am sure they are my bees," said Phillip, "but I guess, at least I hope—it is, though, it is Queen Bess' colony, and there is Bess herself," as his eyes detected the golden hued queen among her black-coated retinue. "I must hive them somehow," and he looked about, sorely puzzled what to do. Just then a heavy voice broke in ungrammatically. "Them's my bees, boys, and I'm a-going back after a box."

A burly farmer stepped out from among the trees and looked covetously at the swarm hanging to the tree. The boys recognized him as one of the men at the end of the island.

"I beg your pardon," said Phillip, courteously, " but they are my bees. They have just came across from my home, and I recognize the queen because she is an Italian."

The man scowled. "Anyhow," he said, "them as gits 'em will have 'em."

With that he turned and strode off through the woods. The boys knew that he would soon return with a hive or box and try to secure the swarm.

"There is only one thing to do," said Phillip, "and that is for me to row across and get a hive. You stay here and watch. I'm off."

Quickly he pushed the boat into the water and started to row, but the wind had increased in velocity until it was a gale. That, combined with the current, made it impossible for him to keep his course. He pulled steadily for twenty minutes but the force of the wind constantly drove him back toward the shore so that he made but little progress. Then, too, the river was becoming very rough, so that the boat began to ship water, and Phillip saw that he was really in danger of capsizing or being swamped. In great distress of mind he finally gave up the attempt to pull across the stream, for he was obliged to admit that he would certainly be too late, even though he should be able to make the trip safely.

Then he headed the boat toward the island shore and endeavored to pull back to the site of the camp, but found himself in an eddy, and was forced to row desperately in order to free the boat. The current caught him again as he endeavored to strike a new course and one of the light oars was wrenched from his grasp and whirled away down the stream. As he instinctively tried to recover it, the boat shipped so much water that he was compelled to begin bailing with his hat. Finally a sharp but friendly gust of wind drove him high upon the bank, wet and half exhausted.

He stepped out of the boat into a mass of tangled underbrush and as he drew the boat a little higher in the bank for safety, he stumbled over a naked old tree—a giant in its day, but which had lain humbled and prostrate for many years.

As the boy scrambled to his feet, he found himself looking at a section of a limb about two feet long which had been broken from the tree. It had no bark and the ends were rotted and jagged, but it was HOLLOW. Phillip's eyes danced with delight. His fatigue seemed to vanish in an instant.

He lifted the fragment and found it light in weight. Putting it on his shoulder, he plunged into the thicket, forcing his way through the bushes and sprouts as rapidly as he could walk. With the river to guide him, he soon found himself in the camp clearing with the bees still swarming on the little tree.

A shout brought Frank to him and in a moment Phillip had explained his plan. Frank ran to the tent and procured an ax, with which he trimmed the ends of the hollow limb as smoothly as possible. Meanwhile Phillip stripped two pieces of birch bark from a near-by tree. Only a few minutes were required to nail a piece of the bark over an end of the hollow limb.

Then the boys carried the improvised hive to the tree where the bees clustered. The hive was placed under the tree and the latter bent over until Phillip could reach the swarm. The bees apparently were greatly disturbed by the wind and many of them were flying about excitedly. Phillip, ignoring the few stings, with the rapid but gentle motions of all good bee-keepers, and using Frank's cap, brushed the main cluster into the rough hive. He watched closely and was satisfied that Queen Bess went into the cavity. He made no attempt to hive all of the bees, feeling well content to save the major portion of the colony.

It was exciting work, quite different from the ordinarily simple operation of hiving a swarm, for a cloud of bees buzzed angrily about the boy and his hands and face were swelling rapidly from the stings he received. He was quite unconscious of pain, however, and quickly tacked the second piece of bark over the top of the hive, leaving only a crevice for ventilation and covering that with a bit of mosquito netting which Frank brought from the tent.

Then, as a matter of precaution he carried the hive of bees in the tent, ignoring Frank's laughing protest that it would be a warm shelter for human beings, although that was obviously true, for hundreds of un-hived bees continued to hang about the new home of the swarm. Just as Phillip threw himself to the ground, tired out, the farmer broke through the trees, red of face from his rapid walk, and carrying an old-fashioned box hive. He glanced at the tree where the bees had clustered and saw that they had disappeared. Then he observed Phillip's enlarged countenance, and perhaps he caught the gleam of quiet satisfaction in the blue eyes behind the puffed cheeks. At any rate, he muttered something under his breath and disappeared into the woods once more.

That was the last the boys saw of him, for the wind died down in the course of the afternoon and they paddled back to the mainland with the colony of bees, which was soon lodged in a modern hive; but as may be imagined, Phillip did not allow another day to pass without clipping Queen Bess' wings.

CAN WE AFFORD TO LOSE OUR HONEST PREACHERS?

BY FRANK E. BOREN.

In a recent issue of the "Christian Evangelist," the editor has something to say about "One Honest Preacher in California." This preacher was declared honest because he had left the Disciples of Christ and united with the Episcopalians. It is not clear whether or not the editor intended to insinuate that there was only one honest preacher in California, and so I will not attempt to refute a charge that he may not have intended to make. The editor knows a goodly company of honest preachers in the state. But the question which the editorial aroused in my mind was, Can we afford to let our honest preachers leave us? Though I know well and favorably the preacher referred to, I know nothing of the merits or demerits of the case in question, and can therefore speak with the more perfect freedom. We are supposed to be a free people, and to have the freest pulpit under the sun. And, what if a preacher does not agree with "us" in all things, why can he not, with perfect honesty, stay with us,—provided his church will let him?

I know that it is possible for a preacher to make of himself an intolerable nuisance by continually exploiting personal views which do not edify or serve any useful purpose. Any church has the right, and also a duty, to decide what kind of preaching it is willing to pay for, and what it considers to be for the best interest of the community to hear. The preacher who makes a nuisance of himself may be a reactionary of the narrowest type, or a "liberal" of the narrowest type. It is not a question of conservatism or progress; it is simply a question of ridding the church of a nuisance. But sometimes the church, or a troublesome minority in the church, makes a nuisance of itself, and the preacher has to get out in order to escape the oppressive atmosphere. A church should be exceedingly careful about driving from it a cultured, scholarly, able man for no other reason than that he thinks for himself, and happens to express views different from those commonly taught among us. It sounds like ancient history to condemn a man for not conforming in all respects to "the standards and usages" of our church.

Is it not a fundamental principle with us that we should "not only think," to quote an old-fashioned document, "but also to act for ourselves; to see with our own eyes, and to take all our measures directly and immediately from the Divine Standard?" How can a man be out of harmony with "us" if he preaches his honest convictions from an open Bible? The church should be careful lest in ridding itself of such a man it suffers an irreparable loss.

It is claimed that we have no human creed. How then can a man who is loyal to Jesus Christ in purpose and life be out of harmony with us? Our creed is personal—faith in a divine person. This is our test of orthodoxy—theoretically. If a scholarly, up-to-date, consecrated man, desiring to do a constructive, educational work, says some things that are not quite familiar to our ears, why not listen with open mind, and at least raise the question whether these things may not possibly be true and timely, instead of raising the cry of heresy? We must recognize the rights and duties of the church in this matter, as we have said; but is it not too bad when the church, seeking to banish a heretic, banishes an opportunity?

And, who is to decide when a man is unsound? Does not that old-fashioned document say "that as no man can be judged for his brother, so no man can judge his brother?" And, even if the church should decide that a man is an undesirable pastor, what right has it to brand him as unsound?

It is easy enough, of course, for a man to know when he is out of harmony with "our position," in spite of our creedless condition. He can measure himself by what "our most representative men" teach. He can test himself by our religious journals—a treble standard test by no means infallible. He may feel the pressure of a certain "consensus of opinion" among us. "Our position" has been stated so many times by men so well qualified to speak—by men who helped to decide what "our position" is. And, then, there is a certain atmosphere which one breathes when he is among "our people," different from any other atmosphere. "We as a people" do stand for some positive things, as the editor reminds us. Most of us know what these positive things are, and, consequently, one may find himself so out of harmony with them that he may not feel at home among us. He may feel that he cannot honestly stay with us any longer. To conceal his views and sail under false colors would be cowardly. But, is it not too bad that "our position" has been so rigidly defined, and so dogmatically stated, that a scholarly, progressive man, honest in heart, and with the highest Christian ideals, should ever be made to feel that he is not at home with us. Don't we need to expand?

But, after all, "our most representative men" represent only those who agree with them. Our denominational journals represent only their several constituencies. George H. Combs said at Santa Cruz, that it would require a million and a quarter of religious weeklies to represent us all. As the proud Irish mother, watching her son marching in the parade, declared that he was the only one keeping step, so some of us may think that we are the only ones keeping step to the music of "our plea." Suppose that a man loves our brotherhood just a little better than he loves any other brotherhood on earth; suppose he feels that because of his better acquaintance with our needs and our organization he can work more effectively for the advancement of the Kingdom with us than he can with any other religious body; suppose he feels that we are marching onward to larger things, and that there is an educational work for him to do; suppose that he believes that the Disciples of Christ have a larger opportunity to promote Christian union than any other religious body; suppose he believes that we are the freest people to be found anywhere; then can he not honestly remain with us, no matter what views he may hold—until he is disillusioned?

There is a difference, of course, between a prophet and a nuisance. Some preachers are unmitigated nuisances, and should be squelched. But it is a tragedy when an undiscriminating church rids itself of a prophet. Sometimes it is a meddlesome minority in the church which is the real nuisance needing repression. We are losing our best men at an appalling rate, if to those who go out we add those who are lost to us on the threshold. This is an irreparable and an unspeakable calamity. Can we not afford other losses better than this?

If it were—if it might be—if it had been. One portion of mankind goes through life always regretting, always whining always imagining. As it is—this is the way in which the other class of people look at the conditions in which they find themselves. I venture to say that if one should count the ifs and the ases in the conversation of his acquaintances, he would find the more able and important persons among them—statesmen, generals, men of business—among the ases, and the majority of the conspicuous failures among the ifs.—*O. A Little Nonsense

One On Ingersoll.

The great agnostic, Robert G. Ingersoll, it is said, was one morning seated in a Washington city hotel, looking out of the great window, when a United States senator, coming in, said: "Mr. Ingersoll, I saw a sad thing a moment ago. I saw a man struggling across the crowded street on crutches, and I saw another man strike the crutches away from him."

And Ingersoll rose with fingers twitching and eyes flashing and said, "I should like to see the man. I would punish him."

The United States senator put his hand on his shoulder and said: "That is what you have been trying to do for years: striking away the crutches of people, the support of people in sorrow, the support of people in temptation."—The Christian Herald.

In For Life.

Prof. John Dewey of Columbia, was talking about a legislator who had turned traitor to the suffrage cause. "A man who could be so mean to woman," he said, "must be the original f the Clayton jail story. A convict in the Clayton jail, you know, managed to do a little flirting over the wall. He flirted for some weeks with a girl who milked the cows in a field adjoining the jail, and one evening he called to her and they struck up a conversation. Every day after that, for a year or more, the girl came to the wall. Then the convict, getting tired of her, told her it was no use waiting for him, as he was in for life."

Hiding From Business.

In a small Carolina town that was "finished" before the war, two men were playing checkers in the back of a store. A traveling man who was making his first trip to the town was watching the game, and not being acquainted with the business methods of the citizens, he called the attention of the owner of the store to some customers who had just entered the front door.

"Sh! Sh!" answered the storekeeper, making another move on the checkerboard. "Keep perfectly quiet and they'll go out."—Everybody's.

The Price.

"How much do you expect to get for defending that slugger?"

"About $20,000."

"Do you think it is going to be worth as much as that?"

"No, but I understand his friends are going to be able to raise about that much."—Chicago Record.

The Unsuccessful Angler.

"William Dean Howells is the kindliest of critics, but now and then," said a magazine editor, "some popular novelist's conceit will cause him to bristle up a little.

"Just before his departure for Spain last month I dined with Mr. Howells in his Half-Moon street apartment in London. A popular novelist called after dinner. He told us all about his phenomenal sales. Then —fishing for compliments, you know—he sighed and said:

"'I grow richer and richer, but, all the same, I think my work is falling off. My new work is not so good as my old.'

"'Oh, nonsense,' said Mr. Howells. 'You write just as well as you ever did, my boy. Your taste is improving, that is all.'"—Washington Star.

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

The pastor of Carmi Church, L. A. Chapman, recently preached several evenings for Enfield Church, situated near Carmi.

W. B. Slater, pastor of Moline Church, is holding a meeting for his home congregation, assisted by singing evangelist G. E. Crist, of Ohio.

C. R. Gains and the church at Bowen are in a revival meeting, with the assistance of Evangelists Sword and Kay. There were two additions the first day of the meeting.

District Evangelist Charles D. Hougham, of the Fifth District, is now located in Springfield. At present he is in his first meeting, being held at Exeter.

Evangelist J. E. Stout, assisted by his son and by Miss Levitt, held a week's revival meeting at Oaksey, which resulted in twenty-five additions.

C. F. Shaul, assisted by his wife, held a three weeks' meeting at Redmon in December, which is said to have materially strengthened the interest of the church.

Dr. B. O. Aylesworth, pastor of Chandlerville Church, delivered a lecture at the County Farmers' Institute at Geneseo, near the first of January.

The church at Bellflower is without a pastor since the departure of L. S. Harrington, whose work was concluded there the first of the year. Mr. Harrington at once became the pastor of Wapella Church.

Evangelist C. L. Organ, it is reported, is meeting with unusual success in the revival being conducted at Greenview. A large number of additions have been reported early in the meeting.

Bement Church has invited an Indiana pastor, D. H. Lovejoy, to its pastorate. Mr. Lovejoy has been, until about a year ago, affiliated with the Baptist church. He assumes the pastoral relation in February.

W. B. Hopper is to remain with Bethany Church for another year, making the fourth of his pastorate. During the year just closed, there were twenty additions, eighteen of this number being on profession of faith.

Peoria Central Church Sunday-school received almost fifty baskets and a cash offering of twenty-five dollars as a Christmas donation for the poor of the community. This Sunday-school is being directed in a special effort to increase its efficiency and numbers, under the leadership of Miss Eva Lemert.

F. F. Walters, of Independence, Missouri, it is learned, is preaching to large congregations nightly at Shelbyville Church. Mr. Walters' intellectual and spiritual equipment, together with his years of experience in the pastoral care of several large city churches, should make his services especially valuable in the evangelistic field.

D. H. Shanklin, whose residence is at Normal, has given up his pastorate at Pleasant Hill and Brunswick, where he has been employed for the past three years. He will enter the evangelistic field, and is available for churches desiring meetings.

Central Church, Decatur, whose pulpit was vacated the first of November by the lamented O. W. Lawrence, has extended a call to Secretary E. W. Allen, of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. It is understood that Mr. Allen's acceptance has not yet been received by the church.

The revival meeting at Atlanta, conducted by Evangelist R. W. Abberley, was closed after fifty-six persons had been added to the church. The pastor and congregation speak in commendation of the evangelist's method and message.

The new church edifice erected by Kilbourne Church was dedicated the first Sunday in January, State Secretary J. Fred Jones being master of ceremonies. During the week preceding the dedication, services were held each night, with an address by pastors from neighboring cities. Among these were Louis O. Lehman, of Gibson City, A. I. Zeller, of Petersburg, Ralph V. Calloway, of Havana, and W. M. Groves, of Petersburg. This church was organized four years ago, at the conclusion of a revival meeting held by L. O. Lehman. The building, containing three rooms, with comfortable equipment, cost three thousand dollars. The pastor is E. P. Gish.

The annual meeting of University Place Church of Christ, of Champaign-Urbana was held as usual on New Year's evening. The reports from all departments of the church activity revealed by far the best year in the history of its work. 166 were added to the church membership at regular services; of these sixty-two were by confession of faith and ninety-one of the total were first members of the Sunday-school. The total net resident membership was reported 984. The total of all money collected during the year for all purposes exclusive of loans was $16,355.43. The new University Place Church was completed during the year and was dedicated April 23, by Charles Reign Scoville. The church is rejoicing in its new life work in the new quarters where there is every opportunity for continual advancement and enlargement of usefulness. The local and student work have gained greatly in efficiency within the year. A fine spirit prevails and the church turns with great faith and confidence to the evangelistic campaign with which it begins the new year next Sunday, under the leadership of Dr. H. O. Breeden and Mr. and Mrs. Rockwell, song evangelists.

H. H. Jenner, of Stuart Street Church, Springfield, on January 7, after presenting his annual report, tendered his resignation to the congregation to be accepted within ninety days. Mr. Jenner has been pastor of this church for two years, and even though his pastorate dates from the beginning of the reaction from the Sunday Revival, the report of the two years' work is decidedly creditable. With true pastoral foresight, he has labored quietly and without artificial stimulation. He has done the genuine work of an ambassador for the kingdom of Christ. Such methods have been employed and teaching administered that along with the minister's personal life and example, nothing but favorable influences will follow in the days to come. The difficulties of the field, for a successor, have not been enlarged, but certainly diminished by his ministry. During his two years' ministry, there were one hundred forty-six additions, more than half of these being by baptism. During the first year, twenty per cent, and during the second year sixty per cent, of the additions were in regular services. This is one of the outstanding features of his ministry. It indicates a decided improvement toward a normal and effective evangelism. The congregation is situated in a community composed mostly of working people, affected largely by the high prices and inoperation of the mines and certain factories of the city. Notwithstanding the financial depression during the past year, the congregation had receipts for current expenses and missions in excess of any year in the church's history. The missionary offerings amounted to more than two hundred dollars. It is understood that several churches are already seeking the services of this minister and his capable wife, but no decision has yet been rendered for a new field of labor.

Ethics in the Ministry.

Last summer I had quite an experience with preachers when I reported that there were a hundred churches in a certain district and only forty preachers; I spent a good deal in correspondence, but did not locate a man. Some seemed to think that I was a Bishop with livings to dispense. Lately I have been having some more experiences, and I am constrained to tell them in the hope that some one may get some good lessons.

We decided to hold a meeting, and engaged a singer some weeks in advance. In the month preceeding the time for the meeting, he engaged to go with an evangelist, and wrote asking to be released. We wrote him that his evangelist ought to think more of him if he faithfully filled his previous engagements. But if he wished it we would release him. We thought the meeting would have little chance with an unwilling singer.

Then we began to engage another. This time it was to be a union meeting. We were to be responsible for the helpers, and the M. E. people willingly agreed to come into our meeting. With great care we chose between two candidates. We wired one to come as per his proposition, and wired the other, at some cost, of our decision.

While waiting for the answer, I wrote twice to the man we had contracted with, stating the danger of allowing anything to interfere with our plans. In desperation, at the end of a long week's waiting, a long distance telephone call brought the information that he, too, had engaged with an evangelist and could not come.

Now I have no great complaint to make. We have been worried some, but we know that we will get along anyhow. But our committeemen, who are all in business, are accustomed to keeping their word in even the smallest matters, and so do not appreciate the situation we are placed in. I am writing this to urge all preachers and church workers to maintain a higher ethical standard in making contracts. In both cases an evangelist to whom the helper had hired is said to be responsible for the breaking of our contracts. Faithfulness is a virtue which is worthy of high praise. * * *

Secretary's Letter.

The poster and literature for "Front Rank Standard for Churches," has been mailed to preachers and church clerks. Please check up the points already attained by your church on the small slip and return it to us at once, thus getting in line for a Front Rank Church.

Girard is the first to return the slip and all points are checked except number four and they are working on that. Many more will report in the next few days.

A. O. Hargis has had thirteen additions at regular services at West Point in the last four weeks and the outlook is very encouraging.

The work is doing well at Ashland under the ministry of F. M. Morgan. The Bible-school has grown from thirty-eight to ninety-six; thirty-nine have been added to the church; the Bible-school is a Front Rank; the church is going to be a "Light Bearing" church for 1912; they have a Men's Brotherhood organized; all local expenses and an old debt are provided for. Brother Morgan pulls steadily for the best things and his work counts.

Chas. W. Ross of Litchfield was surprised recently by being unanimously voted an increase in salary of $200, but it is appreciated and well deserved. The work prospers, missionary offerings are larger than ever before and a new parsonage will most likely be built this summer. In the next five years we predict that Litchfield will have replaced their present church building with a splendid modern edifice equipped for the best Bible-school and church work. Watch Litchfield!

The church at Hudson voted unanimously to retain W. D. Deweese, our office secretary-treasurer, the third year.

Has your offering for state missions been sent in? Make inquiry and be sure that it has actually been mailed. Sometimes it is held a long while after it has been taken.

And sometimes we are told that our offering has been used for some old local debts without the knowledge or consent of those who gave it. Let us be fair and honest with God's money and with our brethren. It is a grievous wrong to misappropriate the Lord's money.

S. S. Jones of Danville will assist H. J. Hostetler in a meeting at Newman, beginning Jan. 15.

N. S. Haynes, of Decatur, is pushing vigorously the campaign for facts and materials for the history of the Disciples in Illinois. Please answer his correspondence promptly and co-operate with him in every possible way. This is a great undertaking and he needs our hearty support.

Herbert Yeuell will assist Milo Atkinson in a meeting at the Centennial Church, Bloomington, beginning Sunday, Jan. 14. Splendid preparations are being made and good results are anticipated. The music will be under the direction of singing evangelist Byron Conrad, who is now the regular chorister at the Centennial. A large chorus has been organized

The State Board and secretaries are doing everything possible to encourage the churches all over the state to hold up their hands in the great work of state missionary enterprise by sending an offering to support our missions and missionaries. A very large number have not had fellowship in the work this year. Of course we can only do as much work as the funds will pay for. The more and larger the offerings the greater the work accomplished. Make it large, brethren, and see that it is sent to our treasurer.

Chas. Wm. Dean, State Sunday-school Superintendent of Colorado, is conducting an efficiency campaign in company with Robt. M. Hopkins, national superintendent, and Clark Bower, the chairman of the state committee. The itinerary includes the principal churches in the state with an afternoon and evening session at each place.

Bernard Gruenstein was ordained pastor of the First Christian Church of Selma, Ala., recently, with Allen R. Moore as master of ceremonies. Mr. Bernstein has done heroic work in trying to raise the money that was owing to the Church Extension Fund, earning seventy dollars of the first $1,000 with his own hands.

The annual report of the First Christian Church of Jefferson City, Mo., where A. R. Liverett is pastor, shows that the debt has been reduced from $9,000 to $5,000, by the aid of gifts from R. A. Long and R. H. Stockton. There has been a net gain of seventy-six to the membership and a total amount of money raised for the year of nearly $7,000.

Walter Scott Priest, of Central Church, Wichita, Kan., is making an heroic effort to prevent a harmful reaction from the Billy Sunday meetings that recently were held there. Central Church has added eighty-nine members to its roll as a result of the meetings and the pastor recently preached a sermon exhorting the converts to continue steadfast.

A. G. Hollowell, pastor at Pine Village, Ind., reports a successful meeting that has been held for his church by A. W. Crabb. There were forty-four additions in the meeting and the pastor desires to commend the evangelist in the highest terms. Mr. Hollowell has resigned the pastorate at Pine Village and will enter school in Christian University, Canton, Mo. W. F. Hole of Ambia, Ind., succeeds him.

Finis Idleman prints in "The Weekly Worker," in display type, the invitation to attend the rally of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society at the University Place Church. The way in which the brethren are rallying to the support of the work of missions in spite of the vicious attacks that are being made on the society, is one of the most hopeful indications of the present drift of things.

Central Church of Disciples of Christ was organized in New York City, and the first service held on Sunday morning, January 14. J. M. Philputt was present and will continue as acting minister. The new church is the result of a forward movement among Disciples in New York to establish a representative church in the metropolis. The membership, which will number over four hundred, is composed of former members of the old First Church, the Lenox Avenue Church and an influential group of persons who have recently moved to New York from Christian churches in the South and West. For the present time, the consolidated congregation will meet in the splendid church building now used by the First Church, at 142 West 81st Street. A greatly enlarged work is planned by the leaders and special attention will be given to extension work in home and foreign. Dr. Philputt has just returned from a two years' tour in Europe.

Frank E. Mallory reports a great meeting at Parsons, Kan., where the Minges company is holding a revival. On the first day in which invitations were given, 247 additions were enrolled. One address at the men's meeting on "The Other Fellow" secured thirty-three of these. There were 2,200 in the tabernacle when the weather was ten degrees below zero. The chorus of 100 voices is led by Mr. Senif.

During January, E. De Witt Jones of Bloomington, Ill., is preaching Sunday mornings on, The Benedictions of the Bible, as follows: "The Benediction Benignant," "The Benediction Beautiful," "The Benediction Apostolic," and "The Benediction Triumphant," and on January Sunday nights as follows, on the Miracles: "The Miracles of the Manager," "The Miracles of the Empty Tomb," "The Miracle of Miracles."

Oscar Ingold is in a meeting at La Grange, Mo. There is no pastor at present in residence there and the prospects are correspondingly discouraging, but there have been fifteen additions already. The evangelist is assisted by his wife and by Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Ballew, who are directing the music and the work among the children. Mr. Ingold will go next to Miami, Oklahoma, assisted by Chester Guthrie, and Mr. Ballew to Frankford, Mo., to assist Evangelist Reavis in a meeting.

Russell F. Thrapp, who began work with the First Church of Los Angeles, Calif., reports that there were twenty added for December, and that the work is in fine condition. Russell E. Booker, who was formerly at the Central Church, Lexington, Ky., is assistant to Mr. Thrapp. The members of the church gathered at the home of the pastor for a watch-night service to see the old year out. A banquet was given for all the members of the church on Jan 12. Mr. Thrapp believes that, in spite of the many problems, the Disciples have a great future on the coast.

John Ray Ewers of Pittsburgh, Highland Avenue Church, has planned a series of Sunday evening sermons on the general theme: "The Ten Commandments and Pittsburgh 1912." The sermons have been advertized and the preacher invites reliable facts on any of the topics outlined. The subjects include such topics as: "What May I Do on Sunday?" "Pittsburgh Murders," "Honesty and Stealing in Pittsburgh." He is a true prophet who can bring to his generation the interpretation of the old truths that shall best meet the needs of his day.

A member of the church at Florence, Ala., recently wrote to the state secretary and said that he had been living in the town for a number of years and was perfectly loyal to the brethren there, but that it was their boast that the "church practiced and worshiped just as they did when Alexander Campbell was there." The writer felt that the conditions surrounding the church demanded a re-interpretation of the scriptures and authorized the treasurer to draw on him for a contribution to the cause of missions. There are many such men in the South if they could be reached and the matter properly presented to them.

M. E. Chatley, pastor of Central Church, Centerville, Ia., expects to keep the church in the living-link column for another year, and continue the support of Mrs. R. D. McCoy, of Tokyo, Japan. The church recently enjoyed a message from Doctor Jaggard of Bolengi. The response of the churches seems to indicate that the March offering will not fail to show the usual increase over the previous year. And this proves that the tie that binds the churches together is the tie of service and co-operation for the good of others. There have been twenty additions to the Centerville church since their last report.

B. A. Abbott, pastor of Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, has inaugurated a plan to secure the reading of the Bible by the members of the congregation and any others interested. He has issued a four-page bulletin called, "The Golden Thread," with a definite passage of scripture for every day of the first quarter, so arranged as to complete the Pentateuch by the end of March. A single verse from the New Testament is given with each extract of the Old, and very brief introductions of each book are provided. The idea is good and, so far as we know, not just like anything we have ever seen. Doubtless Mr. Abbott would be willing to supply copies of the leaflet to those interested in the subject.

Professor Walter S. Athern of Drake University is director of a comprehensive movement for the betterment of the Sunday-schools of Des Moines. It is called the Des Moines Sunday-school Institute and is the result of the work of the Men and Religion Forward Movement. The program calls for weekly meetings for twenty-eight weeks with opportunities at other times in the week for aid in teaching methods for the lesson immediately following. There are ten denominations represented in the enrollment, the Methodists leading with sixty-four members, the Disciples next with thirty-five, and the Presbyterians a close third with thirty-four. No more promising sign of the times is apparent than the increased measure of co-operation in Sunday-school work by the different denominations.

We regret to record the passing of G. A. Lewellyn, Professor of Bible History at Texas Christian University, who departed this life at his home in Ft. Worth, Texas, Jan. 4. Professor Lewellyn was a graduate of Kentucky University and was a student in the University of Chicago for summer work several years ago. He has given his life to the cause of education, serving in the thankless and arduous work of presiding over the destinies of several small schools in Kentucky and Tennessee. He went to T. C. U., three years ago and was made dean of the Bible College there, at the opening of the present academic year. The whole year of 1910-11 was spent by him in traveling over the state of Texas, gathering funds to erect a building for the Bible College in which the young preachers might live more economically. The success of his labors was a surprise to everyone and the building is now complete and in use. It was during the campaign for this fund that Mr. Lewellyn was exposed to the weather in making long drives in the country and the exposure lead to a weakness that resulted in his death. He leaves a widow and ten children. The Christian Century extends sincerest sympathy to the family and friends. Professor Lewellyn was the type of man with whom the hope of the future lies for the Disciples. Frankly conservative and desiring earnestly to walk in the old paths, he was at the same time broad in his charities and tolerant of every view that was presented sincerely. He read no man out of the brotherhood for failing to agree with him. He will abide in the memories of his friends and his influence will live long in the world.

The Bolengi missionaries report 197 baptisms on Oct. 20 at Bolengi, and twenty-five on Nov. 5 at Monieka. There are now over 200 evangelists going out from the two stations of Bolengi and Monieka alone. The federation of missions in the Congo, or Conference, as they call it, met at Bolengi for the first time last October. At this meeting there were forty-three missionaries and 200 native preachers. The attendance in the Sunday-school that day was 1,016. Among the baptisms was a powerful chief and a leper, the first to be baptized. If the work at Bolengi continues to advance, it will not

The Best

The Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 are in The Life of Christ. You want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition has just been issued to meet the great demand. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. be many years before the entire region around the station will be evangelized, but there is much land beyond. They call loudly for three new medical missionaries as Doctor Jaggard is the only physician now connected with the work and he is at home on furlough.

Vital and Timely Books

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing. You need every one of this splendid list.

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST

By Edward Scribner Ames, Ph. D., author of "The Psychology of Religious Experience." 123 pages. Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. Dr. Ames treats the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy with a freshness and illumination that in itself makes his work a distinct contribution to religious thought. The book is more than a treatise. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all times must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

THE EARLY RELATION AND SEPARATION OF BAPTISTS AND DISCIPLES

By Errett Gates, Ph. D.

"The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches."—The Congregationalist.

fund of $9,500 there was raised $16,408 of which $4,511 was for missions and benevolences. The church supports four missionaries in China and Japan, one on the Pacific coast and one in St. Paul, Minn., and is creating a $5,000 named fund in the church extension society.

Champaign, Ill.—University Place Church, Stephen E. Fisher, pastor: added 146, of which 62 were baptisms; total membership 984; total amount raised $16,355; new church dedicated last April.

Fulton, Mo.—The year closed with all bills paid and $200.00 in the treasury. The income for current expenses was $3,310.76. Of this amount $819.79 was contributed to missions and benevolences, and $2,290.97 to local expenses. The Sunday-school enrollment was increased from 258 to 430; to its regular treasury was contributed $619, of which amount $200 went to the building fund for the new church. Individual classes raised enough more for their class treasuries to make the total more than $1,000. The Auxiliary of the C. W. B. M. with an enrollment of 43 raised $137. The Ladies' Aid Society which had pledged $4,000 for the new church have paid the pledge in full, borrowing only $1,100. The Christian Endeavor Society raised $400.00 for the new church, and by borrowing $350.00 paid the balance on their $1,000. There is a membership of 692, an increase of 38 at the regular services during the year. The Finance Committee have received pledges for the new building $30,000. This makes a grand total of money raised during the year for all purposes of $34,447. Every organization of the church has shown growth. The new church is to be dedicated by H. O. Breeden about March 1, and he will follow the dedication with a revival meeting. T. E. Winter is the pastor at Fulton.

National Benevolent Association Activities

Cephas Shelburne has resigned his work as pastor of the East Dallas Church, in order to give more time to the growing demands of the Christian Courier. Mr. Shelburne says: "The Courier has grown in its subscription list, in its interests and in the volume of its business, demanding more of the time and personal oversight of an editor than, in justice to my growing church and to the paper, I felt that I could give. It had come to a point that I must either surrender the Courier and give my time to the East Dallas undivided time to the paper. Upon the urgent request of my brethren all over the state. I decided to give up my church and give up my time to the editorial management of the Christian Courier. After April 1, I expect to give my best editorial management of the Christian thought, study and effort to the business of perfecting, building up, and extending the paper. Texas alone, to say nothing of the great, growing Southwest, furnishes a field for the support of a great church paper, a field that cannot be occupied by any other paper, save one that is published in our own borders and largely serving our own wide and rapidly growing country and its interests. It is not our intention to antagonize or try to crowd out our great national Christian papers, but to co-operate with them in building up and straightening our course in this section."

Mr. Shelburne has done a good and great work in Dallas. The East Dallas Church has grown under his ministry and the church is completing a great enterprise in the erection of their new building, which, when dedicated will give a new $55,000 equipment. Speaking of his resignation, Mr. Shelburne says: "Coming at the time that it does, just upon the eve of our getting into our splendid new building, when the dream and purpose of the church is being fulfilled, and its outlook, and future prosperity and growth is assured—to give up such a church and prospect makes it one of the severest trials of my ministry. I love the East Dallas people, and the sweetest harmony exists between pastor and people. It was not the wish of the board or congregation that I resign this work." Elder B. B. Harwood, of the official board, in his statement to the congregation, said: "Of course we all regret to lose Brother Shelburne from the East Dallas Church, especially just at this time; but we are glad that he has the talent for this larger service to the state. Our individual loss will be our greater gain."

In the new arrangement, J. C. Mason, State Corresponding Secretary, and J. O. Shelburne, Pastor of Central Church, retire from partnership in the paper, and the Courier will be owned and published by Cephas Shelburne, Editor, and his son C. G. Shelburne, Business Manager.

The Christian Century congratulates the Texas Brotherhood on having a man like Mr. Shelburne to give his entire time to the paper and we wish the new management the fullest measure of success.

Oklahoma Christian University

The winter term of Oklahoma Christian University opened with the best enrollment in the history of the institution. The enrollment is thirty-seven above the corresponding date last year. The entire enrollment for the present sessions is 304.

The special schools are maintaining their usual strong attendance. The largest increase is in the College of Liberal Arts and Ministerial Department. The ministerial enrollment to date is eighty-three. Already the enrollment of ministerial students is about up to last year's enrollment. Definite arrangements are being made by a number of other ministerial students to enter in the next two or three weeks. The probability is, that this department will pass the 100 mark this session.

A few months ago an appeal was made to churches and individuals to start a student loan fund by contributing $100 each to support a ministerial student. The respone is encouraging. A number have taken hold of the proposition. The young men who are taking advantage of the loan have been organized into a club. By this means they are living for about $2.00 per week. This will enable them to pay living expenses and tuitions for the school year with the $100.00.

Annual Reports

The association has just received an annuity of $1,000. It was given by a good sister who is too modest to allow her name to be used. She believes thoroughly in the principle of not letting the right hand know what the left hand is doing. The year just closed was the greatest year in the history of the association in the annuity department, and the new year starts out with fine promise. The association's annuities are growing more popular every year.

The plans are under consideration for some new buildings for the children's department of the Juliette Fowler Home. Work will be begun on these buildings as soon as the weather conditions will permit.

The graduating exercises of the Nurses' Training School in connection with the Valparaiso Christian Hospital will be held in the Christian Church at Valparaiso on the evening of January 9. A fine class of highly trained, capable young women will at that time receive their diplomas and go out to enter the beautiful ministry of the trained nurse.

L. B. Leach, of Pawnee Rock, Kansas, a good friend of the Benevolent Association, one who gave a large sum to the annuity fund, has just passed to his reward. Brother Leach gave the bulk of a lifetime saving for the care of the widow and the orphan.

The association is in great need of a home for incurables. Requests are received almost daily from ministers and churches to care for some incurable invalid among their members. The next great undertaking should be the establishment of such a home.

We are glad to report that a number of churches and Bible-schools of the brotherhood are observing a "Giving Christmas," and the number increases each year. Our Christmas offering was surely a God-send to us this year, coming at a time when living was high and the income low. The association has under its care at the present time, something over four hundred children and about seventy aged, indigent brethren and sisters.

J. H. Rosecrans has prepared a very attractive cantata for the use of the Bible-schools in behalf of our association's work at Easter. The association is having it printed and it will be ready for free distribution at an early date. Brethren, send your orders in early. Easter is the 7th of April.

Hiram College Notes

Hiram opened the second term of her first year as a strictly college institution, January 3, with a further increased enrollment. Looking back over the past year, Hiram has great reasons to rejoice over the advances she has been enabled to make through the co-operative efforts of the college trustees, professors, students and town folk.

Special effort is being made this term by the members of the staff of the Young Men's Christian Association, toward the raising of funds through the generosity of the alumni and friends of the college for the furnishing and remodeling of a men's club room in the association building. Already one room has been equipped for the boys of the village, and it is the intention to throw the new room open for both students and men of the town as a social meeting place.

One of the most important events of this term are the evangelistic meetings now being held in the Christian Church, by R. H. Miller, of Buffalo, N. Y. Mr. Miller spent two weeks in Hiram, two years ago, and won the admiration of the student body, making his presence now especially welcome.

President Bates left Friday on a week's trip through the East. Sunday he fills the pulpit of Mr. Miller, in the Christian Church in Buffalo, and from there he goes to Philadelphia to attend an international religious conference. Before returning home, the president will be in New York for a few days.

The Call of the World

The call was never before so insistent. All the world is aroused to its deep need. Nations are all astir. They are being awakened from their sleep of centuries. Like a child aroused from its slumber, they call for light. Jesus Christ is the light of the world. Without him, all is darkness. He meets all needs: he satisfies all hunger. He is the water of life to all who thirst. All the world calls for him. His word giveth life. He is the world's hope.

The cry from India is piteous. Her teeming millions have waited through the long, dark centuries for the night to pass. Gleams of light have begun to appear on the eastern sky. The glimpse of a new day, which is now dawning only give pathos and strength to her cry. The three millions of Christians in that land, the mother of religions, is a prophecy of a glorious day, which rapidly approaches. Knowing ones believe that Christianity will be her dominant faith within the next century.

The change in China is without a parallel in the history of the race. There have been more significant changes in that land in the past five years than in any other nation; and more in that five years than in the same period in any other nation since the world began. In this time of her wondrous movement she calls long and loud for Christian direction. Her present confusion is her salvation. She is breaking away from her dead past. Now is the time to extend to her a guiding hand.

Japan is on the highway to a Christian civilization. Her rapid advance calls for special thought. Her military power and her increasing wealth will all come to naught without Him who is the Prince of Peace. Her call is the common call of the race.

Shafts of gospel light are piercing all through the dense, dark cloud which has enveloped Africa for so long. She asks expectantly that her children be not led away into territory and hopelessness of the prophet of Mecca. Ethiopia stretches out her hands unto God.

Everywhere the cry comes for better things. Men are turning their faces toward God. Their call is the deep cry of the heart.

We have what men need. Shall we break to them some of the bread that has blessed us? Our bounty is the common need of the race. Our blessings are the common inheritance of all men. The world calls for its birthright.

Let us heed the call as we approach the March offering. Please order your March offering supplies today.

F. M. RAINS, Secretary.

News From the Foreign Society

From last reports there are 1,750 members in the churches on the Congo. This membership is divided as follows: Bolenge, 800; Longa, 290; Lotumbe, 250; Monieka, 400. Monieka is the newest station of all. There have been about 400 baptisms this last year.

The missionary rallies conducted by A. McLean and E. W. Allen are well attended and the enthusiasm is high. The outlook for the March offering is very encouraging.

J. C. Ogden and family of Batang, Tibet, will land in San Francisco on January 18. A hearty welcome will await them in America after their fruitful term of service in their remote field and their safe journey through China during the time of revolutionary upheaval. Just as soon as conditions in China permit travel and they can go with safety, Dr. A. L. Shelton and family, together with H. A. Baker and wife, will start for Batang.

Many Mission Study Classes are being formed to use the book: "Ten Lessons in World Conquest."

One of the most striking facts about the history of Christian missions in Japan is that during the last five or six years over 200,000 copies of the union hymn book have been sold. All the Christians in Japan use one hymn book. Some believe that a union hymn book in this country is altogether desirable and practicable.

R. Ray Eldred, Longa, Congo, West Africa, under date of November 15, reports the following baptisms: "Lotumbe 19, Monieka, 25, Longa 18, Bolenge 174; making 236 in all. These all within the last month. I have just returned from a trip up a river which empties into the Busira, about thirty miles above here. It is new country and the outlook is good. This last month 43 evangelists went out from Longa. These are divided among fourteen outposts. The school is holding its usual number with steady interest. We are much in need of more workers, especially that we might put a man at Monieka. Every week this is not done, the cause loses more than we can tell."

The Bible College of Missouri, and Education Day

To the ministers of the Christian churches of Missouri. The third Sunday in January is Education Day, the day on which our churches are earnestly expected to take an offering for Christian education. There is no Christian education so badly needed as the training of young ministers for service in the field. There are five hundred Christian churches in Missouri, and if we do not supply shepherds for these sheep, every one of our organized forces will suffer.

Consequently, a church which renders any missionary service at all ought to take an offering for Christian education upon this day. For the fundamental need is the need for men to preach the Word. Take an offering on this day for the sake of the vision of yourself and your church, and for the sake of the needs abroad.

And when it comes to the use of this offering, we earnestly petition you to consider the plea of the Bible College of Missouri, the strategic school of your state. It is located in the very heart of your great commonwealth. It is placed, by a stroke of economic genius, so that it commands millions of dollars worth of lay instruction from a great university, free of charge, and every dollar that you invest in it goes as far as four. With your aid it will become the Biblical seminary of the Central West. Your money will be wisely used as a permanent addition to the endowment fund of the school. It will be spent, not in superficial ways, but to employ the best scholars among the Disciples of Christ to give our students the best they can get.

The Bible College of Missouri has the location; it has the economic advantage; it has the aim; it has the men behind it; it has the future. It will go on to victory. Will you get behind a proposition that has its feet upon the solid rock, each hand upon a busy work, and its face to the front. Send your offering to J. T. Mitchell, Treas.

never any sanhedrim, consistory, church congress, or party convention—with absolute power. Honest men are often led to do, or to assent, in association, to what they would disdain upon their conscience and responsibility as individuals. En masse extermism always prevails and extremism is always wrong, it is the more wrong and the more dangerous because it is rarely wanting for genial and convincing argument to plausible sophistries, furnishing congenial and convincing argument to the mind of the unthinking for whatever it has to propose. It is not for me to instruct Doctor Powell in his duty. It is not for me to plan a campaign for this exceedingly well-housed religious institution. But, I would never have ventured to come here if I had not believed that the whole force of its organization—the genius of its pastor, the influence of its wealth and culture—were to be heaven-bent toward the love of man through grace of God. If that be wanting nothing else is much worth while. Not alone the love of man for woman, but the love of woman for woman and of man for man; the divine friendship taught us by the sermon on the mount; the religion of giving, not of getting; of whole-hearted giving; of joy in the love and the joy of others.

"Who giveth himself with his gift feeds three, himself, his hungering neighbor and Me."

I would have Doctor Powell, and all other ministers of religion as free to discuss the things of this world as the statesmen and the journalist! but, with this difference, that the objective point with them shall be the regeneration of man through grace of God and not the winning of office, or the exploitation of parties and newspapers. Journalism is yet too unripe to do more than guess at truth from a single side. The statesman stands mainly for political organism. Until he dies he is suspect. The pulpit remains therefore still the moral hope of the universe and the spiritual light of mankind.

It must be non-partisan. It must be non-professional. It must be manly and independent. But it must also be worldly-wise, not artificial, sympathetic, broad-minded and many-sided, equally ready to smite wrong in the mighty and to kneel by the bedside of the lowly and the poor, the weak and the afflicted.

I have so found most of the clergymen. I have known, during a long life, the exceptions too few to remember. In spite of the opulence we see about us, let us not allow ourselves too much conceit and pride. Especially may the pastor of this flock emulate the virtues of that village preacher of whom it was said that—

"Truth from his lips prevailed with double sway,
And those who came to scoff remained to pray.

* * * * *

A man he was to all the country dear,
And passing rich with forty pounds a year.

* * * * *

His house was known to all the vagrant train,
He chid their wanderings but relieved their pain;
The long-remembered beggar was his guest,
Whose beard descending swept his aged breast;
The ruined spendthrift now no longer proud,
Claimed kindred there and had his claim allowed;
The broken soldier, kindly bade to stay,
Sat by the fire and talked the night away,
Wept o'er his wounds, or tales of sorrow done,
Shouldered his crutch and showed how fields were won;
Pleased with his guests the good man learned to glow,
And quite forgot their vices in their woe,
Careless their merits or their faults to scan,
His pity gave e'er charity began!"

The Divinity of Christ

is the new work on religion by EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES which bids fair to be even more generally discussed than the same author's "Psychology of Religious Experience."

It is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says:

"Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Baptist World says:

This book is interesting, among other things, in that it rejects both Trinitarianism and Unitarianism. The author says, "Each alike accepts the underlying dualism, and without questioning its validity has chosen to champion opposite extremes." He contends that the who of Jesus is not to be decided by his human birth, but by his divine relations. An insidious, strong putting of the theology in the author's local atmosphere.

The Independent says:

"Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says:

"Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says:

"These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says:

"It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

Capital Punishment

THERE is a note of progress in the recent reports from several states referring to the trials of more or less noted criminals who have been convicted, or have confessed the crimes with which they were charged, to the effect that a considerable body of sentiment has arisen in each case against the infliction of the death penalty.

There can be no doubt, that the conscience of the modern world, and particularly the modern church, is increasingly sensitive to the taking of human life as a punishment for crime. This is not merely due to the fact that the mind of the present age turns away from all forms of suffering with a sensation of abhorrence, save where it is stimulated to efforts at relief. The disfavor under which capital punishment increasingly falls is due to a much more fundamental emotion than this.

It is the feeling that in a moral universe the infliction of death as a penalty for crime is inconsistent with the highest principles of justice and with the Christian spirit.

The instances in which this sentiment has most openly expressed itself of late have been those in which the guilt of the criminals has been apparently beyond question. The atrocious crimes which have been confessed by men like the minister Richeson of Boston and the McNamara brothers in Los Angeles lift the question entirely out of the realm of casuistry and put it squarely upon its merits.

In these cases and others that have shocked the public mind during the past few months, there can be no doubt of guilt and no sympathy with the criminal, save such sympathy as is always reserved by a Christian public sentiment for even the lowest fellow beings. It is possible in such cases to face the matter unmoved by any elements of emotion which might be created by unconvincing testimony or circumstances intended to excite favorable regard.

The question is simply and solely this, is capital punishment ever justifiable?

One by one the arguments which an older generation urged in support of this custom have ceased to have persuasive force with the modern mind. It has been proved, so far as statistics are capable of affording proof, that the infliction of the death penalty does not act as a deterrent to the commission of crime. Those states and countries which have abolished capital punishment show a record which, to say the least, compares favorably with those still retaining it.

The humaner instincts of society tend constantly to diminish the plausibility of the claim that it is the business of law to exhibit its terrors in the form of more severe penalties. Toward the elimination of such features of the criminal code the progress of humanity has constantly advanced.

It was the law of antiquity, exhibited in the code of Draco and in the institutes of most primitive nations, that death should be inflicted for almost every form of offense. The Hebrew legislation registered a great advance upon this procedure when it affirmed the principle of equivalents in penalty, balancing the punishment with the crime committed. "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, a life for a life and wound for wound" was not a lex talionis, or law of revenge, but one of measured and balanced penalty.

It was against even this more humane meting out of justice on the principle of jealous regard for value that Jesus threw the whole force of his personality and teachings. He demanded more. His ideal was the "over-plus." Love was its central motive. The business of men was to do good to their fellows, even to the worst of them.

The laws of Christian lands have made great progress in the direction of Jesus' ideals during the last few centuries. In the sixteenth century the English law inflicted capital punishment for two hundred and twelve different offenses. This terrible condition was so far improved by the first colonists on American soil that they reduced the number of capital offenses to twelve. Great progress has been made since that time.

In England today capital punishment is rarely inflicted. In France it has become almost the universal custom for the president of the republic to pardon criminals condemned to the guillotine, and in other parts of Europe the same tendency is seen.

The business of society, as Jesus made it clear, is not to condemn but to save criminals. This does not mean that they should be released to prey again upon their fellow men. And it is probable that much of the sentiment now favoring capital punishment is due to the fear that the ends of justice may miscarry through corrupt or sentimental executive interference, by a mistaken and almost criminal use of the pardoning power.

The business of society is to save the criminal if possible. This may require his life imprisonment. It certainly should be content with no less if the circumstances demand. But how can society save the criminal when it trifles with the most sacred thing in the universe—human life? It has at once put beyond reach all opportunity for the redemptive process the moment it resorts to the easy and doubtful method of the death penalty.

Perhaps the shallowest of all excuses for the survival of this barbarism is found in the quotation of texts of Scripture. A bishop in New York said last week that for him the whole question was settled in the simple words of the Bible, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." The crass view of Scripture which could erect a sentiment of the dark ages of Hebrew ignorance into a principle of universal application in a Christian age is a significant comment upon certain types of clerical leadership.

It is our firm conviction that from the vantage ground of future years, perhaps not so far ahead, we shall look back with wonder upon a generation that calmly sent men to execution by public judgments.

The American Negro

The problem of the negro is one of those American issues which is ever with us. It is evident on the very surface that the problem has elements of real seriousness. There were less than four million negroes in this country at the time of the civil war. At the present time there are nearly ten million. While the birth rate is decreasing it is still almost equal to the birth rate among the whites, having once been very much higher. The birth rate is still high enough to continue the increase of negro population. One-third of these negroes have some percentage of white blood. They have an average property holding of about thirty-four dollars to a person which is one twenty-fifth of that held by whites per capita. One-half of the negroes over ten years of age can write. Many foolish and hurtful things have been said about this race problem. The bumptiousness of the northerner whose ancestors were abolitionists is only matched by the prejudice of the southerner whose parents were slave-holders. There are the exceptional southerners who would preach the forcible transfer of all negroes to a foreign country. There are those who would talk of repression so severe as to blot out the race in the end. In the north there has been the even more foolish man who has been willing to talk of solving the race problem by free intermarriage and amalgamation. Perhaps none of these we have mentioned have been sincere, but their talk has but helped to increase the suspicion and distrust with which the two sections have looked upon each other when this matter of the black man was being discussed. The northern man who speaks on the subject should do so modestly as one who has but little first hand information of his subject. The southern man must ever guard lest he accept blindly inherited points of view which were never given rational consideration. We hesitate to present any views upon the subject and only venture because we feel that we shall never arrive anywhere by any laissez faire policy.

The History of the Negro

There can be no understanding and no sympathy with the negro without understanding his history. He is but three or four generations removed from the barbarism of his African ancestors. Our missionaries can tell us how these Africans lived. Their three besetting sins from the standpoint of civilization were unchastity, theft and lying. There was family life but no conception of chastity for unmarried females. These savages had few desires and therefore made but little exertion to satisfy desire in a climate where nature made most of the provision for the family. Out of this barbarism, the American negro was extracted. He was clothed with white men's clothes, and taught the white man's ways, but only imperfectly. Slavery tended to accentuate the very defects that the negro had in Africa. Whereas in the savage tribes, there was at least the sense of adultery being an offense against property, there was in the American life but little left of the family conception. The one-third of the negro population bearing white blood in their veins are a mute witness to the sin of the white man as well as to the weakness of the black woman. If the negro of today has difficulty in establishing pure domestic relations, it is due both to his experience in Africa and to his experience in American slavery. In the same way the shiftlessness of the average negro is to be accounted for. In Africa he had no spur of desire. He lived in the simplicity of nature where there were but few needs. In America he toiled under the driver's whip and found no incentive for labor save the fear of punishment. When the negro is suddenly thrown upon his own resources, we need not wonder that he has not shown the thrift and industry of the white man. He has both the inheritance of the African life and the slave experience to overcome before he can ever hope to compete in any way with the white man. It requires time to perfect any race. Our own white ancestors were not altogether lovely five hundred years ago. They were barbarians in most cases fifteen hundred years ago. We ourselves are but emerging. When we have emerged far enough we will be able to look back on the negro and understand.

The Struggle for the Higher Life

Before the war, the Christian masters often provided for religious services on the plantation, though there were other masters who were imbued with the ideas of Tom Paine and regarded all religion as so much superstition and weakness. There were also missionaries before the war who worked among the slaves, but their work was hindered by certain laws which forbade the assemblage of slaves. Disciples will remember that Thomas Campbell left Kentucky in disgust because he was threatened with arrest for preaching to slaves. Before the war there were some negroes that learned to read and write but in many quarters this was also regarded as dangerous. The negro by 1860 had come to be a nominal Christian with the church as his chief social institution but had retained the heathen superstitions to a marked degree and had never accepted Christian ethics along with Christian theology, to any marked degree. The first effect of the war and freedom was to inhibit all work for the negroes. They were themselves in no fit state to begin any serious effort for self-improvement. In the field of education two great negro leaders have appeared. The best known is Booker Washington. His great contribution has been to teach the technical arts to his race and to fill them with the idea of becoming indispensable to the white man through efficiency. This program was a tremendous advance over previous ideals. The other great educational leader is DuBois. He was educated at Harvard and in the German universities and represents the very highest culture. He criticises Washington's policy as holding forth nothing for the black man but a menial position in society. He insists that negroes should not only aspire to be stone masons and farmers but doctors and lawyers. He would have the negro become independent through education of leaders in every one of the great callings of life. We might almost imagine some section of the country becoming some day a solidly negro state and that negroes might flock to this Mecca and thus through race pride and independence segregate themselves. This would become possible only in the education of their own leaders.

The Future of the Negro

He is a hardy prophet who would venture his reputation upon any prophecy of the future of the negro. Yet there are many who have ventured upon this enterprise and we shall timidly follow. The future must either be development and a painful ascent to the goal of civilization or a descent to final extinction. There is no standing still. The Indians have not become civilized. They have rather been exterminated by the things of civilization. Shall it be so with the negro? We feel that the negro has already taken on more than the Indian was willing to do. The negro has accepted the white man's religion (in theory if not in practice) and has adopted our clothes and our learning to some extent. If the negro shall develop racial traits that are advantageous, he will survive, for we believe in the survival of the fit. The negro may yet have a career in music and poetry. The works of Paul Lawrence Dunbar indicate the poetical vein that runs in the negro soul. Any one who reads DuBois' "Souls of Black Folks" will cease to raise the question as to the possibility of negro literary expression. The plantation songs have long delighted the ears of white auditors. These plantation songs may be the forerunners of greater pieces of music that shall breathe the aspirations of this race which combines comedy and tragedy so richly in its experience. The negro has a large endowment of optimism and good cheer. The white man might well envy him this gift. The black man has imagination, and imagination is the mother of genius. He has humor, and humor is the safeguard against fanaticism. We might imagine some day a negro society in which there would be good government, an educated citizenship, a population that delighted in the higher arts, and above all a people more religious than the matter-of-fact Anglo-Saxon can ever become. Is it too much to dream of? It may be so, but it is more worth while to fail in the realization of such a dream as this than to succeed in a policy of race-hatred and race extermination.

—The war in Africa has revealed a center of what Stanley called "this open sore of the world," the slave trade. The Arabs of Benhazi, a town in the interior of Tripoli, are slave-traders. They have joined forces with the Turks against Italy, not that they love Turkish rule, but because they fear that Italian success will mean the end of their business.

Methodism Marking Time

This is the title of an interestng survey in the Northwestern Christian Advocate, based upon the returns of last year, according to the Methodist Year Book of 1912. "It has been a lean year for the Methodist Episcopal Church." To be more specific:

Our total net gain of members and probationers is only 34,214, less than one per cent. Considering the fact that we have more than three and a half millions of members and over two hundred and fifty millions of dollars invested in property and endowment, the returns for the year are pitifully meager. If the statistical returns are a measure of progress, the Methodist Episcopal Church has been marking time in 1911.

The following figures, according to the editor, while not triumphant, are anything but hopeless."

The home conferences show a gain of 22,085, less than seven-tenths of one per cent. The ten German conferences in the United States show a loss of 2,094 members and probationers; the Italian Mission shows a loss of 192; the two Norwegian and Danish conferences report a gain of only sixty-seven, and the five Swedish conferences a gain of only seventy-seven. The twenty colored conferences report an increase of 4,502 in 1911, against a loss of 1,731 in 1910.

The conferences in the foreign field report a gain of 12,129, five thousand less than the gain of last year. The European conferences show a gain of only 868 for the year. South America shows a loss of 915. The conferences in Asia, including India, China, Korea, the Philippines, and Hawaii, show a gain of 8,860. It is interesting to note that the gain in Korea is only 302, and the gain in the five conferences of China is only ninety-five for the year. In view of the great revivals reported in Korea and in certain parts of China these meager returns are disappointing. Africa makes the best showing for the foreign field, with an increase of 2,250, (twenty-two per cent.)

The leakage in the Epworth League is the most disheartening feature, in our judgment, of the entire report. For this condition, and the small increase in church membership the Advocate believes that the pastors are largely responsible. "The matter of church membership, and the prosperity of the local church organization is their first and supreme concern." These figures are significant:

The Epworth League reports 14,075 Senior chapters with 594,478 members; and 6,033 Junior chapters with 224,414 members, a loss of 288 Senior chapters and 9,780 members; and a loss of 220 Junior chapters and 10,662 members.

Multiplying Skeleton Churches

Hon. Seth Low of New York has lately coined the epithet "skeleton churches." This is a species which ought soon to be extinct. Denominational rivalry builds churches while stubbornly refusing to count the cost. It would seem that the sectarian spirit is stronger than any other consideration. Minister is arrayed against minister, altar against altar, creed against creed in this struggle for existence. Discussing the situation the Central Christian Advocate has this to say:

It really is ridiculous that in a little new town way up in Montana there should be a Methodist Episcopal church, and just across the road a Methodist Episcopal, South, church, when either one of the churches could hold about all the people there are in the town. But the other denominations have raced in also. They occupy the other corners. And really are not some of those churches mere parasites?

A writer on religious conditions claims that this is one of the causes why the religious life is declining. Men of common sense are outraged by a denominational pride and jealousy and proselytism which certainly can not be of the Nazarene. Hence they absent themselves. And the world wags on—waiting for that good time when men will put the Christianity of Christ before denominational shibboleths.

Mayor Gaynor Criticizes the Clergy

For a man who talks as much as Mayor Gaynor does he says some things that are wondrous wise. Recently he was invited to say something about the conditions which make for better civic government at a dinner of the Congregational Club of New York. He said—we quote from the Literary Digest—"The ministers have been preaching for thousands of years to have the Ten Commandments obeyed, and they have not succeeded very well yet." He reminded his hearers "that they would have the mayor shut up every saloon, stop every gambling house, every disorder and every vice just within twenty-four hours and make one job of it." He denounced those clergymen who expect reforms to be accomplished in the twinkling of an eye, and who indulge in "cheap criticism of public officials," but whose influence suffers because on election day they forget the difference between local and national issues, and vote a straight party ticket "no matter who is on it or what principles are involved in the election." And then he proceeded to do some excellent preaching to the preachers:

How far does your influence extend? Do you reach out among the people. Who are you? You are intellectual people. You have been educated. You can listen to an intellectual discourse such as we heard here and to like discourses from your preachers and your ministers. But who are you and how far does your influence in this community extend? Do you reach out among the unfortunate and the lowly and those that want to be lifted up? Or are your churches so finely aisled and cushioned and carpeted that a man like that will stand at the door and be afraid to go in? Who are you?

Does the great heart of Jesus throb in you—the one who took all the lowly by the hand and said, Come unto me and I will help you? You must answer that question for yourselves. When I go to the churches, one-quarter filled, here in this town, and look at the fine pews and carpets and cushions and the absence of anybody who has on his hand the sign of toil, I begin to wonder whether all this is not tending to a failure after all. We can be little coteries unto ourselves and think we are good, and try to be good, but is the heart of Jesus among us after all? In the last analysis of everything we have to answer that question. How much good are you doing? No doubt by the force of example you are doing much, but is the world in intellectual growth and spirituality greater now than in former ages? Is it so? You read the Old Testament. Is there more poetry, more spirituality, more religion, more lofty conception in your churches and among your preachers than you find in that book? Have we grown in spirituality and virtue, or not? I am almost tempted to ask has anybody come on this earth since the Twenty-third Psalm was written, who was able to write that psalm?

Episcopalian Enterprise in New York

We have become so familiar with the idea that New York is merely an enlargement of the ancient Sodom that momentous events in the religious life of the city are likely to escape attention. This page has already mentioned the plans for the Cathedral of Saint John the Divine and for St. Thomas. It is further proposed to plant Episcopal churches in the newer parts of New York City. Already twenty church houses are being built in the Bronx and Westchester districts. An idea of the needs of adequate church privileges in the metropolis may be gained from the fact that in one little section of the city where four years ago it was all open field there are now living 12,000 families without a single church near them.

As further evidence of the large minded policies of Bishop Greer, his calling together a committee of 100 laymen, some of them the most prominent in the affairs of New York, and organizing the Laymen's Missionary Committee, may be noted. It is proposed to raise $300,000 more this year than was raised last.

—Rev. Robert S. MacArthur, D. D., has sailed for Russia on his contemplated mission to the Czar. He goes bearing letters from President Taft, and letters from Secretary of State Knox to ambassadors in all countries in Europe and Asia which he expects to visit. His mission to Russia is to ask the Czar and the Russian government for a larger measure of religious liberty for all peoples of all faiths within his vast empire. Dr. MacArthur has succeeded in raising a considerable sum of money with which to complete the church in St. Petersburg. He will assist in the dedication while there, and will visit Moscow, where are other Baptist churches. He will go to other European centers, where Baptist strength has much increased of late. Then he will continue around the world, visiting especially missions in Burma and finally reaching San Francisco, will inspect home mission work on the coast and in the Rocky Mountain states.

—At the Ecumenical Methodist Conference held recently in Toronto, with delegates from all parts of the world, the astonishing fact was revealed that there has been a decrease in the world-membership during the past decade, which was attributed by the delegates to loss of earnestness. The Methodist churches in the United States, Canada, and Japan reported in that period a loss in net membership increase, while the churches in Great Britain, Ireland, France, South Africa, Australia, and the mission field showed an absolute loss in membership. In the western section the increase in members in the decade ending 1891 was 1,261,209, while in the late decade it was only 437,562, the latter increase being but fifteen per cent., as contrasted with the former of thirty-three per cent. This, according to H. K. Carroll, of New York, secretary of that section, was due to a "decrease in earnestness."

Temptations We May Avoid

Temptation implies ideals. The man with nothing to do cannot be turned aside from his duty. The traveler whose destination is nowhere never loiters in the shade so long that he can say he is behind time. The greatness of his ideals adds to the number and strength of the temptations besetting the Christian. The Christian thinker has always found in man's failure to live up to the standard set for him a most serious and perplexing problem. Those who expect nothing of humanity are not bothering about its failures.

The right kind of companionship removes many temptations and weakens the force of many others. By seeking our pleasure with persons whose chief characteristic is love of pleasure we invite failure. We can take a vacation from our business and come back to it invigorated in body and mind. But we cannot take a vacation from Christian living and come back renewed in faith. We leave off Christian conduct whenever we submit to the guidance of the idle and frivolous. The daily companionship of men and women who stimulate our better impulses and make us ashamed of our unworthy ambitions is necessary to our highest welfare.

Reading is a means of keeping before the mind the right kind of ideas. We sin because the idea of the action that is wrong persists in our minds. We can get rid of this idea only by substituting ideas that lead to good conduct. Of course the Christian will have in his mind some of the great verses of the Bible. He may not be a Bible student in the technical sense, but he must get hold of the great ideas of the Bible if he is to be a disciple of Jesus. The biographies of the pioneers of the faith furnish the mind with sound principles of ethics and religion and arouse the emotion needed to give effect to these principles.

The divided life is doomed to failure. There were some in the early church who made the attempt to be on good terms with God and with the world. They wished to enjoy the blessings of faith without the life of self-denial which makes faith real and abiding. The little faith they had only served to deepen their misery, it could not keep them from sin. Neither the world nor Christ honors a divided life. The only safety for the Christian is to seek first the kingdom and its righteousness. All his actions must be guided by this one great aim.

Something more is demanded than the general purpose to serve God. Every one of us must have his work to do and be up and at it. We can be associated with men devoid of faith if we are devoted to our work. The missionary grows strong in the midst of the darkest heathenism. Many traders and travelers, having no sense of obligation to the non-Christian peoples, grow worse by contact with savagery and barbarism. If from our place of work we can see the whole world and feel the importance of our contribution to its welfare, we are not likely to yield to the allurements of vice.

How are we to avoid the temptation to be suspicious of everything new and yet meet with success the opposite temptation to despise the old because it is old? It is our business to assist the church in its progress that it may know the whole truth and do its full amount of service. The church does not know all there is to be known and it is not doing all that ought to be done for its members and for the world. It is a sin not to be open-minded. The blind self-satisfied Pharisee received the severest condemnation of the Lord. On the other hand, we do know some things and we have some good customs. In our zeal for the new we easily become impatient with familiar truth and goodness. There is no rule for avoiding these extremes, especially is there no rule that will take the place of hard, honest thinking. It is something, however, to recognize the difficulty.

If we are ever to have the best before our minds, we must think of Jesus daily. The hour of meditation and prayer has been prominent in the lives of the great exponents of the Christian faith. After making all due allowance for individual differences, we have a right to insist that every disciple shall find a way of keeping before his mind the great deeds and sayings of Jesus. Sin is most hateful and vile when Jesus is present to the soul. In his presence there is inspiration for service. Then, if ever, our decisions are correct and conscience is obeyed and rightfully exercises its authority. We do not attempt to justify ourselves in wrong doing. Past failures cease to be reasons for refusing to claim our birthright in the kingdom of righteousness. [Midweek Service, Jan. 31. James 4:1-8.]

The Blight of Legalism

No reader at all acquainted with the historic ideals of the Disciples of Christ can have escaped shock and hurt at the position frankly taken by the letters of Hon. Z. T. Sweeney, published in last week's Christian Century. For many years Dr. Sweeney has been recognized as possessing all the rights which public reputation can give of being a representative of the Disciples. In the vital matter upon which his correspondence expressed a pronounced conviction, many are now wondering to what extent his views are shared by his brethren. As was indicated in our reply last week, it is The Christian Century's opinion that Dr. Sweeney does not speak either for the historic ideals of the Disciples or for their contemporaneous opinion when he refuses to acknowledge the membership in the Church of Christ of Presbyterians, Methodists and others who may not have been immersed at baptism.

A letter lies before us, written by one of our most prominent and influential pastors, expressing his astonishment that this question need be argued at all and affirming his belief that not five per cent of Disciple ministers would agree with the position taken by Dr. Sweeney. Interestingly enough the proportion first put down was ten per cent, the figure "10" being scratched out and "5" substituted. Whether this correspondent's estimate is correct or not it is a matter of grave concern that any considerable proportion of those allied with this movement for Christian unity should be in the slightest degree hesitant in according to those brethren to whom this plea is addressed, the fullest Christian status. That there should be any tolerance of vagueness or reserved utterance on a point so absolutely fundamental, is symptomatic of the presence in our body of an influence tending to completely prevert the ideals with which our history began.

In all honesty it must be confessed that the Disciples have not, since the earliest days, made clean-cut pronouncements of the Christian status of their brethren of many names. It would seem as if this were a question their writers and other leaders have sought to avoid. There is not one page in all the literature of the Disciples where a representative teacher has fairly faced the members of the evangelical bodies around us and dealt with them in complete intellectual frankness. This is a singular fact, for the outstanding characteristic of the Disciple mind has ever been its courage to think things through; but our courage has failed, apparently, right at this point. In our practical relations with these brethren, we have gone on the assumption that they were, of course, members of the Church of Christ, as truly such as are we ourselves. But when the question has been raised in consciousness and especially in connection with the view of baptism commonly current among us, we have recoiled at the conclusion to which our logic led us and have refused to think further.

This habit of avoiding the issue is typically illustrated in Dr. Sweeney's correspondence. The nub and core of our response to his previous article was a direct reply to his inquiry concerning the church membership of those who had received no other baptism except so-called "infant baptism." Having stated our own position with complete candor, we asked for Dr. Sweeney's position on this point, calling his especial attention to it at the end of the correspondence "lest he should be tempted away from it" by any other considerations. When his next article was received, no reference to this question could be found in it. Dr. Sweeney had taken up other matters. Before publishing his article, a direct request was sent him calling his attention to this omission. This brought a reply palpably evasive. A third request was sent, which made the publication of the main article contingent on a fair facing of this central issue, and which brought from Dr. Sweeney this unequivocal reply: "I do not hold 'that there are members of Christ's Church who have received no other baptism than infant baptism.' . . . I fully and freely recognize his [presumably one who has received only "infant baptism"] piety, devotion and sincere intentions, but if he has failed to comply with gospel prerequisites for membership, I don't feel called upon to change the gospel requirements to suit his conditions. God has limited me to the terms of the gospel, though he may not have limited Himself." These statements taken in connection with Dr. Sweeney's contention that the physical act of immersion is one of the "gospel prerequisites for membership" in Christ's Church, leave no room for doubt as to where our brother stands.

How can we account for the existence of a sentiment such as this in a body of Christians committed fundamentally and historically to the reunion of Christ's divided people? How can it be accounted for even though it is held by ever so small a proportion of the members of such a body, or even by a single representative of the body such as Dr. Sweeney would be assumed to be? Our answer is that a legalistic mode of thought has organized and established itself in the minds of this body of pleaders for Christian unity, the effect of which is to poison their plea at its root and to blight its fine flower whenever it bursts forth into practice. How, historically, legalism came to make its home with us, it is not our purpose now to consider. It is sufficient to say that it is totally alien to the spiritual conceptions permeating the "Declaration and Address" and equally alien to the catholic temper and natural mode of thought of Thomas Campbell, the author of that great document.

This legalism has affected the Disciples in varying degrees. In its extremest manifestation it has been the rock of division upon which the body has been definitively split within the past quarter century. The anti-missionary society, anti-instrumental music, anti-remunerated pastor group of Disciples, numbering perhaps 150,000, frankly avow the logic of legalism and propagate it. These brethren say that Christ has put the physical act of immersion as the last of four indispensable steps into his church. They do not hesitate to say, therefore, that Presbyterians and others who have not been immersed, are not members of the Church of Christ, not Christians. They have not complied with the "terms" of pardon. The Church of Christ, thus, is held to be limited to those who have been immersed, although a live point of discussion among them is the question whether Baptist immersion, not having been performed "for the remission of sins," is valid.

The main body of the Disciples, however, have found the logic of these reactionary brethren altogether impossible for them. Their heart is too big for the gnarled sectarianism to which the strict construction of legalistic premises leads them. But the blight of legalism is upon even them. It takes the form of an inescapable inhibition. It throttles their plea for unity. The great words of Christian fraternity die on their lips. The prophetic commission on which they were sent goes unannounced. In talking of Christian unity they are forced either to demand that all Christian people shall see as they see and unite with them or they must be content to speak mellifluous platitudes which float as high above the actual problem of unity as possible. And so the Disciples of Christ, to whom was committed the solution of problem of unity, exhibit today to the Christian world the almost tragic paradox of having themselves become a further complication of the problem.

The explanation of this abortive outcome of our history is the legalism that has honey-combed our thinking. It has stricken us dumb in the presence of our great opportunities. It has tied our tongue on the very primal thesis of our cause, that for the practical acceptance of which Thomas Campbell was persecuted, namely, the joyful conviction that our brethren about us are Christians, members of the Church of Christ, and that their churches are churches of Christ, as truly such as are our own. Not many of our brethren will be willing to take their stand with Dr. Sweeney on the precise ground of the reactionary wing of the Disciples, denying Christian status to Presbyterian and Methodist Christians, but a great number will be found unwilling to proclaim positively that they are Christians, members of the Church of Christ. Among us at this moment there is not a single newspaper that will risk its commercial interests on such an affirmation. Again and again the revered and benignant editor of the paper more likely than others so to do, has been importuned publicly and by private correspondence to make such an unequivocal statement of the attitude of the Disciples. This he has not done through the paper. Since the editorship has passed into other hands, there is even less likelihood of such a statement being made. The attitude of the other leading journal is indicated by its recent description of Methodist converts on the mission field as "unbaptized heathen enrolled by denominational missionaries"!

Hence there has developed a euphemistic nomenclature among us by which we refer to Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Methodists in non-committal terms as "believers," "our religious neighbors," "members of the denominations," or "the pious unimmersed." If we speak of them as "Christians," it is usually in some context where no particular attention is called to it, or else we add "in a sense," or "as it were," or qualify the title by calling attention to their "imperfect obedience."

Why all this inhibition in our hearts? Why this vagueness, this awkwardness of speech, this most ungracious patronage of God's saints and children? Why will not some other journal besides The Christian Century make the joyful and unequivocal declaration on behalf of the Disciples that Methodists, Congregationalists and Presbyterians are Christians, members of the Church of Christ? For this plain reason: There is no place for such a conviction in the hard, metallic legalistic system which has established itself in so many Disciples' minds. That system says there are four "terms" of pardon—baptism is the last "term"—baptism and immersion are equivalents—no pardon nor church membership without baptism—therefore no pardon nor church membership without immersion—therefore Presbyterians and the rest, the majority of whom have not been immersed, are not members of the Church of Christ nor do they possess the promise of forgiveness.

Thus the blight of legalism has fallen upon us. Its unchristian categories form the essential structure of those minds who think as Dr. Sweeney thinks, and for the rest who have been indoctrinated with its false premises, it chokes the holiest and most Christian impulses of the heart.

What, more specifically, is legalism? Dr. Sweeney in his article published last week, heroically espouses legalism, declaring that a legalist is "one who stands for close adherance to law." This would seem to be a virtue, indeed. But of course, Dr. Sweeney totally fails to comprehend what legalism is when he sets it over against "anarchism." Legalism is not oppossed by anarchism. Legalism is opposed by spiritual-ism. This latter word, however, has an offensive technical meaning. On this account the word vitalism may be regarded as preferable. The legalist in religion is not one who stands especially "for close adherence to law." He is one who stands for close adherence to a fictitious law, an arbitrary law, a law decreed by a divine potentate, a "plan of salvation," especially "devised" by God but to which God has not limited his own actions, having reserved to Himself, the power to pardon and save men, if He so chooses, on other terms than those laid down in the "plan."

Vitalism declares that all such legalistic conceptions of Christianity are alien to the New Testament, abhorrent to the mind of Christ and essentially immoral. Vitalism stands for close adherence to law, to real law, the law of life; for the principles, the forces, the realities of God's nature, not the arbitrary rules which he is alleged to have decreed. Vitalism affirms that God has only one way of saving man—that is in accordance with the eternal laws of His own being and of man's nature, not in accordance with a special plan the divine mind has hit upon. Christ, the vitalist declares, is not a legal ambassador from heaven charged with a legal commission to deliver; he is the revelation, the disclosure, of the eternal laws of God's life and of man's life. "There is no other name given under heaven or among men whereby we may be saved." Where legalism goes back to rules and regulations, to

"terms" of pardon and a "plan" of salvation and finds law, vitalish goes back to Jesus Christ and finds life. The Church of Christ is not commissioned to announce terms of pardon which may be altered or abrogated when the soul finally appears before God; it is commissioned to announce the only terms on which God ever can save any man, now or at the judgment. The notion that God limited the apostles and the church to preach a certain rule of obedience, but did not limit Himself, is the essence of legalism and gives us a religion immoral at the core. This immoral doctrine is Dr. Sweeney's doctrine. It is this doctrine which has made its nest in the consciousness of the Disciples of Christ, checking our spiritual life and inhibiting the practice of our plea.

The Visitor

It was a happy inspiration which led the founders of the ancient New England colony at Boston to bestow the name of Cambridge upon the suburb in which the oldest of American educational institutions was to grow up. For Cambridge was the name of one of England's two great seats of learning, and though there was no River Cam to be bridged as in the older college town, the name was justified in the educational associations which gathered about the new settlement.

It was only a few years after the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock, that John Harvard gave his library, his fortune and his name to the school which gave witness to the love of learning among these pioneers of the new world. No such pretentious institution was then dreamed of as now bears the name of Harvard. In fact, the whole of Boston was but a little place. The fathers of the borrough sat in solemn conclave one day and decided that land would never be worth taking up beyond the western frontier of Newton, another of their suburbs!

Today Harvard is our oldest, and in some regards our greatest, university. It has grown from a single building to be almost a town by itself. Its numbers, in students and instructors, exceed four thousand. And its endowments are among the most extensive in the list of American university equipments. The town of Cambridge in which it is situated, is now one of the most populous and enterprising portions of Boston, and it has been brought much nearer the center of the city by electric cars that give easy and rapid access to the business district.

The position of university preacher at Harvard is somewhat unique. Six ministers are chosen each year, representing different denominations. These, together with the resident Chairman of the Board of Preachers, occupy the pulpit of the University on the Sundays of the academic year. Each of them serves for a period of four weeks, divided into two sections of a fortnight, coming at different times in the year: one in the autumn and one in the winter, or one in the winter and the second in the spring.

The duties of the preacher are not laborious; yet they are precise and important. He preaches in Appleton Chapel, the University Church, on the Sunday at eleven, and each week day he conducts a fifteen-minute chapel service. In addition, he has a conference period of two hours daily, and is supposed to concern himself with such other features of the religious life of the University as may offer him occasion.

At Harvard, attendance upon the Sunday services and the daily chapel is purely voluntary. The number of students present on Sunday morning perhaps averages about three hundred and fifty, and at daily prayers probably fifty would be a fair estimate. These members contrast strikingly with the fifteen or eighteen hundred undergraduates always present at the Yale services, where attendance is required. But at Harvard the speaker has the satisfaction of knowing that the men who come are there of their own free will, and are not inwardly rebellious and on the point of becoming actually demonstrative in case the service runs a little beyond the conventional limit. It is for this reason, doubtless, that President Hadley is at pains to explain to each successive preacher the traditional belief that the souls of those present are accounted saved after twenty minutes of preaching! At Harvard no such precautions are needed.

The preacher's home is in Wadsworth House during his stay at Cambridge. This is the oldest building on the campus, facing Harvard Square, and was the home of the first president of the college, from whom it takes its name. The preacher's quarters are comfortable and roomy. On the walls of the living room are the portraits of such former preachers as Phillips Brooks, Stopford Brooke, Bishop Lawrence, Lyman Abbott, George A. Gordon, Washington Gladden and Henry Van Dyke. A small, but select library is at his disposal. He takes his meals at the Colonial Club or the Harvard Union as he chooses, the former being the faculty rendezvous, the latter the student headquarters.

The conference periods give admirable opportunity for conversation with young men who drop in for counsel or social conversation. There is nothing formal about these calls. Some of those who come in have personal problems on which they want light. Some are undecided about their life work, and here good service can be rendered, particularly in the cases of such as are not quite sure of the ministry as a vocation. The mine of experience which is opened up to sympathetic inspection in such conferences is profoundly interesting.

Harvard University has two divinity schools. The regular theological department is under the direction of Dean Fenn, who for ten years was the minister of the leading Unitarian church in Chicago. Recently Andover Theological Seminary has been moved to Cambridge, and is now housed in an admirable building on the campus. President Fitch and his faculty have brought to Harvard an addition of great value to its religious equipment.

Phillips Brooks House, on a corner of the campus, is nominally the home of the Students' Christian Association. But in reality it is much more than this, for it serves as the clearing house for all the student religious activity in the University. Several of the denominations have clubs of their own, making their headquarters here, and a large amount of social service work in Boston is managed from this center. Every week a reception is given the students in the parlors, at which the members of the faculty and their wives are able to meet any who choose to come in for an hour of conversation and simple refreshments.

President Lowell, the successor of Dr. Eliot as executive of Harvard, is recognized as a valuable acquisition in the administration of the University. A new residence is being erected for him, which will add much to the social life of the place. The list of distinguished men on the faculty includes some of the leading names in American educational activity. Prof. Edward C. Moore, the chairman of the Board of Preachers, and head of the department of Systematic Theology, is also the chairman of the Prudential Committee of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. His brother, Prof. George E. Moore, holds the chair of the History of Religion, and is a preacher of power, much in demand in Boston and elsewhere. Prof. Josiah Royce is the head of the department of philosophy, one of the strongest and most varied of its order in the world. Prof. Lyon of the department of Semitics was recently the Director of the American School of Archaeology in Jerusalem. But the list is long, and need not be repeated here.

The Disciples in Harvard are not as numerous as at Yale, but are known and respected in their departments. It was the satisfaction of the Visitor to be the guest of this group at the Harvard Union one evening during his stay. The number included W. A. Parker, formerly of Emporia, Kan., now pastor of the Everett Church in Boston, assistant to Prof. Palmer in philosophy, and nearing the close of his work for the doctorate; K. F. Nance, of Ft. Worth, Texas, Drake '08, now preaching at Lynn, Social Ethics and Philosophy, graduate school; W. C. McCallum, of Melbourne, Australia, Transylvania '10, now in the Divinity School and preaching at Swampscott; I. L. Williamson, Oklahoma State Normal, '11, preparing for teaching, Graduate school, Philosophy; Dana Murdock, of Clarkston, Wash., Washington State College, Social Ethics; L. V. Liewrance, Wilmington, O., Harvard College, '12; Barton Haggard, Drake '08, history and government, and F. L. Crafft, Fulton, Mo., Georgetown College, '01, graduate school. The Disciples have no club at Harvard, but they meet on occasion, and those who are preachers render such services as they may to our churches in that vicinity.

Though Harvard has the reputation of being very advanced in its theology, and of leaning strongly toward Unitarian ideas, yet there have been Disciples there every year for the past fifteen years, and some of them have come from our most conservative colleges; while among the letters received by the faculty of Harvard have been strong words of commendation and approval from Disciples who have usually professed themselves hostile to the critical and scientific studies pursued by ministerial students in the graduate universities. The tone in which one speaks depends much on the circle in which he is speaking.

Editorial Table Talk

Testimony of World Traveler to Missions

Now that the social value of missions is being appreciated, it is inspiring to read the testimony to their worth by such an impartial observer as the late William E. Curtis, for many years correspondent for The Chicago Record-Herald. His evidence is all the more valuable since he had not previously been interested in missions. We are learning that Christianity concerns itself with the well being of man, and to introduce an electric light or a printing plant into a benighted country is a work of grace, a vital power in the social salvation of any people. If the wind and storm can fulfill God's word, surely these milder agencies can be made to work out his vast designs. And that they are so being used is evident to all men who are living in this favored year of grace. The genius of Christianity is progress and improvement, and to leave men in benighted conditions after their souls had been illumined, would be a mighty temptation, and almost the guarantee that the light would soon become darkness. Whatever concerns the well-being of the race is a matter of the utmost concern for the church and the missionary.

Speaking especially of the civilizing forces and facilities for material and intellectual betterment that have entered Turkey through missionary agencies, Mr. Curtis says:

The first electric telegraph instrument was set up by missionaries. They introduced the first sewing machine, the first printing press and the first modern agricultural implements. They built the first hospitals, they started the first dispensary and the first modern schools. . . . The most far-reaching work of the American missionaries is educational, which comprehends all races, all religions and all languages. Their influence is thus extended to every community, because no student leaves an American institution without carrying with him the germs of progress which must affect the family and the neighborhood and all the inhabitants with whom he may thereafter come in contact. This influence has been working for half a century or more, and has been preparing the minds of the people for the great change that has recently come over them. The missionaries do not teach revolution; tney do not encourage revolutionary methods, but they have always preached and taught liberty, equality, fraternity and the rights of man. . . . Although the Armenian claims to be the oldest branch of the Christian church, yet when the American missionaries came they had only a few manuscript copies of the Bible, kept in monasteries or in the larger churches, carefully guarded by priests who were themselves unable to read the text, while people were permitted only to kiss the covers, which were often of solid silver. Today, thanks to Dr. Elias Riggs, one of the veteran American missionaries, every Armenian can have his copy of the Scriptures in his own language at a nominal price.

Militant Sermons in the Interest of Peace

The great preachers like Jowett, Cadman and Jefferson have been setting the nation's conscience on fire with great utterances in favor of international peace. Recently, Dr. Cadman preached a sermon in favor of the arbitration treaties which created a profound impression, reminding some of his older hearers of Beecher's preachings in the days of the anti-slavery crusade. Dr. Jowett would disarm the nation and have it stand a martyr in the cause of peace. It is said that at times in the delivery of this sermon, a death-like stillness settled upon the congregation. Dr. Charles E. Jefferson was no whit behind his brethren in voicing a protest against army maneuvers, military display, and all demonstrations that would inspire in the youth a love for martial glory. History on such occasions is being repeated; the pulpit is once more vindicating its right to be heard, and moulding a nation's thought. The teachings of Jesus, as well as the power of an enlightened conscience, make all civilized people stand aghast at the contemplation of war. Nothing is more certain than that the principles of peace must prevail, and that the armaments of the nations shall fall into utter decay.

Church Growth Greater Than Nation's

Under the above title, Mr. E. A. Oldenburg has a very instructive article in the Continent. After mentioning the frequent criticism of the church he shows that the increase in membership between 1890 and 1906 was 6.4 per cent larger than the increase in population. In the matter of wealth the church has not only kept pace with the nation's increase but "far outran it." He says:

Taking the single item of value of places of worship the church had invested in 1860, $171,397,932. This at the same rate of progression as the national wealth would have amounted in 1911 to $1,371,183,456. The census for 1906 gives for this same item $1.257,575,867. This, however, is only 87.7 per cent of the total, only that number of churches having reported. If, for the sake of being conservative, we should say that only one-tenth of the churches failed to report, we should still have $1,397,306,519 invested in places of worship, or $26,000,000 more in 1906 than we should have had in 1911 had the church merely kept step with the nation in its marvelous material development. Surely, for an institution constantly decried as dying, the church is about the most lively corpse this world ever saw.

In the matter of church attendance, the following will be encouraging to those who have accepted the oft-repeated assertions that church attendance is on the decline:

The one cause on which the fear of the skeptic bases itself is the apparent attendance at church services. We say "apparent" because the actual attendance is cause for encouragement rather than alarm. Dr. Miller, speaking of the attendance in a Philadelphia church on a Sunday, gives the total for the morning and evening services and the Sunday-school at about fifty per cent above the reported membership of the church and says, quite truly, that there is no cause for alarm at such attendance. As far as we have been able to investigate in our "neck of the woods," the combined attendance for the three services would double the enrolled membership of most churches. Even in midsummer, without an evening service, we found the combined attendance at the morning service and the Sunday-school a goodly margin in advance of the enrolled membership. So it would seem that fifty per cent above the actual enrollment of the church would give a fair average for attendance on Protestant services. This would give a grand total of about 36,000,000 of people attending divine services each Lord's day. To this must be added the multitudes that attend the hundreds of special meetings during the week conducted by evangelists, Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A., and kindred institutions, and the various missions in large cities, etc. Passing through the down town streets of the city of St. Paul one Sunday evening, we found the Union Gospel Mission, the Salvation Army, the American Volunteers and one or two individual preachers, all conducting open-air services and all surrounded by goodly crowds; and this is repeated all over the land. Certainly it is safe to say that 40,000,000 of our people are being reached by Protestant efforts each week. There is no other cause that reaches such a great number of people.

The Negro in the City

The more progressive negroes are fast moving into the cities and here their development is often being checked. There are now in Chicago about fifty thousand negroes. In Philadelphia and Washington, D. C., there are still more. The negro in the city seems to meet with improvement. He has superior educational advantages in public schools. He gets better wages than in the south and it is no uncommon thing for him to own his own home and to have many of the luxuries the white people enjoy. There are, however, many evils that more than offset these advantages. Owing to the prejudice of the whites, they are not able to rent property in the more desirable sections. Hence in most cities the negro section and the red light district are not far separated. This has a marked effect on the morality of the city negro and attacks the rising man in the point where he is especially weak. Furthermore the city negro church loses hold of the negro. 50,000 negroes in Chicago have church property of only $178,000 and are probably in debt for that. Every negro in the south is likely to be a church-member. In the city less than a fourth or a fifth of the negro population has anything to do with the church and it is marked that the more intelligent are those who are leaving the church. It is because the new educational standards have not been met with an increase of ability in the negro pulpit. Those who know the typical negro church of the city realize that the minister is apt to be an intellectual weakling compared to many of his flock. Thus the church and religion are far less a means of social control in the city than in the country. It is to be noted also, that great physical deterioration is setting in in the city. The forces that threaten the whites, are a far greater menace to the blacks. There are the diseases of immorality which are exacting their terrible toll. The negro is weak in the lungs and the continual city infection of lung diseases produces a death rate two or three times as great from consumption and pneumonia. Thus we face the sad fact that the most progressive negroes are rushing to the cities only to be moved down by hostile forces which they are not able to combat.

—One of the things which distinguish the present from many if not all past ages is the provision which is made for compensating inventors, discoverers and scholars. A most remarkable type of this sort of philanthropy is seen in the Nobel Prizes. Alfred Nobel wae the inventor of dynamite. The reading of Baroness Von Suttner's

"Lay Down Your Arms" converted him and he became a hearty advocate of the peace movement. The large fortune he had made in making munitions of war he devoted to promoting peace and the peaceful arts. He arranged his will so that a commission should distribute each year $40,000 each to the leading workers in science, literature and the peace movement. On December 10 the eleventn annual distribution of prizes was made. King Gustav of Sweden distributed this year's prizes to Mme. Curie for excellence in chemistry, Prof. Wilhelm Wein for work in physics, Prof. Allvar Gullstrand for the most valuable discovery in medicine and Maurice Maeterlinck for eminence in literature. On the same day in Christiana, Norway, the Nobel Peace Prizes were awarded to Prof. T. M. C. Asser, of the Netherlands, founder of the Institute of International Law, and to Alfred Fried, of Vienna.

—There are probably few men who so constantly, and on the whole with so little reason, come under the critics' lash as the parochial clergy. Rev. F. Rothwell Dean, rector of Reddish, Manchester, England, published in his parish magazine a list of the "trials of a parish priest." The list includes the following:

If he delivers a written sermon he is a back number; if he preaches extempore he is a shallow thinker; if he is not always calling upon his people he is unsociable; if he visits to any extent he is a "gadabout;" if he demurs at acting as a man-of-all-work he is lazy; if he rings the bell, lights the fires, and performs a score of other odd jobs it would be better if he spent a little more time in his study; he could then give his congregation more intellectual sermons; if he is married "he is an awfully nice fellow, but his wife doesn't amount to much;" if he lives in single blessedness woe be to him, all the eligible—and many of the others—never speak to each other at the guilds and parish social, or else they do speak —gossip; if he is content on a small stipend he is "cheap;" if he timidly asks for a larger stipend, to live decently and in order, "he is worldly-minded."

—Rev. W. N. Nelson of Cheyenne, Wyo., is authority for the statement that in a total population of 145,000 in Wyoming there are only 22,000 church members. Of this number more than one-half are Roman Catholics, while of the remainder there are 2,330 Methodists, 2,000 Protestant Episcopalians, 1,370 Baptists, 1,407 Presbyterians and 1,309 Congregationalists. The reason for so small a proportion of church members is simply the want of denominational enterprise. Churches are multiplied beyond need in the cities while vast stretches of territory are left churchless. Frontier and circuit work does not command the enthusiasm of the class needed, for Wyoming settlers are fairly well educated and have small patience with a ministry which is not equally well educated.

—W. C. Brann, famous as the editor of The Iconoclast, and who was murdered in Waco, Texas, in 1898, was the son of Rev. Noble Brann, a Presbyterian minister. The journalist's son, William C., is one of the youngest licensed evangelists in the Presbyterian church, and Dr. T. J. Irwin of First church, Lawton, Okla., under whom he has studied, prophesies an exceptional future for him. Mr. Brann, who is still under twenty, for several years has been an active leader in Doctor Irwin's church and has particularly distinguished himself as a Bible student. He is acting as assistant pastor of the Lawton church, and Doctor Irwin says that his gospel preaching has attracted remarkable congregations.

—Perhaps, after all, reactionaries in all churches should be regarded with brotherly love, and not as messengers of Satan to buffet us. They must serve a useful purpose, since, like the poor, they are always with us, and no church is free from them. Among the Disciples they have had more advertising than most of the other churches will allow. But when we read of a good Baptist brother saying in the Baptist Flag, "My deliberate opinion is that we ought to declare them (Convention Baptists) a separate people from us and have no more fellowship with them than you would with the Catholics," we wish all such men could form an organization of their own, and continue the work of excommunication until not one was left to tell the tale.

—The New York police started a wide search last week for Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Keller, who, it is charged, have been married no less than seventy-five times in New York City and vicinity at a net profit of $750. Their method was to be married by a minister. The "bridegroom" would then give the minister a bogus $20 check, receiving $10 real money in change. The police declare Mr. and Mrs. Keller have been married twenty-two times in Manhattan, eleven times in the Bronx, three or four times in Staten Island, a few times in Queens and thirty-five times in Brooklyn, taking in $10 on each ceremony.

—An American writing from London to the Living Church (Episcopalian), says: "The popularity of the Bishop of London here seems unparalleled. I heard him preach Tuesday night at St. Paul's. There were three hundred clergy in the choir and over five thousand people in the nave; crowds standing in the rain waiting for the doors to be opened. The service was one of intercession for missions, with no especial features to attract, except the Bishop. Just a Litany, monotoned by priest and people, no choir, but congregational singing by the multitude, and a wonderful sermon. After that it was easy to understand his grip upon the people here."

—The Watchman, Boston: "Baptists and Free Baptists are admirably falling into line for their onward united march. All the official utterances of Baptist bodies that we have seen have cordially recognized and approved of the union. The same is generally true of Free Baptists. Their state associations in Maine, Rhode Island, New York, Indiana, Michigan and Iowa, not to mention other state and local associations, have given hearty expression of their belief in the principle of Christian union and of their purpose to honor it in all consistent ways."

—A significant incident occurred on a railway train in Michigan, when ex-President Roosevelt, who was en route, discovered that a humble friend of his was on the same train. He sent for him and had quite an interview with him. When this humble friend remarked about the readiness with which Colonel Roosevelt had consented to talk to him, Mr. Roosevelt straightened up and said: "There is no king that I can not talk to and no honest man that can't talk to me." No deliverance from any high source has exceeded this as a revelation of the true American character.

—A glacier in Montana is going begging; the Northern Pacific owns it but doesn't want it; the Interior Department might make it a part of Glacier National Park, but won't take it. As it covers about seventeen thousand acres it offers large opportunities to somebody who can find a use for that amount of perfctly good land overlaid with a few billion tons of ice.

—The Northern Presbyterian Board of Home Missions for Freedmen maintains one hundred and twenty-six schools for negroes in the South with 15,664 pupils enrolled. The contributions of the church to its work for negroes the past year reached a total of $214,377.24.

The War Through a Child's Eyes

By Ida Withers Harrison

EDITORS' NOTE: Of the many significant contributions being made during these semi-centennial years of the Civil War we have not seen an interpretation more intimate and graphic than this description of the tragic way in which the war touched the home life of the Southern people. The writer's home was in the very heart of the battle-field. Her father was a distinguished officer of the Secession forces. As a child she experienced the war's dissipation of her father's fortune and the wrecking of the family homestead. Her childish impressions have been carried in memory through the years and are recited here with frankness and verisimilitude. It is a goodly sign of the new temper that characterizes both North and South, not only that Mrs. Harrison should write these memorabilia without rancor, but that our readers will peruse them without resenting the candor of the author's rehearsal. The strife of those years is dead. On both sides of the line we have taken a higher point of view from which the wrongs and sorrows of that bitter conflict are no longer seen in partizan light as "yours or "ours," but have passed into the life of humanity where they are shared by all.

I.

Rumors of War.

I was not quite ten years old when the War between the States began, and I shall try to recall only what I saw and felt during those four years of splendid struggle, without reference to what I have since heard and read about it. I believe there is no more impressible period in life, than when the world of play is giving way to the world of dreams and ideals; I was on the threshold of that new world then. In my father's large library, I had just discovered some wonder books commonly called novels, filled with brave warriors, devoted lovers, and beautiful maidens, and my land of dreams was all tinged with the hues of romance. Into this secret and sacred realm of a child's imagination, the daring, the devotion, and the superb sacrifice of the war fitted like a part in some perfect pageant.

First, let me say, that my father was William Temple Withers, who had served in the Mexican War, and that we were living in Jackson, Mississippi, in a large place on the edge of the town.

I cannot recall that the early months of the war made any impression on me; it seemed as unreal and far off as the Crusades, or the Wars of the Roses. The first time it seemed to come near was when I heard my mother and my aunt talking pityingly of a certain Miss Louise, one of the belles of Jackson, whose lover had been killed at the battle of Bull Run; and when I next saw her pale, sad face, war ceased to be a thing apart, and began to cast its shadows on our little world.

The next time, was at a party given to the boys and girls of our acquaintance; instead of spending the afternoon dancing and playing games, we were put to work picking squares of linen into threads that we were vaguely told was lint for our wounded soldiers; but I hardly think it brought to any child there a conception of the death and suffering that was carried with it. We were all trying to see who could pull apart the greatest number of linen squares, and the most vivid rememberance I have of the party was the bright eyed girl, who was presented to us as the victor, and the cakes and lemonade which rewarded our labors. One of the beatitudes of childhood is that it can walk beside a dreadful chasm, and see only the flowers that grow on the edge! But though stripped of its horrors, war was no longer a far off dream; we had touched it, though only with childish fingers, raveling our good neighbors' table and bed linen into lint.

The next impression was tragic indeed! One of our public schools had been closed, because the building was used by the Government for a powder magazine; only the lower floor, however, was used for storage—the upper story was set apart for office rooms. One summer day, as we were sitting on the veranda, we heard a tremendous explosion, and the house shook as though from an earthquake. We soon learned that the powder magazine had blown up, and every one in the rooms above had been killed. Terrible tales were told of mutilated bodies and torn limbs lying around—but naturally, my good mother did not let her child see any of these horrors.

At the beginning of the war, my father was sent by President Davis into Kentucky, to enlist troops for the Confederate Army, and while there, he assisted in raising the First Kentucky Brigade. When he returned home, he immediately began to organize a regiment of artillery in Jackson and the surrounding country. From this time on, war, instead of being but a tale that was told, took the tangible form of soldiers and tents—and above all, of brass bands! The encampment was just outside of Jackson, and every afternoon, we would drive out to dress parade. This was the only regiment of light artillery in the Southern army, and was composed of ten batteries, and fifteen hundred men—the usual number in a regiment being one thousand men. Company A was made up of the young men of Jackson, and the most important event in the whole war to me was whether a certain young cousin of ours, Allen Sharkey, would be elected Third Lieutenant of that Company. I remember his sending bulletins to us about the progress of the election, and when he failed to get the coveted honor it seemed to my indignant heart that the South ought to hang its head in shame!

One other shadow on that stirring time was when the ladies of Jackson presented a beautiful flag to Company A, and my father, as I thought, responded to the presentation speech like the eloquent hero that he was. When he finished, I heard a censorious old lady near me remark, "The Colonel may be a good soldier, but he is a mighty poor speaker."

It seemed to me, that she deserved to be led forth, and shot on the spot by our of my father's cannon for such a disloyal speech.

With these exceptions, war seemed a gala affair then. There were many presentations of flags, generally by beautiful young girls. There was much military music, whether at dress parade, or concerts, or serenades—for in those days, admirers did come forth at dead of night, and sing under their true love's window. As my aunt was a young lady then, and often had a party of gay girls in the house with her, our slumbers were frequently disturbed by the strains of, "Come Where My Love Lies Dreaming," or "Ever of Thee," or "Lorena," or "Juanita." In my childish memories, war and song are inextricably woven together; the songs may not have ranked high as musical compositions, but few melodies have ever tugged at the heart like "The Bonnie Blue Flag," "Maryland," "The Vacant Chair," "Brave Boys," "When this Cruel War is Over," and the many, many "Mother Songs," in which the homesick hearts of our boys found utterance.

After the First Regiment of Light Artillery was thoroughly organized, it was sent to Vicksburg, which was recognized thus early in the war as one of the strategic points of the Confederacy. While there, before the first seige, in the summer and early fall of 1862 parties would go to Vicksburg to spend the day with their soldier friends. I remember going there one day, and seeing that city of hills alive with soldiers, and going to my father's tent, and seeing his Book of Psalms, and his Army Regulations lying side by side on his camp table, —for he, like so many of our leaders, was a soldier of Christ, as well as a soldier of his country.

II.

"Brave boys are they,
Gone at their country's call!
And yet—and yet, we must not forget
That many brave boys must fall."

—War Song.

During the interval between the first and second siege of Vicksburg, as Jackson was only forty-five miles distant with a railroad between, our town was full of Southern soldiers and had quite a martial atmosphere. There were several Kentucky regiments there, and as my father and grandfather were Kentuckians, many of them used to flock to our house—to say nothing of my aunt, and her young friends as a magnet. On these beautiful spring evenings the broad, front veranda would be filled with handsome officers, paying court to the young girls, and making the most of the brief interlude between marching and fighting. Nearly always there would be some one who could play on the guitar or banjo, and they would have some of those beloved songs of love and war, with everybody joining in the chorus. I doubt if the young ladies, into whose ears so many gallant, flattering speeches were whispered, enjoyed it as much as the quiet child, to whom all the world was a romance, and all the men and women merely actors in it. We had a wounded Kentucky soldier, Captain Ben Desha, staying in the house, but he was so handsome and so cheerful that even his sickness brought no thoughts of the dark side of war.

But now and then, there would come sinister sounds that should have kept us in mind of its cruel tragedies—and doubtless did to those old enough to understand. I can well remember of quiet evenings, when we would be sitting on one of the porches, that we would hear a dull and distant booming, like far off thunder—but I soon learned it was the guns at Vicksburg. It meant little to a child's light heart, but I have often thought since, what my mother must have felt as she listened—for my father commanded the artillery in the beleaguered town, and where there was heavy firing, there he was sure to be. How much of this watching and waiting and listening was done by the women of the South! And how their ears were ever strained for that most ominous sound of all—the echo of the footsteps of the messengers who bore them evil tidings of their loved ones!

But in a moment, as it were, this time of revelry by moonlight, these pageants of dress parade, were abruptly changed to rout and haggard defeat. I did not take it in then, but it was the approach of General Grant with his great army on its way to Vicksburg, that wrought this change. There had been skirmishing and fighting around Jackson for several days, and of course, General Joseph Johnston's little army was defeated. I remember, one beautiful May morning, my mother sending the children of the family over into my Grandmother Sharkey's woods—to be farther from the firing, they said. Our home was in the angle made by two of the principal roads approaching Jackson, and I suppose she thought the enemy might follow our soldiers and keep up the firing along the way. The servants who were with us, took some pillows and bolsters along—whether with an idea of spending a night in the wood, or of using them for defensive breastworks, I do not know. But before we had been gone long, we were called back, and there I saw the road in front of our house, the Vicksburg road, filled with our soldiers, marching hastily away. Some one said:

"General Johnston's army was retreating—they were going to evacuate Jackson."

An army in retreat!—what more tragic sight in the world! How different from the gay soldiers we had so often seen in holiday drill! A haggard anger—a stern sadness seemed to breathe from their ranks!

When we came back to the house, we found the women servants cooking everything in sight for our soldiers, and some of the men in the cellar, bringing up all the claret and champaign—for at this time, the Temperance Movement had never been heard of in the South, and everybody used wine on the table; soon all the household were running back and forth from the house to the road, carrying these refreshments to the retreating soldiers. I had the impression, as we ran across the large yard, that we had a great quantity of food and wine—but it disappeared like magic, before those weary, hungry fellows.

They had the start of the enemy, and had passed out of Jackson some time before General Grant's army entered. Now that it was known for certain that he was going to occupy the town, much remained to be done. My Grandfather Withers lived with us, and though he was nearing his three score and ten, he was a handsome, well preserved old man—so it was thought best for him to go to a friend in the country, for fear he might be taken prisoner, and sent to that dreaded place, a Northern prison; so he left hastily on his beautiful Kentucky saddle horse, a servant following with the carriage horses. Then my mother had no men on the place, except her negro coachman and gardner, to help her conceal her silver and valuables. Part of the silver was put in bags, generally linen pillow cases, and the two men sunk them in the cistern; some of it was buried under out houses, some was hidden in mattresses. All was done by these negro men, and no thought of their betraying these hiding places ever entered our minds. After this was done, there came the hard task of sitting and waiting for what might happen.

"Sad the sights and bitter traits of war."
—Spencer.

Our household consisted then of my mother and five children, of whom I was the oldest, and a baby of six months, the youngest, my aunt, and the servants. It was the fourteenth of May, a beautiful afternoon, and I shall never forget how still and peaceful everything seemed after the rush and excitement of the day. My mother had gathered us all around her at the front door, where we could watch the drive-way leading up to the house. Suddenly, two men on horseback, in the Union blue, dashed through the front gate, and dismounting, strode heavily up on the veranda. A little dog, a household pet, began to bark, and one of the men, with an oath, drew his pistol, and aimed at him, but my mother said, with unconscious satire,

"Don't shoot—he is too small to hurt you."

I think it was then that the baby began to cry, and received a new name; one of the soldiers cursed her, and called her a little Rebel—and Rebel she has been ever since. Just then, some of the servants cried out, that there were two more soldiers in a bed room, and when we went in there, we found one of them, kneeling before the bureau, with the drawers pulled out, and saying something about "searching for fire arms," as he hastily thrust a package into his pocket. They had slipped in a side gate, through an open windows, before any one noticed them. The stolen package was some plated forks and spoons, which had been bought for use in emergencies like this. Some one then called out, that there were more soldiers in the smoke house—and before we knew it, the place was alive with them, presumably searching for arms, but really after plunder. Then, we thought joyfully of the bread and meat and wine we had given our own soldiers. The rest of the afternoon is a blur of blue coats, prying and plundering everywhere on the place.

My Grandmother Sharkey lived in a large place just across the road, and about this time, (or possibly the next morning), my mother sent me over with some of the servants, to see how she was getting on. She was very excitable, and always said what she thought, and when we came up, she was standing on her back porch, roundly abusing a party of soldiers, who were chasing and catching her chickens. They seemed to be in a very good humor, and lightened the chase by mimicking her and advising her to keep her temper and save her breath for other occasions.

After dark, a distinct picture is photographed on my memory; my mother had gathered us all around her in her bed room, and there must have been fifteen or twenty soldiers in there, for there were not chairs enough for all, and some of them were seated on the floor. They seemed to be trying to anger my mother and my aunt by jeers and taunts. One of them, seemingly a German, kept asking:

"What for you fight mit de Union?"

Another repeated, over and over again, that Vicksburg would surrender on the coming Fourth of July—which it did. Our coachman, Uncle Abe, was standing just inside the door, and one of the men cursed him and ordered him out of the room. He seemingly obeyed by stepping just outside the door, where he stayed until they finally left, and I heard him say to my mother them,

"Miss Marthy, I wasn't goin' away and leave you and the children by yourselves with them men."

I have often thought since of the terrors of that time of two lonely, unprotected women like my mother and my aunt, for our place had large grounds and no near neighbors. The faithful negroes were all the protectors they had, except their own brave hearts. These soldiers who robbed the place, seemed to be under no discipline. I heard it said afterward that the advance guard and rear guard of an invading army were most to be dreaded, because their discipline was not so strict as the main body. I suppose these men belonged to the advance guard of the army, and that they selected a handsome, isolated dwelling as a place where they could plunder undisturbed.

After the soldiers left, some one knocked cautiously at the door, and a gentleman, one of our friends who had not left Jackson as most of the men had, came to see how we had fared. I remember the comfort that his kindly face brought, and that presently he knelt down with us and committed us to the care of our Heavenly Father. Before he left, he promised to go to Headquarters and try and get a guard for us. As we went to the door to see him off, the sky was red with the reflection from burning buildings, for the penitentiary and many of the public buildings were burned while the Union army was in Jackson. Each night, and all night, an angry, red sky hung over our poor town! Our friend was successful in getting a guard for us, and we suffered no more such outrages as that first afternoon brought us.

General Grant's army was only in Jackson two days, and then marched on to Vicksburg, where some bitter battles were fought before he finally invested the city. After the last of our enemies had gone, my grandfather came home safely, (horses and all), and our hidden treasure was brought back to light. The soldiers had not discovered a single hiding place, and all the silver they got was the poor plated ware in my mother's bureau. I don't believe it ever entered into the hearts of our good servants to betray us. During those dark days, when all the men, even the boys of the South were in the army, how many Southern women and children had only their faithful slaves to look to for advice and protection! And does not the fact that there is not a single instance on record of mistreatment of their helpless charges during these four years of war, prove conclusively that the relations between master and servant were, on the whole, kind and helpful?

The city of Toledo in Ohio, where the delightfully radical Brand Whitlock holds forth as mayor, has brought the street car companies to time. Toledo will have 3 cent fares for two hours in the morning and two hours in the afternoon, six tickets for 25 cents and universal transfers the remainder of the day as the result of a temporary agreement, pending franchise negotiations, reached between representatives of the company and city. This announcement followed closely on the heels of the application for a receivership for the company on behalf of friendly interests in the United States court. Representatives of the company and city got together shortly after the court proceeding and within ten minutes had agreed to abide by the proposition made by the company. The three cent hours are 5:30 to 7:30 in the morning and 4:30 to 6:30 in the evening. Radical mayors are not exactly popular in certain circles decidedly taken up with the "throw money at the birds" habit, but they do accomplish something for the small man once in a while. Whitlock, if he lived in Chicago, would probably be ruled off the Lake Shore Drive for life, which might not worry him a bit.

Godliness and Gain

Dr. G. Campbell Morgan's Sermon

"Supposing that godliness is a way to gain. But godliness with contentment is great gain." I Timothy vi. 5-6.

The arresting word of the text is "godliness," for it is twice repeated. The word becomes more arresting when this letter is read through in close relation and connection, and it is discovered that it occurs therein no less than ten times.

What is godliness? is a question preliminary to our meditation. The godly man is the reverent man, the revering man, the worshiping man. Godliness is that poise of the spirit, that attitude of the soul which is the true outcome of a perpetual recognition of God, and realization of his presence.

There are those, who suppose that the attitude of reverence towards God is a way of gain. That is not so, it is a heresy, it is a false conception. Nevertheless, reverence toward God in the true, deep sense of the word, is in itself a gain that makes man independent of all other gain or loss.

The letter to Timothy was written to him during the period in which, in obedience to apostolic instruction, he was exercising the oversight of the church in Ephesus. We have to remember the condition of Ephesus at this time; it was the center of abounding commerce; its citizens were mastered by a passion for wealth. The supreme ambition in the activities of the city was that of getting gain. There was, moreover, a strange religious aspect of all this, using the word religious in its lowest sense, speaking not of the Christian fact within the city, but of the pagan fact. It was the place where the temple of Diana stood, and that temple had become to the merchantmen of the city both sanctuary and bank; it was the place of their worship, and it was the place where they deposited their gains. Thus, the worship of Diana not merely permitted, but had become in itself the very essence of devotion to the getting of gain. Ephesus was in the grip of what today we should describe as the lust for gold. In that city of Ephesus there was a church of Christ. You will remember how in Paul's letter to the Ephesians, he charged the Christian people in Ephesus that they should buy up the opportunities, seeing that the days were evil; and in that description of the days he revealed the fact that the spirit of Ephesus was a peril to the church of God in the city.

Spirit of the Age.

We find constantly in these apostolic writings, that Christian men and women in the Greek cities were affected by the spirit of the age, and were therefore in peril. The church of God is always in peril when it allows itself to be affected by the spirit of the age. There is no heresy more subtle and dangerous than the somewhat widespread one which charges us that the church of God should catch the spirit of the age. The business of the church is not to catch the spirit of the age; but to correct the spirit of the age, and bring the spirit of the age into harmony with the mind and will of God. I have referred to Ephesus, and by so doing I believe have brought this congregation face to face with the fact that the conditions in the midst of which we live are very similar to those that obtained at Ephesus. While there is a very remarkable contrast between all that was merely local and incidental in Ephesus and in our own cities and our own age, the essential matters, the attitudes in mind, and the master inspirations of human life are identical.

Passion for Possession.

I think that man must be wilfully and blindly optimistic who will deny that the master passion of our own age, in this our own land, is a passion for possession. I am prepared to admit every exception that may suggest itself to your minds at the moment; and yet admitting all the exceptions, I affirm that the great inspiration of activity in our age is not that of conquest, is not that of discovery, is not that of learning but that of gain. We can look back in the history of our own land, to hours in which the master passion of the people was conquest. I am not discussing the worthiness or unworthiness. But that is not so today. There was a time when the spirit of the age, expressing itself, not in the voice of the multitude, but in the sympathy of the multitude with certain outstanding men, was a passion for discovery. There was a wonderful period, short though perhaps it was, in the history of our own people in the last century, when a consuming passion for learning took possession of the nation. But I very much fear that in the day in which we live, these things only master men, and they may contribute to that more subtle passion for gain. I find that policies and governments are inspired by markets. I discover that even until this hour we are still as a natoin in the presence of great national and international complications because of revenue.

An Old Illustration.

You hardly need that I illustrate. If I do, I shall give you the old illustration which has passed my lips so often in this place; we are still dallying with opium because of revenue. If I read that there is some kind of threatened international crisis which I do not profess to understand, and the interpretation of which I decline to take from yellow journalism, I nevertheless find, whatever paper I read, that the main thing involved is the protection of interests, and when I analyse the revealing words I find that the interests are those of markets, methods of getting gain. We are appallingly mastered today by the passion for gain. I should not mention these things if I had not higher business on hand, that of reminding you that subtly, yet surely, this master passion has commandeered religion, and that today there are many people—I will not say teachers, I am not dealing with teachers, I am making the broader application—living and acting under the impulse suggested by these apostolic words, "supposing that godliness is a way of gain."

A Way to Gain.

I pass from that attempt to speak of the atmosphere which makes the warning necessary, to the warning itself. What is this mental attitude which the apostle describes in the words, "Supposing that godliness is a way of gain"? No man ever imagined that gain is godliness; that is not the trouble, the peril, the heresy; but something far subtler. "Sppposing that godliness is a way of gain." I sometimes think an idea like this is best illustrated by a concrete case. You will at this point understand my reason for taking you back to Genesis, and reading that very brief paragraph in the history of the dealing of Laban with Jacob, in which, in passionate protest, Jacob referred to the methods of Laban for twenty years. Laban was perfectly wiling to use Jacob because of Jacob's godliness, to make use of him because of his belief in the God of Abraham and of Isaac, to squeeze out of him everything to his own advantage and then fling him away. That is the supreme concrete illustration I find in the Old Testament. I am not going to deal with Laban, but I ask you to consider this type of character as it exists in our midst today. This is not the man who despises religion and sets himself in opposition to religion. This man will never try to undermine the faith of another man. This is the man wno appreciates to the full the social values of Christianity, who is perfectly well aware that the Christian, the truly godly man, is a true man, a temperate man, faithful in all his duties and in the fulfilment of his obligations. The man to whom I am referring is the man who will carefully select those with whom transactions are to be had upon the basis of their religion. He will be very eager to know that the man he appoints to a place of trust in his office is a godly man.

Knows Its Commercial Value.

He is not himself a godly man, in any sense of the word, sees no good in prayer, worships never, in his inner soul he may even scoff at the thought of godliness, but he knows the moral, social, commercial value of godliness, and he will be very careful, so far as possible, to realize on the godliness of others. Let me be concrete; he will let his house to godly people rather than ungodly people. Why? Because he knows they are far more likely to care for his property than ungodly people. A man who looks upon godliness as a way of gain is, in municipal and parliamentary matters, Christian in sentiment; he will take his stand on the side of everything that is in the nature of truth and righteousness; but when you touch the personal note, when you come to deal with the man himself, when you come to see the man under the awful searchlight of the divine thought of him, or see him weighed in the infinitely just balances of the sanctuary, you will find that his godliness is nothing more than something which he practices in the hope of gain. This apostolic description is the most searching and the most appaling to be found in the whole revelation of the New Testament. The peril described is at once the most subtle and the most blighting and blasting of any. That man is almost beyond hope who will maintain external rites, and traffic with the principles and practices of godliness, while the motive is gain. That is the heresy of all heresies, the most terrible. A man who will employ the language of the sanctuary, wear the livery of the temple, pronounce the creeds of the church, to maintain a position in society and commercial life that will enable him to satisfy his lust for gain is of all men most hopeless.

Profitable in All Things.

I find in this same letter another statement; "Godliness is profitable for all things, having promise of the life which now is, and of that which is to come." I pray you do not minimize that, do not attempt to qualify it. Let it sing its own song in your heart, "Godliness is profitable for all things." Godliness is profitable for physical life. It is enough to say that, I need not argue it. Godliness is profitable for mental life; true godliness never blunts the intellect or stifles the voice of reason; it creates the atmosphere in which it is possible for a man to prosecute investigation; it gives him the right to ask questions, says to him in infinite wisdom, secret things belong unto God, but revealed things are for you and your children; admits the right of inquiry, quickens the intellect, makes keen, alert, alive the mental powers. When I pass beyond the physical and do not argue, to the spiritual gain, again, argument is unnecessary.

Godliness is profitable in every human obligation; in social life, in political life, in all human inter-relationships. Let two godly men deal with each other in business, it is a profitable transaction. Let a godly man stand by his godliness six days a week in the market place, it is a profitable thing. I am not so sure, you say! I have a business man listening to me who says I am not so sure! I have attempted during the past week to live the life of godliness, and if I could have sacrificed it I would have been a wealthier man tonight! Would you? Would you change the wealth of a clear conscience for the gain of gold? You know you would not. Godliness is profitable for all commercial transactions.

Gain in Wealth and Poverty.

Godliness is gain in wealth; for the man whose wealth has been gained in a godly fashion, and who is living a godly life, will always understand that he is but a steward of the God who has prospered him.

Godliness is gain in poverty. I am not defending poverty. It is a very long time since I have been guilty of declaring that poverty is a blessing. God over-rules it, and makes it a blessing; but poverty is outside the economy of God. It is not his will that a man or woman should feel in the rush of human life the grind of poverty. Let us understand that God in his provision for humanity, has provided for humanity; if man has lost the key to the situation, and does not know how to manage the gifts of God, the blame is on man. While that is so, and while the conditions in which men live today are conditions which bring poverty to some, I still bring you to the poor man or woman in this city, fine in character, godly in poise of spirit, who is struggling for bread; and I will let you talk to that man or woman, and you will find that he or she knows the gain of godliness; all the sackcloth is transfigured, and loneliness is cancelled, and the bare and frugal meal becomes a sacrament of heaven when the soul is truly godly.

The Heart of It.

Let us try to feel our way into the heart of this subject. What is the supreme heresy in the first case? That this man puts gain first. What is the essential truth in the second case? That this other man puts godliness first. The master passion in the one case is gain, and godliness is looked upon as a means of an end. That is heresy. The master passion in the other case is godliness at all costs, and that godliness is gain in itself. That is the way of God.

Be right with God, and you will be right with every other personality in the universe, right with every other relationship of human life. Be right with God, and you will be right with the devil, you will master him, and be safe in the hour of temptation! Be right with God, and you will be right with your fellow man, loving him, and expressing your love in integrity, justice, honesty, mercy, benevolence. Be right with God, and you will be right with your possessions, you will not say that anything you have is your own, but that it is his, and you are his steward. Be right with God, and you will be right with the powers of your being; be they what they may, they will be realized, fulfilled. Be right with God, and you will be right with death, enabled to face the hour of dissolution with a song and a shout of triumph, "O death, where is thy victory? O death, where is thy sting? The sting of death is sin; and the power of sin is the law: but thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory."

Godliness is indeed great gain.

THE MAGNANIMITY OF THE TALL MAN

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON

We sat confronting each other in the early stages of disrobing. He had lower seven and I had lower eight. We had removed our coats in the open and unlaced our shoes and removed vests, ties and cuffs and collars in the semi-seclusion of the as yet unbuttoned curtains. Then we rose, simultaneously as it happened, to button our curtains, behind which we were to continue our preparation for the night. One learns in the course of years of travel, just how much of one's toilet may properly be made in the publicity of the car aisle, before the unhappy moment when he must experiment with Mr. Dooley, over the difficulty of removing his clothes while sitting on them, and the subsequent contortions with pajamas in the dark.

Six Feet One.

We chanced to rise together, and stood for a moment in our shirt sleeves and stocking feet. I could not help noticing what a splendidly built man he was. He weighed two hundred and carried his weight lightly. I lack a full inch of being six feet; he rose two full inches above me.

We had exchanged no words previously for we were strangers, but we found ourselves thus suddenly face to face, and I spoke, saying:

"A man of your height needs a longer berth."

He answered good-naturedly, "They don't make them quite long enough for us, do they?"

It was only a passing word but it was a gracious one. He classed me with himself. If I were an inch under six feet instead of over, his courtesy obliviated the difference. He did it without any condescension or apparent effort. He simply said "us."

He could afford to. He was so tall he did not need to proclaim his height nor stand on tip-toe to look over other men's heads. He could afford to forget that he was taller than the other men, because they could not fail to notice it.

Self-satisfaction.

I went to bed with just a little feeling of satisfaction in that tall man's recognition of my height. No, they do not make the berths long enough for us, nor wide enough nor high enough. I had the rather comfortable sensation of feeling cramped in the berth. We tall men must expect these little inconveniences. So I went to sleep in a spirit of benevolent appreciation of the difficulty which the Pullman Benevolent Society must encounter in making berths for us tall people. They don't make them long enough for us.

If I had been much taller I should not have cared for the implied compliment. If I had been much shorter I should have known he was consciously patronizing me. The fact that made the satisfaction possible lay in this, that six feet one and five feet eleven are not separated by an incomparable space.

Giants Good Natured.

Giants are almost universally good natured. Dwarfs are notoriously waspish and belligerent and vindictive. That is their way of getting even with nature for making them small. Tall men can afford to be magnanimous.

I have been thinking of my brethren in the ministry. They are not all of the same mental or spiritual stature and as a general thing tall men are very considerate of the very short men.

Painful Isolation.

But sometimes the near-tall men suffer a painful isolation. Pastors of large churches seldom exchange pulpits with them. Makers of programs, seeking more for names that will draw than for free discussion overload the programs with names of men already surfeited with recognition of this sort. Often it seems to the minister whose ability falls just under six feet that between him and large success a great gulf is fixed. The impression has gone out that they have gotten their growth. Committees in quest of pastors for large churches look straight over their heads and call some one from afar whom they assume to be tall because of the noise he makes. And often the near-tall man grows discouraged. He comes to think that his only hope is to make so big a noise that some distant church will believe him tall and give him a fair chance to grow another inch or two.

Please Say "Us."

Now you brethren who are tall can afford to be magnanimous. Every one knows your stature. Please say "us." It will not shorten you, and it will help some men not quite as tall to do what no taking thought on their part can do.

After all, this matter of comparative height is a matter of inches, not of feet.

"How big was Alexander, pa,
That people called him great?
Was he like old Goliath tall.
His spear a hundred weight?
Was he so large that he could stand
Like some tall steeple high,
And while his feet were on the ground
His hands could touch the sky?"

No; he wasn't.

When I was in the theological seminary, Prof. Currier was telling us to hear great preachers and learn from them. There was a man in our class who had done some preaching, and one day Prof. Currier asked him:

"Mr. Smith, since you have been in Oberlin you have heard some really great men. When you hear Dr. Brand, or Dr. Hutchins or Dr. Tenney, or some of the great preachers who visit us here, what do you think of your own sermons."

I think the question was intended to teach the young man humility, and far be it from me to say he did not need it; but this was his answer:

"When I hear a really great man preach, I say to myself, 'I will match my best sermon against his poorest.'"

I am not prepared to say that this was a wholly unwise reply. I have heard great men preach very poor sermons; and I have heard great sermons from men of no great reputation.

Brethren of church committees, do not overlook the moderately tall ministers near you. Some of them will grow if you give them opportunity. And you tall brethren, say "us."

That Dinner With Roosevelt

Booker T. Washington Tells a Story About It.

"My surprise can be imagined," says Booker T. Washington, "when two or three days after my dinner with President Roosevelt, at the White House, the whole press, North and South, was filled with despatches and editorials relating to it. For days and weeks I was pursued by reporters in quest of interviews. I was deluged with telegrams and letters asking for some expression of opinion or an explanation, but during the whole of this period of agitation and excitement I did not give out a single interview and did not discuss the matter in any way.

"Some weeks after the incident I was making a trip through Florida. At a little station near Gainesville, Fla., a white man got aboard the train whose dress and manner indicated that he was from the class of small farmers in that part of the country. He shook hands with me very cordially and said, 'Say, you are a great man. You are the greatest man in this country.'

"I protested mildly, but he insisted, shaking his head and repeating, 'Yes, sir, the greatest man in this country.' Finally I asked him what he had against President Roosevelt, telling him at the same time that in my opinion the president of the United States was the greatest man in the country.

"'Huh! Roosevelt!' he replied with considerable emphasis in his voice. 'I used to think Roosevelt was a great man until he ate dinner with you. That settled him for me.'"

Missionaries Help Save Nanking

How Dr. Macklin and Other Christian Workers Shared in the City's Siege

BY W. REMFRY HUNT

Now that the clouds of war are momentarily cleared and there is a breathing space, I am sending you a detailed account of the siege of Nanking and the marvelous way in which our own missionaries, particularly Dr. W. E. Macklin and Frank Garrett, have been used of God in this history-making epoch. God has been in all the crisis and the issues are tremendous.

When a number of the large and important cities had surrendered to the Revolutionists in the Yangtse Valley, there arose a crisis in Nanking. The city is the southern capital. It is of immense political significance. Its viceroyalty embraces the richest and most populous section of the whole of Central China.

Nanking had a good army mostly composed of the new foreign drilled troops under General Hsii. These men represented the brainiest men of the army, with modern ideas and not a little interest in the new China; many of them being openly identified with the Revolutionists. Of course the viceroy and the Tartar general had to stand with the Manchu throne. It was perilous for each of them.

A Master Stroke.

With a master stroke and at a given signal, the Viceroy Chang Ren Djuin, had the whole of the new army disarmed and sent to camps outside the city. This set the pace and the ball began to roll and the game began to be interesting. Outside the city the new troops procured arms and ammunition and threatened the city. It was a set battle with the forces pitted against each other. Brain versus brawn, was the terse, trite case in a nutshell. Then came an edict from the throne ordering the viceroy to surrender the famous city and avoid bloodshed and anarchy.

At this juncture there arose a daring and adventurous soldier named Chang Hsun. He was a Chinese linked up to the throne by ties from the harems and appointments direct from the Dowager Empress. Chang assumed control and had the viceroy and the Tartar general completely his prisoners. He commenced a murderous campaign against queueless students and enlisted in his army a murderous gang of lookers and schemers for power. Nanking was forced to fight and Chang Hsun was to go down in history as a great general.

The City an Inferno.

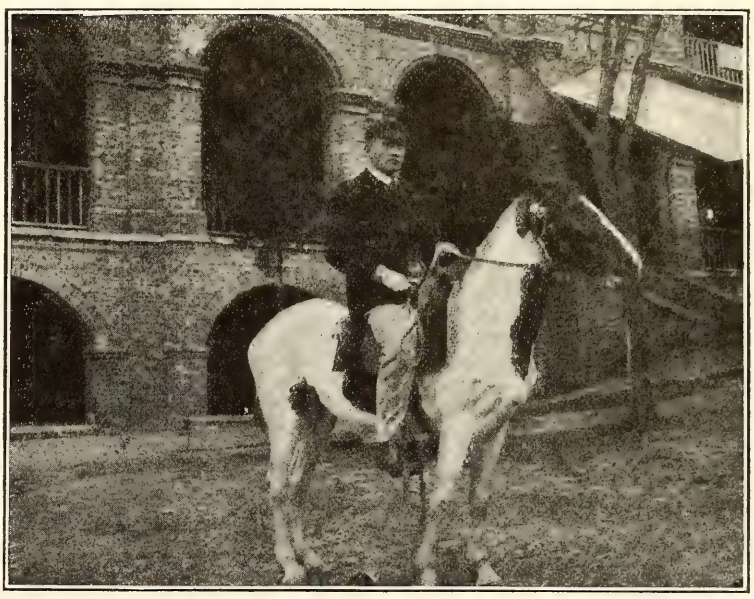
With Nanking under siege, the city became a sort of inferno and fires and murder and looting became rampant. A premature uprising of the Revolutionists at Nanking was annihilated and Chang Hsun was the master of the day. He promised protection to the foreigners and said he would recognize the Red Cross work, which he did as well as it was possible under the disturbed conditions in a great city.

In the first engagement out at En Hwa Tai, the daring soldier Chang, defeated the Revolutionists and some twenty soldiers who were brought into the missionary hospital. All did well. This gave confidence to the soldiers and prestige to the hospital. Two of the wounded officers who were attended to, promised that every care would be afforded the foreigners in the city and that due recognition should be given to the Red Cross work in the besieged city.

While the eyes of the world were fastened upon the fate of Nanking, the Revolutionists had sent up a large and well equipped army to the capture of the city. From Chinkiang onwards to the city the ground had to be fought for, and sanguinary battles took place between the Revolutionists and the Imperial forces outside the city environs who were desperately opposing the Revolutionists.

Red Cross Work.

The Red Cross work did exploits. Camps and Red Cross hospitals were established enroute and Red Cross workers followed the attacking army. Nearly all the Red Cross work done for the Imperialists was done by Dr. Macklin and Mr. Garrett in the mission hospitals. W. Remfry Hunt was with the attacking army on Nanking as Red Cross worker, and their wounded were transferred to Red Cross cars and trollied down the line to the Chinkiang hospitals.



Dr. W. E. Macklin in Front of Hospital, Ready for Evangelistic Trip.

During the siege in Nanking came prominent men from Shanghai to offer their friendly offices as mediators and advise Chang Hsun to surrender. Chang was indignant and stubborn. At Dr. Macklin's introduction, Dr. Gilbert Reid, American vice consul, had audience with General Chang Hsun, but to no purpose.

The former Chinese Minister to Japan, Mr. Teso, and who was also an old schoolfellow of Chang Hsun's, came to confer with this brave and daring defender of Nanking and pleaded with him to avoid carnage and disaster and surrender the city, but he failed.

Terms of Capitulation.

On the night before the surrender of the city, the United States vice-consul, Mr. Gilbert, accompanied, by President A. J. Bowen, of the Nanking University, and also Mr. Tseo, were out of the city under the protection of the American flag, to discuss the terms of the capitulation of the city, with powers from Chang Hsun, but when it was learned that one of the terms was to the effect that Chang Hsun be permitted to march out of the city with his men and arms to Peking, it was immediately refused. The besieging Revolutionary army then were ready for the worst features of war, and an ultimatum was sent in by the peace commissioners that unless the city surrendered by eight o'clock the following morning, the real and terrific bombardment of Nanking was to be commenced which would ruin the city, devastate its homes, and mean the slaughter of its population. God was in the crisis. In the meantime, General Chang had fled from the city northward, crossing the river under cover of night with about 2,000 of his army and carrying with him about $100,000.00. There was heavy fighting at Pukow, and on toward Chu Chow sped the retreating army, requisitioning the railroad and commanding provisions wherever they could. Houses were burned and people slain in the fiery path of this feared marauder. Dr. Osgood, who was doing Red Cross work in Chu Chow, saw Chang Hsun and he passed Chu Chow without incident.

At Mercy of Revolutionists.

Nanking was now at the mercy of the Revolutionists. The city was panic-stricken and desolate. God was with our brethren and the other foreigners who were in the city. The prayers of hundreds of thousands were rising for Nanking. General Chao, whose finger had been shot off and who was an attache of Chung Hsun, came to see Dr. Macklin for protection and advice. He said, Now we have protected you and the Red Cross, and now when the Revolutionists enter the city, you must do all in your power for me, to save my life. Love and peace were flapping their white wings around but there was no time to lose and the fate of the city was hanging on the moment. Dr. Macklin told General Chao to get busy and inform the leaders in the Imperialist army they must surrender and the best would be done to spare their lives. Dr. Macklin told General Chao to prepare and erect white flags. The Revolutionary army had assaulted Golden Purple Mountain, Lion Hill Forts, the Tiger Hill and others, and they were still opposing vigorously. Dr. Macklin told Chao that he must get a few hours' sleep and he set General Chao to work out the details before the masterful stroke should be made at daylight over the great walls of the city.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

The Woman's Club Movement

We have already noted the impulse to organization among women in the years immediately following our Civil War. The Women's Missionary Societies began this period of expansion with the organization of the great denominational boards in the years from 1868 to 1874. The Woman's Rights Movement, which had sought for social, industrial and educational privileges for women in the years preceding the war, now crystalized into the American Women's Suffrage Association, with the one aim of securing equal political rights for women and men.

The entrance of women into the industrial world was now assured, and the long struggle for full educational rights was at last in sight of its goal. In 1865, Vassar College, the first fully endowed and equipped institution of learning for women, opened its doors, and others were soon to follow. These new ideals of culture were probably the primary reasons for the organization of women's clubs. The heralds of the movement were the New England's Women's Club in Boston, and Sorosis in New York City, both born in 1868. It was a small beginning, but one with prophetic vision could have said of it what the Hebrew mother said of her new born babe, "A troop cometh." The law of suggestion from the older organizations doubtless played its part in the new movement, but the dominant motive was cultural. Women were dazed with the world of learning opening before them, but for most of them it came too late; the higher education was the heritage of their daughters—their only hope of keeping step with them was in home study.

The Woman's Club idea spread by a kind of spontaneous generation; there was no formal effort to organize clubs, but they sprang up in cities and towns all over the land. Practically all of them were study clubs, and the ambitious lines of work that many of them attempted laid them open to much pungent ridicule. I belonged to a club in Lexington, Kentucky, organized in 1879, and it fills me with awe to think of the intrepid way in which we attacked abstruse subjects. One year, we studied German literature, and paid our respects to the German philosophers; a daily paper got hold of our program, and poked much quiet fun at our lofty aspirations; but though none of us ever quite grasped what was the distinctive teaching of Kant, or Hegel, or Fichte yet somehow we felt, 'twas better to have tried and failed, than never to have tried at all.

There was generally a social feature connected with the club meeting, and this also came in for its share of criticism. The simple refreshments served at the close of the program were magnified into a banquet; some seemed to think they were the same as men's clubs, others confused them with progressive euchre, or bridge whist clubs. I have heard women exhorted to give up women's clubs, as one would be exhorted to give up drinking, or any worldly sin.

As long as the clubs remained separate units, there was very little departure from the purely cultural idea. But in 1890, the General Federation of Woman's Clubs was organized, and a little later the great state federations came into existence. At the biennial meetings of the general federations, and the annual meetings of the state federations, the women became conscious of their power, and began to hear the call for help from the great and needy world around them. The culture idea still obtained, for thoughtful women felt then as they feel today, that it is a duty to make the best of themselves, intellectually, morally, spiritually—but culture must be a means, not an end—not merely for pride or pleasure but mainly "that we may be thoroughly furnished into good works."

In a way, women's clubs are exceptionally fitted for a phase of practical reform work. The wonderful growth of the work makes them influential—there are in the neighborhood of a million members of the general federation, and these come nearer to representing the whole of public opinion than any other organization of women; they have no test of membership but character; they are entirely democratic, non-partisan, non-sectarian, with no special propaganda to disseminate—they are therefore eminently fitted to reach all sorts and conditions of men. Their lack of ample income, however, will prevent their undertaking the support of definite enterprises. None of their officers receives any salary, and the dues of the clubs to the General Federation are so small, that they are not sufficient to meet the traveling expenses of the general officers, and the literature that they issue.

The great power this movement wields is that of organized influence. What you think, what I think, is of small importance; but when my thought is linked with that of hundreds of women in my town, when my club's thought is shared by thousands of clubs all over the land—then our thought becomes organized influence, and is a tremendous factor in shaping that subtle thing we call public opinion. The General and State Federations are exercising this power along all the main lines of altruistic effort today; they have departments of education, civics, industrial and child labor, social hygiene, pure food, household economics, libraries, forestry, good roads, civil service reform, art—and nearly all clubs still have their department of literature.

But while they cannot undertake the support of definite enterprises through this meager income, yet sometimes they carry meritorious undertakings for a while, by means of special gifts. The Kentucky Federation suppported in this way for fifteen years a Traveling Library in the mountains of Eastern Kentucky, for three years they cared for a Summer Settlement in the same needy region, and it is now keeping a woman in the field, who devotes her time to organizing school improvement leagues for the betterment of the rural schools in the state.

But their usual work is promoting and launching worthy movements, which often pass into the hands of others; for instance, the traveling libraries in Eastern Kentucky were turned over to the state last year, and are now owned and controlled by the library commission, and the summer settlement work materialized into a noble school in the Kentucky mountains; which is the property of an organization with ampler and more regular sources of income.

A large part of the work of women's clubs has come to be the securing of needed legislation. The Kentucky Federation is attempting this winter to secure the passage of bills on School Suffrage for Women, on Forestry, on Good Roads, and on a number of other important lines of work. The Woman's Club movement still has culture for one of its definite aims, but it is culture for service, not culture for self.

The eyes of all the woman's clubs in the land will soon be turned toward the biennial meeting of the General Federation in San Francisco next June, and they are expecting a royal welcome from the 415 clubs and the 30,000 women in the California Federation of Woman's Clubs. I. W. H.

The Aristocracy of Brains

FRANCES KINGDON.

It was at a large reception given in the beautiful home of a famous millionaire, and two women friends had detached themselves from the various little groups scattered through the drawing room and retired to a remote couch where they could make confidential observations to each other and enjoy the entire affair at their leisure.

"Oh, do tell me," exclaimed one of them, suddenly leaning forward, "who that shabby-looking, little woman is over there in that group of stunningly gowned women by the fire-place. How pathetic her poor, little hat and gloves are, and doesn't her dress remind you of a rag bag? She must have sublime courage to come here in that costume, and yet I remember now that I have seen her at all the most elegant functions I have been to this winter, and she seems popular, too. How do you suppose she manages it?" The other woman smiled patiently, as she answered, "Why, that is obvious, with her brains, of course. She hasn't any money so she can't win attention with her clothes or entertaining, and, as her people all died before she came here, a perfect stranger to live, she has not had any family to back her and what little beauty she ever possessed faded long ago, but she has made herself a personality by using her brains and will power. She has been clever enough to always surround herself with clever people, to be on the intellectual, progressive and uplifting side of every important movement in this city. She is president of one of our most charming woman's clubs and is virtually at the head of another prominent organization. She is sought after as a patroness, a director or board member constantly, and whenever she has been ill, her home has been a bower of flowers, the telephone is always ringing and the postman brings dozens of anxious inquiries. She has great executive ability, is clear sighted enough to see the result of anything before it is started, has the wisdom to let go as well as take hold of the handles in Life's wheel-barrow, and wonderful to say, has never made any woman afraid of her. No two of her friends love her for the same reason, and what greater proof of a woman's power have you than just that? She doesn't use her brains in a cold, calculating, selfish way, either, but for the attainment of rare culture, love of humanity and fidelity to ideals."

Later in the season three friends were motoring home together from a beautiful party, when the conversation, becoming intimate, turned toward their hostess. "She doesn't look a day over thirty-five," began one of the women, "and I know she is twenty years older than that. Really I never have seen her when she looked her age by a dozen years. Of course, she has some grey hairs and one or two character lines, but she always expresses eternal youth to me. What can be her secret?"

"Oh, that is easy," answered another woman, "she hasn't any worries, with a comfortable income, an adoring, congenial husband, no children, what cares or responsibilities has she to age her?"

"Well, I don't know," said the first speaker, "everything after all, is pretty evenly divided in this world, and you can't tell me that a woman can reach fifty years without some sorrows and disappointments."

"You are right," interrupted the third woman, who loved the one they were discussing, "she has had them too; known what it was to lie awake long, anxious hours in the night, learned to laugh and talk while a grim specter mocked close behind her, and her heart has paid grief and sorrow their usual toll. But she has kept young through it all by living a life of intense mental activity. Because she is a student, she studied her Shakespeare and other great poets so that she could apply their wondrously kind philosophy to her daily living; because she is a lover of beauty she has studied art in all its various forms and learned what the world's famous artists have done for us; because she has had the means to travel she has learned the language, customs and history of other lands, and because she is a good citizen, she has learned the laws and government of her own country and its present political situation. Her intellectual pleasures and mental activity have given her continued joy, have made her forget the cares that could have pressed heavily and the grief that might have corroded, and have left her spirit young, her eyes bright, her entire being responsive, alive, sympathetic and interesting. Think how many friends she has, just because she is always interesting. Have you ever stopped to notice how hard it is to love a dull narrow-minded woman? We may admire her beauty and appreciate her virtues, but our affection thrives better at long distance. It is so easy to be fond of an interesting person, who reads and thinks, who observes and reflects, who studies and assimilates, and who gives a rich store all her own."

It was not long ago, on the elevated road, that two women friends got into an argument about another friend, a young married woman they had just been visiting. "How she has deteriorated," began the first speaker, adjusting her eye glasses more carefully, "positively run to seed, and just because she wants to be merely a domestic woman. She used to play the piano so beautifully, could sing most of the best operas, and was an authority on the drama too, kept up on all the new plays and was a discriminating critic. Her papers for the Woman's Club were a perfect joy because she was so keen, logical and brilliant. Now, oh dear, her mind is getting rusty and I missed those old, keen flashes of intellect. She has just fallen back into elemental, primitive womanhood and the waste of it all saddens me."

"Nonsense," exclaimed the second speaker, "how can you say her mind is rusty, when without a maid she can keep such a spotlessly, clean house. What if you did miss her former repartee and epigrams, you thoroughly enjoyed that delicious lunch she cooked for us, didn't you, and you were honest in your admiration of that trim, little shirt waist suit she confessed to having made herself. Don't believe, either that she has dropped her music entirely, for two babies demand sweet lullabies, even if they don't care for arias from grand operas and as for the drama, perhaps she was tired of being in the audience and wanted to play a star's part on the stage of life. Every day of her life she is now using her mind as she never used to. Don't you think it takes brains to keep house well, to cook a good meal, make a neat dress and raise two healthy children? How snobbish we are when we deplore the labor of the hands, when we belittle the work that is done for the happiness and success of the home. Brains are needed in every environment or sphere of life and the artist should be recognized in the kitchen as well as the drawing room. Intellectual achievement nowadays is receiving the recognition it always has deserved, for just notice the democratic zeal with which the wealthiest women of Chicago are now identifying themselves with those whose only social asset is their brains. We are, however, very narrow-minded if we can not appreciate the genius for home building which some rare women possess and are using every day to fine and beautiful purposes."

Offending in Trifles

The great apostle reminds us that "in many things we offend all." It seems worth while therefore not to offend anybody without grave cause. There are principles for which we must stand. What is the use then, seeing we will have contests which can not be avoided, of starting those which spring out of trifles? And yet we have a certain class of ministers and church leaders, who are never at ease unless "making things hum." They, if ministers, announce their advent by turning things up-side-down. They change the hour of service, re-arrange the order of worship, have a different way for taking up the collection and introduce novelties even in pronouncing the benediction. In the matter of taste they may be altogether right, but in the management of a church they are wholly wrong. A dear friends of ours some years ago returned for a summer to the home in far-away New England where he and his wife had spent their childhood and youth. They were both sorely tried to see such evidences of neglect in and about the old church. They resolved, the first Sunday evening, to spend their vacation in "making improvements." They not only spent the summer but they spent hundreds of dollars. They repainted the church, repapered it, put a new fence around the property and hung a deep-toned bell in the belfry. And they managed to "rub the wrong way" every deacon, trustee and Sunday School teacher in the membership. It was hardly too much to say that they decorated the church and destroyed it. With the very best of intentions they had the least judgment in the world; and when they returned to their western home, they were embittered and the church divided. All for want of a little tact and the saving virtue of patience. Sometimes it is a grace to let things be as they are.

A Kansas Experiment

A Woman Mayor's Triumph Over an Unwilling Council.

In an unguarded moment, that is, unguarded by the lieutenants of evil, Hunnewell, Kans., elected Mrs. Ella Wilson mayor. In former days Hunnewell was a big shipping point for Southwestern cattle men, and cowboys frequently painted the town red, as well as had a "hot old time." Their presence did not have a tendency to purify the moral atmosphere, and Hunnewell did not smell as sweet as its name. But the settlement of the Cherokee strip took the cowboys away, and the new element wanted a better Hunnewell. To get it they called Mrs. Wilson to office. The honor was unsought and unexpected, and Mrs. W. undertook its duties with great reluctance. But greater still was the reluctance of the city council to recognize her authority. About the first thing Mrs. Wilson heard after she had received congratulations upon her election was that the five councilmen had determined not to discharge their official duties with a woman mayor presiding at the meeting. At the first regular council meeting they refused to answer to roll call and refused to transact the routine business. Mrs. Wilson promptly adjourned the meeting.

Would Not Attend Meetings.

Official notice of the next meeting was posted as required by law, but the councilmen refused to attend. Mrs. Wilson adjourned the meeting and went home. Word was brought to her that the council had met in a secret session in an upstairs bedroom in the hotel. This illegal secret meeting was the cause of most of the trouble, the council contending that the business transacted there was legal and the mayor refusing to recognize the meeting at all.

After the regular meeting in June, at which the councilmen refused to act, Mrs. Wilson informed Gov. Stubbs of their action and the governor turned the matter over to the attorney-general. The attorney-general wrote each of the councilmen a letter telling him to attend the next council meeting or suffer the consequences. This had the effect of forcing the members to attend the meeting, but they strenuously opposed every act of the mayor. They refused to confirm her appointments to fill vacancies in appointive offices.

Brought to Time.

Then Mrs. Wilson got on a train and went to see the governor. She told him of the great need for a city marshal, and that the councilmen had refused to approve her appointment to that office and furthermore had given her to understand that they would not pay for one.

"Go back and appoint your marshal," said Gov. Stubbs, "and I'll see that he gets his pay."

Mrs. Wilson returned to Hunnewell much encouraged. She appointed Mrs. Osborn to the office of city marshal and Mrs. Hilton as city clerk. With these two women at her side, she felt that she was more in command of the situation than at any time before. Mrs. Osborn went to work and before long had brought in most of the offenders.

But the councilmen were none the less vigilant in placing obstacles in the way of the woman mayor until C. W. Trickett arrived upon the scene. Mr. Trickett, known as the "reform attorney of Wyandotte," has a statewide reputation for finding out the violators of the prohibitory law. He went to Mrs. Wilson and with her aid collected evidence against the councilmen.

The result of his investigation was turned over to John S. Dawson, attorney-general. The attorney-general considered the evidence in hand sufficient to base ouster suits upon and filed petitions against the councilmen.

Change Their Minds.

Then the councilmen were seized with a change of convictions. They concluded to be good. For the attorney-general was threatening not only to put them out of office but to make them pay back bills and damages. Now Mrs. Wilson is in full command at Hunnewell. She has closed the pool rooms and the joints, and the bootleggers began to search for towns which do not have woman mayors. Kansas is changing its question to, "What is the matter with a woman mayor?" and back comes the answer, "There is nothing the matter with her."

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

Bennett and Castle are in a revival meeting at Noble, where they are preaching to large congregations.

Sidell Church has welcomed its new pastor, H. H. Williams, who was formerly pastor of McLeansboro church.

H. H. Slick is in a revival meeting at Edgewood, in which the first report showed one addition.

At last report there had been two confessions in the revival meeting at Windsor, conducted by the pastor, E. U. Smith.

The pastor at West Point, A. O. Hargis, has received thirteen persons into the church at regular services in one month of his ministry.

Normal Church, of which H. J. Hostetler is minister, began a revival meeting the middle of January, with S. S. Jones of Third Church, Danville, as leader.

East Side church, Decatur, had ten additions on the first day of invitation in the meeting conducted by Hill and Knowles, assisting the pastor, Fred Galiger.

Carthage church, of which W. W. Denham is pastor, received eighty-nine persons into the church during last year, and all departments of the church are said to be in prosperous condition.

The revival meeting at Allenville, conducted by the pastor, Major Griffith and wife, is arousing considerable interest. Within less than a week there were seven additions, all but one being on profession of faith, and all being men.

J. W. Pearson will become pastor of the church at El Dara. Mr. Pearson has been preaching for the church in Independence while pursuing college work at Canton, Missouri. This is his senior year in the college, and after graduating he will be located permanently in the new pastorate.

The first Sunday in January a new brick structure, erected by Bloomfield Church, was dedicated by Evangelist George L. Snively. The house is said to be both commodious and artistic, and will add greatly to the efficiency of the congregation.

The congregation at Fisher is in a revival meeting with the pastor, J. F. Hollingsworth, assisted by a singer, Mr. Scott, doing the preaching. There are thought to be excellent indications for a meeting of more than ordinary results. At the first service there was one addition.

E. M. Smith of First Church, Decatur, was the speaker at a banquet, prepared for the organization of a brotherhood in the church of Du Quoin. The pastor here is Charles L. Smith, who has been in residence there for only a few months, but whose ministry is already achieving worthy results.

The church edifice at Camp Point is reported to have been destroyed by fire, entailing a loss of eight thousand dollars. It has not been learned whether any insurance will be received for the loss, but unquestionably a movement will be initiated at once to rebuild the structure. The pastor here is H. J. Reynolds.

George W. Schroeder, pastor of Bridgeport Church, spoke to the Odd Fellows' Lodge, which attended the service at his church in a body on a recent Sunday. He spoke on "The Cardinal Truth and Basic Principles of Oddfellowship." By request, on the same evening, the same pastor preached on "Christian Fellowship."

Waverly Church had a net increase of membership last year of twenty-six, and raised almost fifteen hundred dollars for all expenses. Out of a total membership of one hundred thirty-one, one hundred twelve are reported on the subscription list as contributors to the support of the church. The pastor is Guy B. Williamson.

The revival meeting at West Side Church, Springfield, in which Evangelist J. M. Rudy is assisting John R. Golden, has resulted so far in eight additions, four on profession of faith. The congregations, for the second week of the meeting, are greatly improved on account of the milder weather. On Sunday afternoon, at the Y. M. C. A., the evangelist is to speak to the labor unions of the city on "The Signs of the Times."

The congregation at Chicago Heights, where E. D. Salkeld is pastor enjoyed during 1911 the most prosperous year of its history. There were one hundred and twenty-eight additions, making the membership now about two hundred. The Sunday-school had a very large increase in membership, having increased about one hundred per cent. The financial receipts for all purposes were seven thousand two hundred and sixty-three dollars of which more than four thousand dollars was applied on the building fund.

Dr. H. O. Breeden and Mr. and Mrs. G. P. Rockwell are holding a meeting at Champaign. The work began January 7. Five hundred were in the Sunday-school and Dr. Breeden spoke to a crowded house last Sunday morning and evening. The evening congregation overflowed the big auditorium into the balcony and fifteen hundred heard the great sermon on "The Death of Jesus." Eleven men and women responded to the invitation during the day. Among these were three young men, students of the university, and a professor of the law college and his wife. Mr. and Mrs. Rockwell are great factors in the work. The meetings will continue through this month.

Quiet minds cannot be perplexed or frightened, but go on in fortune or misfortune at their own private pace, like a clock during a thunderstorm.—R. L. Stevenson.

Secretary's Letter.

E. U. Smith of Windsor held a meeting recently with home forces with five additions and other good results.

Gilbert Jones and the Lovington church observed the tenth anniversary of their church building with a dinner and roll call service Jan. 12. They are now in a meeting with home forces and the prospects are good.

J. A. Baugh of Elkhart is ready to make a change and invites correspondence with churches needing a minister.

A. J. McClees of Cantrall is available for a pastorate.

Four churches have reported that they have already attained to the Front Rank Standard —Englewood, Eureka, New Bedford and Mattoon. The following report that they are in line and will try to attain all the points: Batavia, Galesburg, Lincoln, Hartsburg, Ashland, Mill Shoals, Paxton, Roseville, Bellflower, Wheeler, Camp Point, Illiopolis, Beardstown, Beecher City, Harvel, Oblong, Arrowsmith, Mt. Pulaski, Sullivan, Niantic, Hudson, Evanston, DeLand, Waverly, Sterling, Pontiac, West Salem, Sidney, Girard. Many of these only lack one or two points, and they are all working to come up to the standard. It will help those who try. Send in your report and be a "tryer."

Very few have offered any criticism on the Front Rank movement, and very many have expressed their hearty approval. Of course it is entirely optional with the churches and preachers whether they line up with the Front Rank idea or not, but it seems to us a good thing—push it along.

The Pekin church was injured by fire recently to the extent of about $500.

A good sensible business man writes us for a preacher and says: "I find the greatest trouble with preachers we have come in contact with, is their dealings in a business way with the public." This shows how very careful preachers should be in their business dealings. It is not so much that they are dishonest as careless about their accounts. And the churches should keep them paid up promptly so they can pay their bills.

O. C. Bolman of Pekin has time for a meeting in March. Write him.

The Arrowsmith church is doing well under the ministry of J. C. Reynolds.

J. T. Moore has been called to remain at Toluca another year and the work is in fine shape.

The annual report of the Waverly church shows the work in fine condition, Guy B. Williamson, pastor.

We still urge the brethren to make an offering for state missions soon as possible. Every congregation should be in line for our own state work. Our district workers must be supported and our mission churches are depending upon us for support. Be loyal to Illinois. Send the offering to our treasurer and get a receipt by next mail.

Herbert Yeuell is in a meeting at the Centennial church, Bloomington, with Milo Atkinson minister, and Byron Conrad, musical director.

Eureka College

Luceba E. Miner, Field Secretary of the Illinois Christian Educational Association, is at work in the Southern part of the state and is doing fine. During the past Eureka College has received many students and much financial help from that part of the state.

The endowment secretary will preach regularly for the next six months, for the churches at Arthur and Loami. In the new campaign recently inaugurated the Sundays will not be of great value for the present. This enables me to do this extra service for two of the substantial village churches of central Illinois. The work is encouraging at both places.

The library of Eureka college has been the recipient, during the past year, of some special gifts, from the wife of the late Professor C. R. Vandervort, of Peoria, and from W. F. Richardson, Kansas City. The library now numbers almost 10,000 volumes and is growing. We really need a new library building. This will be the next thing after the completion of the present campaign. In fact it will be pretty nearly impossible to wait for the present building enterprise to get out of the way before we will have to start the library campaign.

Miss Miner is to spend the first ten days of February in Eureka in a special campaign in the interest of the college work locally. We have a large educational association in Eureka, but expect to materially increase the membership as a result of her work.

Professor R. E. Hieronymus, who was connected with Eureka College as teacher and president for a number of years, was recently elected a member of the board of trustees. Mr. F. B. Venuum, of Champaign, well known in commercial circles in Central Illinois, was also elected to a place on the board. These men were elected to take the places made vacant by the death of Prof. C. R. Vandervort, of Peoria, and Rev. R. F. Thrapp, who recently went from Jacksonville to Los Angeles, Calif.

The teachers in Eureka College were recently recognized in a special way by the trustees by an increase of $100 a year in salary all around.

President C. E. Underwood will be on the ground February 1 and take charge of affairs at Eureka. Mr. Underwood comes to us recommended as a scholar and leader of men. Notice has already appeared in the papers concerning his academic experience and training in college affairs. But in this brief news letter we would like to say that everybody is looking forward with happy anticipation to Mr. Underwood's coming. He recently attended the mid-winter meeting of the trustees of Eureka College and spoke encouragingly of the manner in which the business was transacted and the outlook for the school.

We are able to make a more encouraging report concerning the financial affairs of Eureka College than we had anticipated Every dollar of indebtedness against the college has been paid and we have $170,000 endowment. Fifteen thousand dollars of this is in estates now in process of settlement and about $7,000 is in endowment that the college cannot realize upon for a short time. But the entire amount is bona fide.

The new campaign for the raising of $150,000 for Eureka College was formally launched January 1. It is too early to make any sort of estimate as to the outcome of this campaign. But at present it looks hopeful. Quite a number have promised to help, but are not ready now. We are able to report, however, $2,225 since the first of the year. H. H. PETERS.

Evanston Disciple women co-laborated with their Congregationalist neighbors in preparing and rendering a program for a union missionary meeting held recently.

A circular setting forth the claims and prospects of the Russian mission being conducted by Basil S. Keusseff is being circulated broadcast among Chicago Disciples. Secretary Jordan is the author.

C. G. Kindred of Englewood church underwent an operation recently which incapacitated him for his pulpit duties. He is recovering nicely and it is hoped will be in decidedly better health than for some time past. The Englewood congregation met for prayer at the hour when the surgeons were holding consultation on their pastor's case.

What promises to be the biggest Lincoln celebration in the year 1912, will be held Monday night, February 12, by Chicago's Christian Young People. Plans have been completed for a mass meeting to be held in the New First Congregational Church, Ashland and Washington Boulevards, under the auspices of the Baptist Young Peoples' Union, the Chicago Christian Endeavor Union and the Epworth League of Chicago. Overflow meetings have been provided for. Approximately 500 churches in Chicago and vicinity wil send delegations numbering from two to twenty-five or fifty each. Twenty-one nationalities will be reprsented, namely: American, Scotch, Irish, English, Welsh, French Swiss, German, Dutch, Bohemian, Italian, Danish, Swedish, Norwegian, Polish, Russian, Lithuanian, Armenian, Persian, Chinese and Japanese. This heterogeneous group will compose the audience that will sing patriotic songs, quote Lincoln's famous sayings, reverently lift their hearts in prayer as Bishop Samuel Fallows leads, and then listen with keen interest to the address of the evening that will be made by Dean W. T. Sumner, of S. S. Peter's and Paul's Cathedral on "Practical Patriotism." One of the features of this Lincoln celebration will be the music to be rendered by the United vested choirs of the New First Congregational Church, under the direction of Prof. H. Augustine Smith.

Three Thousand Dollars for Chicago Missions.

The city-mission board has been convinced for a long time that Disciples should enter the suburbs more aggressively. They have not acted for lack of funds. This year it is provided by the board that we shall organize a suburban mission, provided the funds are forthcoming. The board is asking the Chicago churches for three thousand dollars as their combined offering for home and city missions. The first half of this must be used for current expenses. If the last half is raised, the board will immediately proceed to open the new mission. An apportionment was made for the churches for their consideration and adoption. It was requested that the church be ready to report on its apportionment at the Quarterly assembly held last Sunday. The following is the provisional list of apportionments:

Letters to the Editors

You are giving us a paper, splendidly gotten up and well edited. And, while I can not agree with all your positions, yet I enjoy the paper and have found it a source of great inspiration to me.

I am enjoying your series on baptism. Nothing equal to it has ever appeared in our literature. I hope you will publish it in a book for general and permanent use.

I am delighted with Dr. Morgan's sermon in this week's Century. "The Coming Glory" has to do with the return of our Lord. It is the greatest doctrine in the Bible. Everything else is secondary by the side of it. I wish our people had that vision. The publication of this one sermon blots out all your heresy on baptism!

Here let me acknowledge my joy in your answer to the thrust of the Evangelist that The Century was sowing seeds of division. I wondered if you were going to let that pass; I wanted to say something back at the time it appeared. Your answer is just the one I conceived for it, but not after the admirable form and spirit of yours.

I appreciate your paper so much in many ways. Keep that progressive poise that will ultimately lead to larger charity in our own ranks. We need to keep up an aggressive spirit unless we become fossilized and lose our mission to this age. With sincerest best wishes for you and your work I am as ever your friend and sympathizer in the heroic position you have taken.

You are doing some capital work in The Century. Its efficacy will appear in coming years. Few, perhaps, can go all the way with you now, and some cannot even understand you. You are not at all speaking the language of our Ashdod. But the language of the real Israel, I think, is on your pages. Like many another prophet you may at times stand up so straight that you lean back somewhat, but no matter, the attitude of the man of the spirit is there, and that is the cardinal thing. All hail, therefore, and a Christmas without a shadow to you, and a New Year with a boom for The Century. Here's my renewal, and a dollar for a new subscription.

It is impossible to write every time you do something extra good in The Century, but I cannot refrain from saying your articles on the larger aspects of baptism, are the finest I ever read on the theme and to my mind the most telling work you have done. I hope you will put them in book form. I doubt if anything better has ever been printed upon that much abused theme.

In your editorial on Baptism in the Century of Nov. 30th, you state very well the probable facts about the formation of the church. Without much doubt you have correctly outlined its real beginnings. That any "blue prints," any plans and specifications were divinely drawn and handed down to the apostles, or their immediate successors, is fiction. The church borrowed its organization, its working machinery, from the world about it. On that subject your chapter of Nov. 30th is one of the best I've seen.

Some of your points I can't get very well. The immersion of a penitent believer, in the name of the Christ, surely is baptism, and would induct him into the visible church, would it not? While only God, and the convert himself, would know if the real spiritual content was in it, whether or no he was really "baptized into Christ."

But I started to write only a line to commend your fine chapter on the "Sociology of Baptism."

In the revival services which James Small is conducting at Capitol Hill Church in Des Moines, the regular services were omitted for one night, and Dr. Shelton, the missionary from Thibet was invited to address the meeting.

The Commission of the Protestant Episcopal Church, which is planning a World Conference on Faith and Order, has appointed four eminent clergymen to visit England and explain the purposes of the conference.

H. E. Van Horn, who is in his seventh year with the church in Des Moines for which he ministers, is very confident that a great meeting will be the result of James Small's labors there. We have noted the meeting elsewhere in this column.

The week of prayer was observed at Madison, Ind., by all the churches acting together. The meeting closed on Sunday night with a sermon by F. P. Smith which was delivered in Trinity M. E. Church. There was great interest throughout and the last service was a fitting climax to the whole.

The new $12,000 church at Bloomfield, Ind., was dedicated on Jan. 7, when the weather was 15 degrees below zero. Geo. L. Snively preached the sermon and raised $5.500, which is considerably more than the indebtedness. The surplus will go for fitting up a reading room and gymnasium in the basement.

Lockhart and Lint are in a meeting at Harris, Ill., with sixty-one additions so far. Owing to a disabled heating plant, the meeting at Angola, Ind., has been postponed, and the evangelists may be secured immediately after this meeting. Those interested should wire them at Harris.

The church at El Paso, where P. J. Rice is pastor, has built a mission church in East El Paso, at least the building is nearly done now. The building is of the mission style of architecture and will ultimately be used for a parsonage. A large lot on the corner is reserved for the church proper.

Dr. Loa E. Scott has been called to deliver a series of addresses to the adult classes of the Euclid Avenue Christian Church, Cleveland, O., on "The Parables and Discourses of Jesus." The Best

The Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 are in The Life of Christ. You want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition has just been issued to meet the great demand. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

for the past three months, and reports a debt of $1,900 cancelled and 75 per cent increase in the Sunday-school.

Wm. J. Minges is in a great meeting at Parsons, Kan., a town of 16,000 people, where the church had prepared for the meeting, by erecting a tabernacle seating 2,200. M. A. Mallory is the pastor, and there are eight members of the evangelist's company. There have been 528 additions so far, of whom Mrs. Minges has secured 132 in three invitations at meetings for girls only.

B. A. Jenkins of Linwood Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, has decided to try a new solution of the prayer-meeting problem. His plan is to have good addresses on live topics by prominent men. Judge E. E. Porterfield was a recent speaker at one of the meeting and his address on juvenile courts attracted much attention at the church and in the daily press.

In the Christian Church at Beatrice, Neb., the different men's brotherhoods of the churches of the city were addressed by Gov. Aldrich on "The Mental Biography of the Nazarene." There was a large attendance of men and the address of the speaker was most enthusiastically received. The speaker prophesied the day when the Christians of the land shall all worship "under one spire."

C. B. Osgood, pastor of the Christian Church at Mankato, Mich., has been made executive secretary of the Federated Churches of Mankato. The churches of the community are uniting for work among the boys, city missions and social service. The office is not a sinecure, but carries a salary for part time, and the scheme implies much work. The Disciples belong in the lead of such work.

The $50,000 church building in Shreveport, La., was dedicated on Jan. 8 by C. R. Scoville, who began a meeting at once. Mr. Jones began at Shreveport several years ago and has been with the work from its inception. He is now one of the leading citizens of the town, a real and universally esteemed factor in the life of the community. The work will have a large growth from now on. Over $21,000 was raised at the dedication of the church.

Peyton Robertson contributes to the Nashville, (Tenn.) Banner an interesting historical sketch of the Vine Street Christian Church of Nashville, where Carey E. Morgan recently began as pastor. The church dates from 1820, when it was organized as a Baptist church. In 1830 the pastor, Phillip Fall induced the church to drop the name "Baptist" and to assume the name "Christian Church," only five members refused to indorse the change. The edifice was burned in 1856 though the present building was not erected till 1888.

At the Freemason Street Church, Norfolk, Va., Sunday, December 31, Joseph Brummell Earnest, Jr., was ordained to the ministry. Prof. W. M. Forrest, Professor of Biblical History and Literature at the University of Virginia, preached the ordination sermon; the charge was delivered by the pastor, C. M. Watson. Mr. Earnest is at present attending the University of Virginia, and preaching for two of our Virginia churches. He is the son of J. B. Earnest one of the elders of the Freemason Street Church and has grown up in that congregation.

The newly organized Central Church, Disciples of Christ, of New York City, held regular services on Sunday, January 21, under the leadership of the acting minister, Dr. J. M. Philputt. The charter membership list will be held open during the balance of January. The first business meeting of the church will be held on Wednesday evening, January 31. Members will be elected to fill office of trustees, elders and deacons. An interesting feature of the work of the new church is the Bible Class for adult Chinese, meeting on Sunday afternoons.

It is interesting that, while in the United States in October 1910, the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church passed on October 19, a resolution suggesting the World Conference on Faith and Order, the National Council of the Congregational Churches of America passed on October 20, a resolution voicing its earnest hope for closer fellowship with the Episcopal Church in Christian work and fellowship and the Convention of the Disciples of Christ appointed, in the same month of October, a Council of Christian Union, the General Synod of the Dioceses of the Church or England in Australia and Tasmania, appointed on October 17, 1910, a committee "to watch for and, if possible, take advantage of any opportunity which may be offered for further conference with other religious bodies with a view to a better understanding of our mutual position and the furtherance of union among Christians."

The Daily Press of Kansas City, Mo., has been printing some interesting "stories" about the work of Frank W. Allen, pastor at Paris, Mo., whose men's organization is called the Greyfriars Club. The organization is clearly directed by a man who knows how to lead and hold men. It is a broad, catholic, charitable, inclusive society, and is a great factor in the life of the town. Within the club are merchants, laborers, lawyers, doctors, saloon keepers, railroad men, and school teachers.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS. THE WINTER OF 1912 SURPASSES ALL REC ORDS

"creed," which declares that the members "try to determine in this brotherhood of imperfect seekers after the perfect, the relation of Jesus the Carpenter to everyday life. We have no creed save to be honest and to be kind; we try never to 'knock' except on the devil in ourselves; we strive to lend a hand to the good in the worst of us and our prayer is that we may be delivered from stupidity, ignorance, selfishness to a sympathetic social vision, an intelligent faith and manly love for folks."

GROUND FOR THANKSGIVING.

We have great reasons for thanksgiving and praise for the way the Lord has blessed the work of our Foreign Society. During all the thirty-six years' history of the work His hand has led and His spirit and grace have strengthened.

The marvelous things accomplished in the regions beyond have thrilled all our hearts. We are a better and larger people as we recount the victories beyond the seas.

All we have accomplished in the regions beyond cannot be tabulated. It can be said, however, that we have done important pioneer work and have come to hold a worthy position in the chief mission fields of the world.

Some of our choicest men and women have gone far hence to the heathen. A number have given their lives and now sleep the sleep of the just in heathen lands. The pride and glory of our brotherhood center in those who remain and carry forward the work.

New Opportunities.

New and exceptional opportunities stand out in bold outline before our churches. Never before has there been such a time to preach the clear simple gospel. The world cries for the bread of life.

Compared with the past, and indeed, with only a decade ago, we live in a new world of opportunities. God has wrought changes of which his church had no expectation. She stands dazed and almost confounded over her own wonderful success. In less than a decade and a half the number of converts on the mission field of the world has been doubled. In less than a quarter of a century the Christian population of the globe has increased more than 104,000,000, or more than the total membership of all Christendom at the close of the fifteenth century. This is marvelous in our eyes.

Rapid Changes.

The whole world moves out into light with a rapidity of which we have never dreamed. There is a new Orient. The whole face of Asia has changed. China is breaking with her dead past and is all astir with new life and fresh hope. Out of her present confusion will come order and strength and finally a great Christian nation. Now the once hermit nations have entered humanity's brotherhood. Korea has been born anew. Japan is a world power. India is emerging from the dream of centuries. Turkey is falling to pieces through her inability to keep step with the world's rapid progress. The dark, dense cloud that has enveloped Africa is being pierced through with shafts of light from every source. The kingdoms of all the world are in the throes of a mighty transformation. The faces of a thousand millions of the earth's inhabitants are turned in gladness to the light that comes down from the cross of Christ, illuminating with its glory the globe, and cheering with its bright rays the most despondent and the most lowly of men.

Blessings Have Returned.

Our brotherhood has been more than repaid for all we have done for foreign missions. This cause has united our people and given them a really worthy task. It has cleared their vision and inspired them to effort. It has renewed their spiritual lives and given them a new world consciousness. It has vitalized them and quickened their zeal in every good cause. Poverty of soul and disintegration of the whole life threatens the churches that stand aloof from this world-embracing task. The spirit of evangelism that has risen in our churches and swept out to the nations of the world has returned freighted with blessings of which we never dreamed. Our evangelistic temper and success are probably without a parallel in the history of American Christianity. The whole life of our people has been sweetened and enlarged by a worthy task in line with God's eternal purpose.

Renewed Campaign.

The time for another March Offering campaign for foreign missions is now upon us. It behooves every loyal disciple to lend a hand. Obligations mountain high press down upon us with ponderous weight. We can, we must, be equal to them.

THE MISSIONARIES HAVE BEEN HELPED IN CHINA.

Knowing that many of you have been remembering us in special prayer during these days of China's revolution, I am writing this to let you know God has not only guarded us from all harm and evil, but has used us in marvelous ways in the preserving of this city and saving the lives of the people here.

When it was certain that soldiers and armies would move through this section of the country, we went openly to the city council and discussed the matter. If our presence here would increase their burden, we would leave. But if, on the other hand we could in any way serve them by remaining, we wished to stay. We had not come to China to save our lives, but to save China. They assured us of all the protection the city could give, but plainly said they did not know what force might be brought against the city from the outside.

Later they asked us to organize a Red Cross Society. The idea seemed to sweep the city and a society of over 200 has been organized. They have furnished all the funds used and done the clerical work.

When Nankin surrendered to the revolutionists, the Imperial leader, Chang Haun, retreated through here with 7,000 troops. The city gates were closed and barricaded. There seemed to be difficulty about the railroad taking Chan's troops away and the city asked us in the name of the Red Cross to go out to Chan's army and see if we could not make arrangements with the railroad for hurrying them past. They let us down over the wall of the city with ropes, as they feared opening the gates. We succeeded beyond expectation in getting his army to go on without any demonstration being made against this city. Twice we entered the ranks of his army and talked and advised with their leaders.

The city was many times panic stricken. We opened the doors of our hospital for any women or children to come in to quiet their fears. We posted a daily bulletin board with authentic news to give the lie to wild rumors which were driving the poor people frantic. Crowds flocked about it and my guest room had constant visitors of the better classes. Money, valuables and even women and children of the richer families were brought to our compounds for safe keeping.

Very grave dissensions arose among rival leaders of the revolutionists in the city. The city council appealed to us to go between the parties and bring peace if possible. A secret organization was robbing and looting even within the city. We helped to expose them and a meeting appointed by all the opposing parties met at the Tisdale Hospital (our Christian hospital) and peace was effected.

Instead of there being danger to us, the whole city has been looking to us for protection and we can scarcely go on the street for the many expressions of gratitude which meet us everywhere.

Chuchow, China. ELLIOTT I. OSGOOD.

Important Call for Ministerial Relief

About the last of November more than six thousand copies of our last annual report were sent to as many of our preachers, practically notifying our ministry as a body of the day for the offering to Ministerial Relief, and giving full information concerning that great proposition made to the brotherhood as an inducement to secure the full support of this work. More than a month has passed since the day set apart to present this interest to the churches and take the offering, and we are coming close on to the time when other interests will claim consideration, and we want to urge the claims due this work at this time.

It was expected that January would be a record breaker in receipts, but the results so far do not indicate that this expectation will be fully realized. We would not expect to interest or encourage any one to do his duty in this or any other matter by making complaint or finding fault, but surely we are all agreed that we have not done our duty in respect to this ministry. But this is the year that we are to bestir ourselves. We are to keep in mind that the proposition referred to is not bound for anything until our receipts total at least $20,000. And this month of January alone ought to bring into the treasury of this board this amount. This would be the easiest thing possible if the preachers would simply bring the matter to the attention of their congregations. And this is not asking too much whatever your burdens may be. It is only urging your attention to a duty sacred in the relationship that is in Christ Jesus, made so by a provision of divine wisdom.

Brethren of our Lord, to whom he has committed leadership in the affairs of the kingdom, on behalf of these old soldier-saints, to maintain the dignity of the Christian ministry, and to preserve the sacred honor of the church, we beg you to give this matter your attention now. You owe it to yourselves and to your people as well as to "the old guard." To support this work, at whatever cost, is the responsibility of the church, and when it can be so easily done at a cost of from $25,000 to $30,000 a year, we discredit ourselves as a religious people, and the plea which we have made for a century past, if we do not provide its full support. We cannot afford a failure where so much is involved. Go to your people with the privilege of this ministry, and then come to the board with their contribution to its support, and let us show ourselves to be indeed and in truth disciples of our Master.

Death of Prof. G. A. Lewellen

Texas Christian University has lost one of its most honored teachers, and the Christian brotherhood has lost a faithful minister in the death of Dr. G. A. Lewellen at his home in Fort Worth, Texas, Jan. 4 1912. His strength had failed for many months, and often his work had been suspended for seasons of a week or more under various manifestations of general debility, but on Christmas night he was stricken down with cerebral hemorrhage, and he gradually sank to his last rest.

He leaves a wife and ten children. The mother is a devout and capable leader of the household. While her responsibilities are increased, her confidence in God is unchanged and her hope is clear. Four of her daughters are approaching womanhood, and have worthy educational attainments. The other children are younger, and all are unmarried.

Prof. Lewellen was educated at Transylvania University and Texas Christian University, though these institutions bore other names at that time. He received the degree A. B. in 1885, A. M. in 1886, L. L. D. in 1897. He was president of West Tennessee Christian College 1889-1893, president of Bellvue College, Tennessee, 1893-1903, president of West Kentucky College 1903-1909, and professor of Bibical Literature in Texas Christian University from 1909 to the time of his death. Along with his collegiate work he also did valuable service as a minister for local congregations.

His work for Texas Christian University has been highly appreciated. As a teacher, he was scholarly, careful, sympathetic. He loved young people, and found delight in giving them the results of his studies. He received inspiration from the highest sources, and became an inspiration to his students. To him the man of Galilee was the ideal character, and in the classroom he dwelt with raptured soul on the great, striking lessons of the Gospels.

Students freely testify to the personal help and encouragement that Prof. Lewellen gave them. He had learned that the individual is worth all the care that a teacher or a friend can bestow, and his generous heart yearned to be helpful in the most direct way. If a student lacked means to meet expenses, Prof. Lewellen aided him in securing some employment for spare hours, or helped him to obtain a loan to meet the emergency. If one gave evidence of stumbling into some unworthy habits, Prof. Lewellen was faithful to give warning and correct in a sympathetic and brotherly manner. Thus he won and held the hearts of many, while his own orderly behavior commanded the admiration of all.

He often spoke of the need of a building for ministerial students in which they might live and have meals at the least possible expense. At last, after the university was moved to Fort Worth, he was sent among the churches of Texas to raise funds, and in a little over a year he had good notes for about $30,000. The building has just been completed and furnished. Though it has been named Goode Hall after the generous donor, it will ever stand as a monmument of the untiring zeal and industry of Prof. Lewellen. He may almost be said to have given his life for it, since it was while he was canvassing for that fund his health became seriously impaired. It is a beautiful building, but it represents a self-sacrifice and devotion to duty far more beautiful than the hall itself.

The life of Dr. Lewellen was perfectly transparent. He had only pure purposes, and hence had no reason to conceal them. He was not ambitious to secure high places for himself, and made no effort to gain his own promotion. He simply moved forward as his work advanced.

He watched with deep interest the progress of the church in all her enterprises. He rejoiced in the success of her evangelism and the advancement of every missionary undertaking the conquest of nations by the kingdom of God. He deplored the spirit of fault-finding among brethren, and laid emphasis on the essentials on which they are agreed. He longed for the union of Christian people, not upon theories of the Bible, nor upon the Bible itself, but upon Christ and in loving loyalty to him.

His life has touched the lives of thousands, and all have been blest. Such a life could not be vain. He has left his work henceforth for others to do; and it will be well if they prosecute it with the same faith, patience and persistance as he possessed who has gone to his rich reward.

A Mission to Save the City.

In the early hours of the morning, before dawn, Dr. Macklin and some soldiers walked along the ramparts of the city wall by the Tai Ping gate. They went to talk the terms of surrender with the representatives of the Revolutionists. It was four o'clock in the morning. At eight the fusillade of general bombardment was to begin. Dr. Macklin and the soldiers carried lanterns. They were soon fired upon by the Tartar troops from the Fu Kwei Shan forts, and later also from Tiger Hill. Bullets were flying about them but they did not flinch. It was a mission to save the city. Mr. Garrett and the American vice-consul, also later joined them. Dr. Macklin caught a Tarter and sent him up and rebuked the soldiers and told them they were trying to save their lives, and if they insisted on acting fanatically, all would be lost.

As daylight dawned upon the dramatic scene, a little Red Cross party bearing the American flag and a white flag, consisting of Dr. W. E. Macklin, General Chao and Frank Garrett, with the United States vice-consul, A. W. Gilbert, approached the martial lines of the Revolutionary army, and were at once introduced to the victorious General Ling, who was commanding the entire Revolutionary army.

Following behind the peace bearer party was General Chao's force of 750 men as a body guard, and at the given word of the General, all laid down their arms and made the act of surrender, their arms being stacked outside the city walls. It was indeed a triumph that the city had, through the good offices of Dr. Macklin and Frank Garrett and the other missionaries, been saved from a terrible disaster and great loss of life.

The entry of the triumphant army into Nanking was a great event. There was a procession of the combined forces of the provinces under General Ling, who was leading on horseback and bowing to the citizens of Nanking as they received with acclaim the conquering army to the flourish of trumpets and the shouts of the people and the waving banners of the white Revolutionary flag from thousands of homes.

The most imposing and touching scene was at the parade ground at the viceroy's yamen, where stood the battalions of the defeated Chang Hsun. As the conquerers rode up and marched past the Imperialist soldiers, all kneeled down on the ground, laid down their arms and gave in their surrender to the new regime.

In the wonderful providence of God, the influence of the Red Cross work in Nanking saved the city from ruin. Everywhere I have been these days in Nanking as a Red Cross worker, I have heard splendid testimony to the service of the Doctor and our Red Cross work, and we sing a new note of triumph and praise to God for His wonderful love in thus using this service in the larger mission of the red cross of the Gospel.

Vital and Timely Books

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing. You need every one of this splendid list.

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST

By Edward Scribner Ames, Ph. D., author of "The Psychology of Religious Experience." 123 pages. Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. Dr. Ames treats the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy with a freshness and illumination that in itself makes his work a distinct contribution to religious thought. The book is more than a treatise. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all times must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

A very pretty girl recently returned from Ireland tells of an encounter with an Irish cabby in Dublin. She had started out from the hotel to do some shopping, but decided instead to make a tour of the city on a jaunting car. Arriving at the first car stand, and having selected the smartest looking vehicle, she told the driver that she "wanted to engage him for the day." Pat, never backward in paying homage to beauty, earnestly replied: "Gegorra, ma'am, you are welcome. I only wish it was for life!"—Ex.

Two thousand convicts are to be turned loose in Texas under an honor plan worked out by Governor Colquitt. Five hundred will be given their freedom at once, and if the plan proves a success 1,500 more prisoners will be released. The men will be hired out to the counties for fifty cents a day each, and will be allowed to work as free laborers and without guards or manacles. Extreme penalities are provided for any convict who violates the trust, and he will have to serve the balance of his term and an extension of time if he leaves the state or commits any crime while on parole. It is proposed that one-half of the convict's wages be paid to his family and the other half to the state penitentiary fund. There is a demand for several thousand laborers for work on the roads and bridges for which the different counties cannot afford to pay the cost of free labor. The governor says few convicts will abuse the privilege and escape. The punishment for anyone violating the trust has been prescribed by a vote of the convicts, which the governor and prison board have approved.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT . . . . . EDITORS

Seven Tremendous Reasons

The following tremendous reasons for a great offering to Foreign Missions the First Sunday in March are urged:

I.

The Foreign Society has spent about one-third of a century and over $4,000,000 planting our present mission stations. More than $500,000 has been expended in equipment, land and buildings, printing presses, etc. Besides, there are schools established. These enjoy large patronage. Small churches have been organized here and there over the mission fields of the world. We have gone too far to pull back now. To stop would involve a tremendous loss. We must make the best possible use of what we have gained. A number of missionaries have given their lives for the work and now sleep beneath heathen soil. Others have sacrificed health and have returned broken for life. It would be a crime to neglect or to turn away from the splendid start we have made. The great interests we have all over the world belong to the churches that have helped to plant them. These churches are responsible for the continuance and well-being of the work that has been so well begun.

II.

The present deficit of the General Fund of the Society must be wiped out. This is not the result of mismanagement. It is not because the receipts have diminished as some have supposed. By no means. The income of the Society has increased $104,000 in the past three years: $76,000 in 1909, about $10,000 in 1910, and a little over $18,000 in 1911. The deficit is in consequence of the natural growth of the work. New churches spring up. They require care and training. Small schools here and there have grown up that must have buildings and teaching. This requires money. Every new hospital demands outlay to conduct it. The staff of workers must be constantly increased for the growing work. Living expenses have increased in all these lands as they have in this country. It costs more to build now than in former years. The families of the missionaries are larger than they were five years ago. We need not be surprised at these increases, but we ought to rejoice that the work prospers and requires more. The present income for the General Fund is about $20,000 less than the outlay. This shortage should be overcome by a tremendous advance in the receipts for the General Fund.

III.

The opportunities for mission work are greater now than ever before in the world's history. Barriers that seemed insurmountable have been broken down. Difficulties mountain high have been removed. The attitudes of hostile governments have been changed. Barred doors have swung wide open to the gospel messengers. Languages have been mastered. Schools and colleges have been established. Those that sat in darkness have seen a great light. Every nation on the earth is now open to the gospel of light and liberty. Hundreds are now turning to the Lord daily. The nations are all astir. They are moving out into light. The spirit of democracy is growing all over the world and men everywhere are demanding self government and better government. The light of the modern world has dawned upon men in all lands. All men everywhere hunger for a better life and they find their satisfaction in Jesus Christ.

IV.

Now is the time for our people to move forward. Our simple, direct New Testament plea has a charm that will conquer men's lives if we will but make it known. The gospel we preach is God's power unto salvation. Our plea for Christian union has a special significance on the foreign field. We present the only true basis to re-unite the children of God.

V.

We have no barren fields. The success of our missionaries is marvelous everywhere. Think of Macklin and Meigs and Osgood and Corey in China. Communities have been transformed. We cannot forget our intrepid missionaries in far Batang in Tibet! Your well-wishes follow them to the ends of the earth. We cannot overlook the wonders of the gospel success in Japan. A new nation has been born under gospel influence. Our success in the Philippine Islands reads like a new Acts of Apostles. We have baptized over 5,000 in these islands. Our work in India charms all our hearts. And what shall we say of the Congo mission in Africa? Dr. Royal J. Dye, A. F. Hensey and their splendid associates are leading a nation to God, The reports from that dark quarter thrill the coldest and most indifferent hearts. Wherever our brave men and devoted women have gone a great light has sprung up. No society in the world is accomplishing more than are our people, considering the size of our force and our meagre income. We do not boast. The Lord forbid. We will be pardoned, however, for sentiments of appreciation and thanksgiving. God has used and is using the Foreign Society for the spread of his truth and the salvation of men.

VI.

We must keep faith with the missionaries who have left home and native land. We promised to support them. That promise must be kept. Some of these men and women have been on the field a quarter of a century. They are growing old and gray in the service. They have been in the midst of famine and wars and pestilence and persecution and social and political revolutions and upheavals. They have always been true! Not one exception. Some have afflicted families. We cannot, we dare not, neglect these our brethren who have trusted us.

VII.

No church is a New Testament church that does not sound out the world of life. It is the mission of the whole church to preach the whole gospel to the whole world. Our supreme authority for the missionary enterprise is the New Testament. To its teaching we dare not close our eyes. To the voice of our risen Lord we dare not stop our ears. F. M. RAINS.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

The Immigration Problem

That the immigration problem is still a live one in America is indicated by the literature that is being produced upon the subject. President Roosevelt is credited with saying that America has but one more urgent problem than this one, namely the conservation of natural resources. Some of us would not even make an exception of this, for it does not effect our national ideals as does the immigration wave. The past decade gives us the very highest record of immigrant arrivals we have ever had in the history of the country. In the ten years ending 1910 there were over eight millions of arrivals from foreign shores, which was nearly three times the number for the previous ten years. These immigrants were coming more largely from the Slavic countries than in the earlier days.

The problems that arise through these new-comers are many and varied. The chief problem is how these men and women who have come to make their homes with us will affect our national ideals. We have spent a hundred years and more in an epoch-making experiment in democracy. These peoples arriving from countries where there has been no experimentation in this direction will put all our theories of government and social order to a severe test. There are other problems such as the effect of these people upon our wage scale, upon crime and upon our political life. It is fortunate for us that congress has recognized the urgency of this problem and has had working the past four years a commission which has gathered statistics and interpreted them in relation to the subject. It has published a report in over forty volumes. This report is now being subjected to further analysis by the social experts of the country. We have the material for organizing a point of view on the subject of immigration such as we have never had before.

The Causes of Immigration

One nation has been known to conquer another in days gone by and take forcible possession of the land of the conquered. There has never been any analogy in history, however, for the peaceable occupation of a foreign land by millions of people. If the American people were to repeat history they would stand on their shores with their armies and repel the invaders. It is just this that the old "Know-nothing" party desired to do. Just as the phenomenon itself is different, so the causes of it are also different at many points. The original immigrants to this country—for after all we are all of us the children of immigrants—came here largely for civil and religious liberty. Those who came for the love of adventure returned; but those inspired by large ideals, as the Pilgrims, remained to found society upon a new basis in the new world. To this untried land came Congregationalists, Baptists, Quakers, and Roman Catholics, that they might escape the intolerable conditions prevailing in England at that time.

These ideal motives still exist to some extent among our immigrants, for there are coming to our shores the political mal-contents of all the nations. It is mostly, however, the lure of the economic advantages of America. The supplemental forces are returned immigrants, the steamship companies, and the desire to escape military service in countries like Germany where this service is compulsory. Not all of these forces would necessarily work harm to our country, but with the motives of immigration coming to be chiefly those of material advantage, we may expect that our country is now receiving people who will wield a far different influence upon our national life than that of the Pilgrim fathers. We are having our idealism diluted every year with a flood of materialism and at the very time that we ourselves have grown weaker in our ideal interest. In this sense, therefore, the present immigration movement may be considered a menace.

The Immigrant Races

In Europe we have four great racial divisions, the Teutonic, the Latin, the Slavic and the Hebrew. The first two divide western Europe into its northern and southern parts respectively. The last two are intermingled in eastern Europe. Our earlier immigration was mostly Teutonic and Celtic, bringing us Scandinavians, Germans, English, Scotch and Irish. It is from these stocks that our older population has been recruited. Within the past ten years, a tremendous wave of immigration has set in from eastern and southern Europe, bringing chiefly Italians from the Latin races and large invasions of the Slavic races. The Slavs are the most undeveloped of all our European immigrants. They have the highest rate of illiteracy, the worst record on illegitimacy and in this country fall into crime more than any others. Especially is the criminal record of the Pole bad. The record of the Austrians for illegitimacy is the worst in all Europe and the record of the Russians for illiteracy exceeds anything in the civilized world.

These ignorant and undisciplined men affect the wage scales in all our industrial centers, since, under the labor boss system, they underbid all the other workers in certain kinds of work. There is still one other source of immigration that remains for mention, and that is the Orient. We have Chinese, Japanese and Hindus in our country, though not in large numbers owing to the restrictive legislation that has been passed. The number of Chinese in our country has never been large and is now less than in 1890 when it was a hundred thousand. Since, however, half of these live in California, that state has always regarded Chinese immigration as one of its most vital questions. The oriental races are not at home here and usually return with the money they have made to their native land. That we have a right and a duty to control the immigration from certain sections of the globe seems to us a most evident proposition. The obliteration of race lines through amalgamation is not our ideal, but the differentiation of race groups and their development of special gifts.

Favorable and Unfavorable Results

The unfavorable results of immigration are not all known to Americans. The effect upon our economic life has been pretty thoroughly analyzed. There are some other results that have been brought to light, however, that are but little short of startling. The immigrants are settling in certain states. In these states, the birth rate in the native population is rapidly declining below that in other sections of the country and below that of the immigrants themselves. The immigrants are having an increased birth-rate. This indicates the decay and death of the native stock. The immigrant in this country is one of the great causes of misrule in our cities. It would not be fair to say they were the only cause, for degenerate whites are also the supporters of political machines like that in the First ward of Chicago. Their ignorance and their venality, however, have undoubtedly helped on the misrule of the cities. The percentage of crime among the immigrants is about three times what it is among the native whites in spite of the fact that known criminals are rejected and not allowed to enter this country. The introduction of contagious diseases is controlled by inspection but it is too much to say that this inspection is an absolute preventive. The great wave of immigration has greatly stimulated the use of machinery beyond that of other countries, and the paralysis of the intellect under highly specialized factory labor is a well-known phenomenon.

On the other hand certain people regard the immigrant wave as America's great opportunity. Zangwill, in his play "The Melting Pot," indicates his faith that in America there is to be evolved a new race from the intermingling of all the old European stocks and that this new race will have new vitality and some special and unique place in working out the brotherhood of the human race. We have been well aware that we have needed the immigrant in the industrial development of our great country, but it has remained for Zangwill to indicate the ideal possibilities that exist in the present situation. We are sure his point of view is far from visionary if only our incoming immigrant is carefully selected and then cultivated in the right way after his arrival.

What to Do for the Immigrant

Whatever attitude we may take toward the future policy of our country to the immigrant, we must recognize that millions of these people are now on our shores. They have human rights and human needs. Their presence here is a challenge to our Christianity. What shall we do for them?

We must first look to the physical well-being of these people. The tenements of the great cities are mostly inhabited by the immigrant. They should be torn down and building laws enacted making it impossible to build more. The crowded tenement places the immigrant in an environment where no race might ever hope to succeed.

In the second place, the immigrant should have a living wage.

He needs more than a bare existence. If he is to develop, he must have bread, clothes, a roof and a yard, with the other things that make for human welfare. That he has been willing to work for less is due to his ignorance of our language and problems. We must protect him by legislation.

Furthermore, the immigrant must be given human sympathy. Race prejudice is a belated product at this time in the world's history. The nick-names that are applied to the immigrant races are a great hindrance to development. The immigrant is proud just as we are. He can no more surely be alienated from all sympathy with us than by being patronized and nick-named.

Above all, the immigrant must be given religious opportunities. It is true that these people come to our shores from historic churches. These churches, however, are not ministering to their needs here even as efficiently as they did on the other side. Two priests minister to sixteen thousand Russians in Chicago. The Bohemians of Chicago have great clubs and parish schools for the cultivation of infidelity. These are challenges to the Christian church. The last book on immigration by Jenks, of the United States Commission, chides the protestant church for overlooking the greatest opportunity it has had in a century. All of these nationalities can be evangelized as is being gloriously proven by a few pioneers in this work.

Dr. Broughton Going to London

Rev. Len G. Broughton of Atlanta, becoming pastor of Christ Congregational Church, London, will be a near neighbor, on the same side of the Thames, to Rev. A. C. Dixon, who recently went from Chicago to become pastor of Spurgeon's Tabernacle. Christ Church is on Westminster Bridge Road, not far from the House of Parliament, and its tower, a tall and graceful one, is a memorial to Abraham Lincoln. Dr. Broughton will be the second Baptist minister to become pastor of this Congregational Church. Rev. F. B. Meyer was the other. For many years the pastor was the late Dr. Newman Hall.

A difficulty over the form of baptism was met upon the going there of Rev. Mr. Meyer in an interesting fashion. A baptistery was built in the chapel, and here Mr. Meyer immersed such as desired to enter church membership by that form. An assistant minister, who was a Congregationalist, in the church itself sprinkled those who desired that form of baptism. The baptistery being still in place in the chapel, the Atlanta Baptist is expected to enter into the same arrangement that was found to work well under the preceding pastorate.

Winston Churchill on God and Politics

The following from the Presbyterian Banner is another source of inspiration to those who believe in the power of Christianity to revolutionize the world. The very problems that vex us today spring out of the conflict between the principles of Jesus and the forces that oppose. It is surely gratifying to hear a man like Mr. Churchill declare that "God is in politics to the confusion of the politicians." Many people seem to believe that the devil is in politics to the confusion of the Almighty. The great novelist speaks like a true prophet:

An article with this title in the January Atlantic, reveals Mr. Winston Churchill, the American novelist, who has won distinction in literature and also made some incursion into the political life of his state, New Hampshire, as a believer in Christianity, who is quite the opposite of a heckler of the church. He reads the signs of the times and sees a tremendous groundswell of religious faith and activity gathering momentum and rolling over the country and world. Religion is much wider than its formal organization and activity in the church and is the secret spring that is generating force and pushing on many movements that are not at first recognized as spiritual. What means this modern demand for civic righteousness? "In short," answers Mr. Churchill, "we begin to see more and more clearly that God is in politics. That he has always been, and always will be. That in some greater and higher sense than we had yet perceived, the saying, vox populi vox dei, is eternally true. He enters into the hearts of the people and moves them, and so the world progresses. God is in politics, to the confusion of politicians. And when these mysterious, quickening currents are abroad, we must believe that mankind is ready for another step forward." Mr. Churchill finds the same evidence of a new spiritual force moving in literature, medicine, science and all the fields of life. Luther set free a principle of intellectual and religious liberty that went on fulfilling itself in modern democracy, in our Declaration of Independence, and that is yet to reach its fullest realization in spiritual religion, saturating all society with the spirit of Christ. Mr. Churchill, however, is not evaporating Christianity into mere ethical spirit, but believes in its solid substance in the Gospel of Christ, risen from the dead. "There are signs all about us that science and history, government and the church,—the fellowship of Christians upon earth,—are drawing nearer and nearer together and to Christ. Psychology is doing inestimable service for religion in tending to bring it into harmony with modern life and conceptions. Let us believe firmly that a time is coming, nay, is now at hand, when the Church of Christ shall no longer be separated from our lives: when the religion of the risen Christ, freed from idolatry and superstition shall find its true abiding place in the heart of man, reign there in its supreme authority, and permeate all departments of life." So speaks this gifted man of letters.

A Successful Student Pastor Ministry

Under the general heading "The Religious Atmosphere of the Universities and Colleges of the Middle West," in the Living Church a correspondent has the following to say concerning the work of the Bible Chair in the Kansas University at Lawrence:

"Nowhere, perhaps, has the student pastorship taken deeper root or borne more abundant fruit than here. Ten years ago the Woman's Board of Missions of the Christian Church established a Bible chair at the university. Through the generosity of representatives of their denomination in places even as far distant as Philadelphia, that storehouse to which men and women with a mission the world over turn, and not in vain for monetary aid, a suitable building, Myers Hall, was erected, containing not merely a home for the student pastor and his family but also an office, a study, a library, a reading room, two lecture rooms, and an assembly hall seating 150 which was superseded last summer by an auditorium with room for 500 to accommodate the growing work of Dr. and Mrs. Payne, who reach not merely the 201 Disciples in the university, but as many more in attendance on their classes in the Bible, Missions, Christian History, Comparative Religion, and Hebrew. In many ways Dr. Payne enters deeply into the daily life of many of the students. There is no actual preaching. That is left, as it should be, to the local pastor, whose hands the student upholds and who is in consequence free to minister to the permanent residents and has time to prepare for preaching to the residents and students, too."

The Minister Retorting

What villanies has the minister endured at the hands of his parishioner only the minister knows! He bears the brunt of all the mismanagement of the church; he is held responsible for the empty pews; he is dull if he does not deliver over one hundred sermons each year that can turn the edge of criticism; he is regarded as a well-meaning man—a charge which every minister should resent, for the implication is that he is good for nothing but good intentions—and on his shoulders is laid the burden of many of the ills of our church life. He is not faultless, by any means, but it is a comfort to him to read any vindication of his profession, since he can enjoy in the security of his study the discomfiture of his brethren, the enemy. Rev. James H. Ecob in the Homiletic Review for January gives us inspiration to labor on knowing that our cause is certain to be vindicated. Here is what he says:

"We are supposed to know nothing of life, to have had experiences next to nothing in quantity and quite nothing in quality. We are supposed to be about as detached from practical affairs as if we lived on the moon and slid down on a silvery beam to earth every seventh day to glimmer in a dim religious building for an hour or two, then ascend to our dead world again. Such high airs among business men are hardly becoming. The percentage of failures among them is ninety-five, while among us it will hardly reach twenty-five. The financial affairs of the Church are managed by the most competent business men in the congregation, yet a very large percentage of the churches of the country come to the end of every year with that 'eternal deficit.' Then there are lamentation and whispering and significant glances toward the pastor. Fairs, musicales, suppers, amateur theatricals, and all the rest are proposed to tide things over. This is the hour of the malcontent in the congregation. That terrible word, deficit, is an open sesame to ears which otherwise would be deaf to his subtle suggestion, 'is it not about time that we began to think of a change?' The public would be startled, and it is to be hoped, humiliated, to learn how many pastors give off a substantial part of the last quarter's salary year after year. This is the time, also, when the astute business man, finding that he has failed in what he was elected to do, makes the profound remark: 'We are evidently living beyond our income; is not our pulpit costing us too much?'"

How to Get People to Go to Church

Sensible people do not go to hear a speech just because a certain subject is to be discussed; they go to hear a speaker that has something to say. "Choose men, not subjects," was the advice of a university teacher to students in doubt as to the courses they should select. It is evident that sensible people are using the same sort of test for the churches that they use for speakers. The form of godliness without the power thereof deceives no one. Advertising an article that is poor in quality serves in the end to discredit the advertiser. Before we discuss how we may call the attention of the community to our church services, we ought to examine ourselves and see what are the motives prompting our desires for greater power.

One man tells us that the people will come to hear the "old gospel." Another is absolutely certain that churches are empty because ministers hold and preach antiquated notions. Perhaps both are right in their criticism of each other. It is not a hard task to find dead churches from whose pulpits there has never come an utterance that had the taint of modernity. Churches have died under the preaching of the most advanced theology. A scientific discussion of the food values of beef and bacon and potatoes and bread does not meet the needs of a hungry man. Science is of service to him in so far as it has aided in the preparation of wholesome food. It is the food he needs. He can live without the discussion but he cannot live without food. The theory of religion without religion itself is a poor substitute for the living word of the Lord. Theories, old and new, may be useful to us after we have learned from experience that we can be saved from sin.

In spite of all protests to the contrary, we delight in battle. What we really dislike is the manner in which we sometimes have to fight. In days not long past interest in the church was kept up by theological warfare. Differences of opinion were taken seriously. The pulpit was a fort from which were shot arrows of logic and ridicule into the camp of the enemy. This kind of fight is not as popular as it used to be. We can find excitement in so many other ways that we do not feel that need of the help that comes from belligerent preachers. The fighting editor is more to our liking than the fighting preacher, when the cause of war is theological. We like the preacher who can help us to faith in ourselves and who fights with us the battles of our own souls. We delight in the fellowship of the house of God when it means that we are better equipped by means of it to overcome the temptations that meet us daily. There are few of us who do not long to live the victorious life. We lack confidence in ourselves and in God. The church that gives us this confidence wins our loyalty.

The tone of the winning church is not apologetic. Speaking to the students of the Yale Divinity School, Dr. Gunsaulus said: "I am not come to recommend spirituality to you, my young brethren. When a thing so imperative and self-sufficing as spirituality permits recommendation and recommendation only, it is doubtful if it may get a hearing at all, or ought to expect it. * * * The mystery of our existence is solved only in the mystery of being and becoming something of worth. * * * To recommend spirituality, therefore, even to champion its claim as an indispensable fact and factor in ministering, is to put out of sight the divine order, and to lose the vision of the cause in our anxiety as to the effect and its good fortune. 'There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding,' 'Without vision the people perish;' 'Be ye spiritual;' 'The spirit beareth witness with our spirit that we are born of God'—these are but a few of the words immortal which help to constitute a delineation of what man is essentially, and especially what he is in the attaining of himself through his life in God, the Father of all spirits. Perhaps one of the very weaknesses most to be lamented, as we falter and fail in handling the Christian realities that are ever to be spoken of in the pulpit or carried to men through our shepherding of souls, comes from our inadequate perception of the primacy of spiritual realities and their inherent right to be supreme."

The feeling that spiritual realities have a right to be supreme has no affinity with dogmatism. We become dogmatic when we lose our spirituality. We cease to trust God and his Christ and make our appeal to human authority. The spiritual man is not domineering. He leads because he has the light of life. The church in which he is honored will draw people into its membership. [Midweek Service, Feb. 7. Ps. 84:1-4; 100:1-5.] S. J.

The Meaning of Baptism

XVII.—BAPTISM AND CONVERSION.

Those passages of scripture which plainly connect baptism and the remission of sins, or baptism and salvation, have long been the battle ground of Christian opinion.

"Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit."—Acts 2:38.

"Arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sin, calling on the name of the Lord."—Acts 22:16.

"The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us, not the putting away of the filth of the flesh but the search of a good conscience after God."—1 Peter 3:21.

With this group are usually quoted those texts which speak of being "baptized into Christ," which we have already considered, and the unauthentic record of the commission attached to Mark's gospel: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be condemned."—Mark 16:16.

These texts of scripture have stood like spectres in the path of those who would interpret Christianity as an out-and-out ethical and spiritual religion. The whole body of New Testament teaching, both of Jesus himself and the apostles, presents plainly enough a consistent spiritual unity save for these few texts which seem to sanction a sacramentarian element. The effect of this apparent antimony in the sacred record has been to cause those committed to the spiritual interpretation practically to ignore such passages as these in the interest of what they conceived to be the dominating element in Christianity; while those committed to a strict construction of the letter of the scripture have naturally seized upon passages like these as lending themselves to a definite "scheme" of salvation more intelligible to their type of mind than a salvation stated in terms of spiritual life or moral character.

It will be conceded by all that if we are to regard the New Testament as in any true sense the interpreter, the carrier, of the Christian faith these passages of scripture connecting baptism with salvation, and obviously as a condition of salvation, must be fairly faced. They must be declared and proved to be interpolations or else given the respect due them as true representations of original Christianity. No effort to discredit their textual rights having been made, we are bound to admit that in the minds of early Christian writers and in the thought of the primitive Christian church, baptism was associated with salvation as a vital factor in the conversion experience, and seems to have stood upon a level with faith and repentance. It does us no good to wince under this admission. It will be said that such an admission discredits Christianity as an ethical religion. If this be so there is no other course open to those who must have an ethical religion save to find some other religion than Christianity. For in actual, historical Christianity baptism seems to have been regarded as prerequisite to salvation.

The attempts made to twist the Greek prepositions translated "into" and "for" and "unto" so as to place baptism after the remission of sins are curious enough. But they avail nothing. Leaving one side now the ridiculousness of hanging the soul's salvation upon the turn of a preposition, let it be assumed that the post-salvation construction is valid. What has been gained? Nothing at all. Baptism still stands in the minds of those holding this view as an "act of obedience" to the divine will. Nobody pretends to get rid of baptism itself by locating it after the forgiveness of sins. But if it is sacramentarian before forgiveness it is equally so after forgiveness. No conceivable objection can be made to baptism as a means to salvation that cannot be made to it as a means of grace. It is no less repugnant to our moral sense to think of baptism as an act of obedience to Christ after salvation than an act of obedience to him before salvation. It is the dread of the doctrine of baptismal regeneration that lies behind the forced effort to construe New Testament language so as to make baptism an act of the Christian life rather than an act by which one becomes a Christian. But baptism as a condition of attaining the Christian life is surely no worse than baptism as a condition of maintaining the Christian life. It seems better therefore in this case as in all cases, to cling to the natural, obvious meaning of New Testament utterances and allow the doctrines to take care of themselves.

This dread of the doctrine of baptismal agency in salvation is due to wholly false conceptions both of baptism and salvation. In the long and often bitter controversy over the matter, baptism is conceived of either as the physical act of immersion in water or as a detached individualistic ordinance with its meaning in itself. The objectionable views have therefore been denominated "water salvation" and "sacramentarianism." But, as we have seen, baptism in the New Testament agrees with neither of these constructions. It is not a physical act. Neither is it a mere sacrament. Its meaning is not in itself but in the body of believers with which it identifies one. Unlike the Lord's Supper, which is essentially a sacrament, baptism is essentially an organizational act and incidentally a sacrament. It is the social act of incorporating the individual into the Church of Christ. Baptism thus not only expresses something, it effects something. It is not simply the "outward sign of an inward grace"—it is that, but it is more. It is the actual transformation of this inward grace into a social reality. The situation is really changed by baptism. The believer has become an actual part of the social organism of believers, his faith has been published, his repentance has been clinched, his feelings and purposes have been drawn out of his subjective experience and knitted in with the feelings and purposes of others who are of like mind with himself concerning Jesus Christ.

With respect to salvation much ought to be said. It will be quite sufficient, however, for our present purpose, simply to characterize the popular view and, in contrast, to affirm the New Testament view. The popular view is legalistic. It conceives of salvation as a legal act of God, performed on behalf of the soul upon the fulfillment of certain more or less arbitrarily fixed conditions. The divine act of forgiveness takes place in the remote will of God and is registered in the soul (if at all) by a certain kind of experience which, analyzed, is usually emotional in nature. God's act is an act of grace, it takes no account of the character of the one pardoned. Indeed it is essentially an act of imputing a righteous character to one not righteous, but who in conforming to the terms of God's "plan" of salvation has somehow made it possible for God to wipe out the past and give to the soul a new start under such changed relations with God as will allow the development of character. With this view of salvation it is plain why many spiritually minded teachers of religion cannot tolerate baptism as a prerequisite of salvation. It is hardly thinkable that, in the divine ethics, the act of forgiveness should be inhibited, pending the performance of a mere sacramental act by the suppliant. And of course, on these legalistic premises, it is manifest that a God who devises a "plan" of salvation, including as one of the "terms" of pardon the performance of a formal act, is an inferior God, ethically, to one who grants his pardon on purely spiritual "terms."

But all such objection to the position given baptism in the New Testament vanishes when we take seriously to heart the New Testament conception of salvation. Allowing now for the survival of a certain modicum of legalistic elements in early Christian thinking it can hardly be denied that salvation in the New Testament is identical with character. It is not a substitute for character. It is an out-and-out ethical, spiritual thing. This is hardly less true of Paul himself, out of whose rich imagery the legalistic doctrine has been woven, than of Jesus. With the Master, salvation is no abstraction existent in the divine mind and imputed to the soul. It is a concrete moral reality, expressed always in the gross terms of every-day righteousness. To be saved is to be pure in heart, to be meek, to be lover and helper of fellow man, to be truly aware of God. With Paul salvation is to be "worked out" "in fear and trembling." Salvation is character, and character is Christ in us. God's forgiveness is not withheld pending man's fulfillment of certain conditions. The forgiving act is God's characteristic and eternal attitude. The lamb was slain before the foundation of the world. Christ is the revelation not of God's "plan" but of God's forgiving nature. It is the knowledge that God has forgiven that underlies repentance and faith, and prompts them, leaving no room for any man to boast. Forgiveness, then, as a divine act, is not a reward of obedience to a "plan" which God has devised. Forgiveness is itself the plan. God saves men by disclosing his eternal forgiving grace despite their sins. And it is this disclosure that leads them to repentance.

In terms of human experience, therefore, forgiveness is the actual reception of God's life, his grace, his character, his righteousness. It is not an abstraction. It is not a legal imputation. It is not a divine fiat. It is a concrete moral reality. The remission of sins is the actual forsaking of them. Forgiveness is not realized, on the human side, in the feelings but in moral character. The salvation that belongs to Christianity is through-and-through ethical. God forgives man, not by changing his own mind toward him, but by actually making the man over. Of one thing those who have known Jesus Christ may be sure, namely, that the Father is eternally of the same mind toward his children. There are no "laws" which he has "decreed" through the keeping of which man may be saved. His laws are his own righteous ways of life. To be saved is to walk with God in those righteous ways. And God's eternal passion has been to make known his own life to man, that thus he might save man, a passion which was at last accomplished in Jesus Christ. Christ is the righteousness of God, and to be saved is to have him indwelling in the soul.

Thus baptism and salvation are both ethical categories. The question to ask concerning baptism is not: Has God decreed it as one of the "terms" upon which he will grant pardon to the sinner? The implications of such a question are such that one cannot answer yes to its truth nor no to its error. But let the question be stated not as a matter of divine decree but as a matter of actual fact, thus: Does baptism actually help in the recovery and perfecting of spiritual character, in the actual remission of sin and the building up of Christian manhood? Such a question may be, must be, answered yes. And why? Clearly because Christian character is both a social product and a social force. It is not created in isolation, and it cannot exist in isolation. It demands the social freemasonry of others of like mind concerning Christ in order to its own completeness, and it seeks such freemasonry as a medium through which to render its utmost service to the Kingdom of God. Baptism, as we have seen, is the initiatory act of incorporation into this freemasonry. By whatever outward sign or signs the act of self-identification with the Christian community is solemnized, it can hardly be disputed that the social act itself does effect something, does alter the situation. As truly as faith effects something or repentance effects something, baptism effects something. It is a positive ethical factor in salvation. It is not a ceremonial fiction. It has moral potency and importance. It saves faith and repentance from sentimentalism. There is no need to mumble our words when we read, "Baptism doth also now save us," nor to invent ingenious devices for eliminating baptism from Ananias' exhortation to Saul or Peter's injunction to the Pentecostians, or the Master's commission to his disciples. Baptism belongs in the conversion experience. It is a pre-requisite to salvation. It is difficult to conceive how in any New Testament sense one may be called a Christian to whom it has not been administered.

In a previous article on The Sociology of Baptism we discussed the function of the ordinance from the point of view of the church as a social institution with a social task. In the present chapter we are discussing the same thing but from the point of view of the individual. This chapter might properly be entitled The Psychology of Baptism. All the considerations which make for the necessity of an organized church in the social order make obligatory upon the Christian-minded individual that he shall identify himself with the church—all these and additional considerations centering in his own personal need. No conversion is complete until faith and repentance have become socialized by baptism. Not only the possibilities of personal growth in the Christian virtues are limited by refusal to ally oneself openly with Christ's people, but the reality of the remission of past sins is rendered extremely dubious by such refusal. Those who have made ship-wreck of their Christian profession simply because they failed to attach themselves definitively and vitally to the organic life of Christ's people, are a great multitude. The typical evangelism which obtains in our day is censurable for its lack of the baptismal note. Our evangelism preaches faith and repentance but is afraid of baptism. It awakens subjective religious aspirations but fails woefully to carry these impulses into social objectivity. The implications of its gospel are that conversion is an experience between the soul and God, and as a result many a soul imagines it is converted and saved when it has simply experienced a shower bath of its own emotions. At this moment world-renowned revivalists are reporting their meetings as resulting in three, five and ten thousand conversions, when less than three, five and ten hundred—or even so many scores—have been added to the church. That a community should be manipulated into a high state of religious feeling and the church of Christ thereafter register no perceptible increase in its working force for the Kingdom of God is an unapostolic procedure. There is need—profound and crying need—of an evangelism which, when men cry out to know what to do, is not afraid to proclaim Peter's pentecostal words: "Repent and be baptized every one of you for the remission of your sins." For men are saved by baptism as truly as by faith and repentance.

It must be pointed out that among the Christian bodies the Disciples of Christ are somewhat distinctive in that they have produced an evangelism which includes baptism as a part of the conversion experience. From the beginning of their history their preachers and teachers have faced unflinchingly the texts which stand at the head of this article. Unlike their Christian neighbors they have made no essential distinction between becoming a Christian and uniting with the Church of Christ. With them the conditions of pardon are identical with the conditions of membership in the church. Baptism is not only the gateway into the church, but also the last step in the process by which forgiveness is realized. With most evangelical bodies the soul is pardoned, saved, before baptism. Being baptized, joining the church, is a further act, standing, so to speak, by itself. The main emphasis is put upon faith and repentance, upon the subjective experience; and baptism, if enjoined at all, receives attention as a sort of after-thought. With the Disciples baptism is no after-thought, but an integral part of the conversion of the soul. As a consequence, in Disciple evangelism there is no such disparity between the number of reported conversions and the number of church members as obtains with others. One hundred or one thousand conversions means one hundred or one thousand church members.* It will be plainly seen that this placing of baptism in the conversion process explains much of the notable growth of the Disciples' body.

But it is doubtful if even the Disciples have fully recognized the wide bearing of their practice. With them baptism has been conceived as a detached, static sacrament, with a strong tendency in many quarters to identify it with the physical act of immersion. Its initiatory character has been confused if not wholly eclipsed by its legalistic interpretation and in its place the "right hand of fellowship" has grown into an institution almost of the dignity of a church ordinance. That is to say, the place of baptism in the conversion process has been regarded in individualistic terms as an act of legal obedience to Christ by which the pardon of past sins was to be secured. The idea that the pardoning efficacy of baptism lay in the spiritual connection which it established between the convert and the community of believers by making him a member of the social body of Christ, has not been preached. Instead of this, baptism has been preached for its own sake. A baptism consciousness has been created which is something else than church-membership consciousness. And thus the socializing function of baptism has been practically overlooked.

If our conceptions of the church and of baptism were wholly freed from the legalistic implications which we have inherited from Rome the Romish doctrine that outside the church there is no salvation might be translated into ethical and vital categories of tremendous power. If the church is regarded as a legal, static institution, into which souls may flee as into an ark of safety for salvation from the wrath of God, it will be repugnant to the mind of modern men to talk of salvation in terms of church membership. But if the church is conceived as the body of men and women of like mind about Jesus Christ, who need one another, and who wish to spread their Master's cause through the whole earth with such facility and efficiency as can be found only in social coöperation, the conception of initiation into that body as a means of personal salvation will become not only rational but tremendously appealing to the modern mind. Such an appeal calls today for a champion. It has none. Between liberal individualism on one hand and ecclesiastical legalism on the other the plain ethical duty of baptism is going unpreached. The tendency away from the ecclesiastical church has resulted in a religion frankly individualistic, subjective, and consequently for the most part, sentimental. Individualistic religion does not organize itself. It provides no social body in which the stirrings of the spiritual life may find adequate and effective expression. The natural connection between faith and good works is talked about, but the individual is left to himself to make the connection. Individualism has no church. It even boasts that its sanctuary is the stillness of "God's first temple."

Meanwhile the Kingdom of God waits upon the organization of Christian-minded men and women into the body of Christ. The great ends of social righteousness are to be gained only through a vast freemasonry of righteous men who are dominated by the ideals of Jesus. There is already enough goodness in the world to save it. Its ineffectiveness is due to its social irresponsibility. Here is the field for a new and mighty evangelism. The preaching of the moral obligation of membership in the Church of Christ—specifically, of baptism—would awaken in the convert the sense of solidarity, of coöperation, of militancy, now so woefully lacking in our church life. The new life of faith would be translated from its subjective state into an objective practical social order, where its chances of survival and wholesome growth would be increased manifold. Religion, in the power of such an evangelism, would cease to be a feeling and become a task, in the constant whole-hearted doing of which the soul would discover the blessing of God.

If once Christian evangelism would cease preaching baptism as a mere desirable addition to the conversion experience, an afterthought, and preach it as an ethical necessity to a true salvation, a new era for the church and the Kingdom of God would arrive. The church would be brought into harmony with the outstanding social ideals of our times. If once it were taken seriously that to be a Christian is not to have an individual "experience," nor to cherish some sentiment, nor even to have the assurance that a change has taken place in the attitude of God toward the sinner,—if once it were taken seriously that to be a Christian is penitently to organize oneself into the fellowship and coöperation of others of like mind concerning Jesus Christ and his way of living, the church would find itself drawing into its own broad channels the massive humanitarian sentiment of today which is now being either dissipated or spent through divided and relatively ineffectual non-religious agencies. Not only so, but the missionary impulse would be resident in the conversion experience at the start, and the work of saving men among all nations would be entered upon by every convert at his baptism.

The Soul's Growth

How does the soul grow? Not all in a minute;
Now it may lose ground, and now it may win it:
Now it resolves, and again the will faileth;
Now it rejoiceth, and now it bewaileth;
Now its hopes fructify, then they are blighted;
Now it walks sunnily, now gropes benighted;
Fed by discouragements, taught by disaster,
So it goes forward, now slower, now faster;
Till, all the pain past and failure made whole,
It is full grown, and the Lord rules the soul.

*A qualification should, perhaps, be made to this sweeping statement in view of the marked present day tendency to imitate the type of evangelism prevailing in other religious bodies. But until very recent times the statement would hold absolutely.

Editorial Table Talk

Is Our Spiritual Tone Low?

Rev. R. J. Campbell, pastor of City Temple, London, talked for publication just before sailing from New York last Wednesday, after a preaching tour in America that included cities from Boston to Los Angeles and covered a period of three months. He felt, he said, that the spiritual tone of America is not as high as it is in England. He might be mistaken, but he had talked with many leaders, and tested the religious life of many communities. There are exceptions to this sweeping statement, and he might find, on a longer stay, that he would change his mind. He praised, however, the great activity in philanthropy, and the wonderful efficiency of organized effort.

Mr. Campbell thought he saw a mighty cleavage in America between the social movement and the churches, and he felt this gulf to be unfortunate. In England most social service leaders are Christian workers also, and most labor leaders in the House of Commons are local Methodist preachers. The churches can hardly do better service, he thought, than to bridge over this gulf. He saw the same social consciousness here as in England, but thought it to be more tied up to official organization.

While in Los Angeles Mr. Campbell had an experience that was, to him, the most interesting of any during his present visit. He was in that city when the agitation over the McNamara incident was at its height. Feeling ran high, and there were, and still are, two camps in the community, a labor and an opposition. He was asked by both sides to speak on labor problems in England, and their adjustment. He consented provided both sides would meet in one hall, and listen peacefuly to one address. The British vice consul presided, and agreed with Mr. Campbell, on the latter's stipulation, that if anything happened he was to be sent back to England wrapped in a Union jacket. There was no disturbance, and Mr. Campbell was able to allay feeling during his address. He explained that in England most of the labor leaders are active Christian workers. He thought that fact had much to do with solution of problems. He thought the same influence here would bring the same end.

An Indictment Against All Denominations

The survey of religious conditions in the West and Northwest, made by a deputation of home mission secretaries of five denominations and reported in The Christian Century two weeks ago by Dr. I. N. McCash, was reported in The Continent by Dr. J. E. McAfee, who represented the Presbyterian board in the deputation. Dr. McAfee's article rings with the same urgent notes that make Dr. McCash's article interesting. He declares that the prayerful consultation of these five secretaries who had never before conferred together, was the occasion of mutual confession, freely and contritely made. It is startling, when one faces the fact fairly, to know how unsympathetic, how guerilla-like, the home mission work of the churches of Christ has been conducted in past years. Waste, rivalry, bitterness, incompetence, all inhere in the independent denominational policy of evangelizing the frontier places of America. Dr. McAfee declares frankly that "upon any rational definition of over-churching, the towns in the West are over-churched." This over-churching does not compare, he explains, with "the disgraceful duplications and competition in the East and Middle West. But even in the comparatively new communities of the West there is sometimes such a blundering distribution of the forces as to lodge an indictment against all our denominations." He repeats that the indictment is against them all. Here are his words:

> No church's record will bear scrutiny. Even those denominations, like the Presbyterian and the Congregational, which are always forward in their scorn of sectarianism, have shown themselves at times flagrantly sectarian. The Methodists and Baptists have sometimes declined to have any part whatever in the numerous county movements inaugurated in these states. The Disciples, announcing the holy purpose of bringing the followers of Christ into union, have at points only succeeded in creating new divisions in the community, worse confounding the existing confusion. The smaller denominations have, each of them, contributed their share to the unseemly strife.

Disciples of Christ, in humility of heart, will not find complacent excuse in the fact that other bodies are guilty together with themselves, but will allow the full force of this indictment to search their own conscience as if it were directed to them alone. "Announcing the holy purpose of bringing the followers of Christ into union," and at the same time "creating new divisions in the community, worse confounding the existing confusion." It is very doubtful if the most radical insurgent in our communion is vividly enough aware of the full extent to which our movement for unity has compromised its ideals with the carnal sectarian order for whose reformation it set itself one hundred years ago.

A Working Basis of Unity in China

The trend toward unity in the foreign field is again illustrated in the working basis of cooperation adopted by Baptists and Presbyterians at Tsinanfu in the Chinese province of Shantung. The Presbyterians in the case are Americans, the Baptists are an English mission. Of the former there are nine missionaries, of the latter eight. Feelings of the utmost cordiality and fraternity obtain between. In order to further their common work they appointed a committee of five from each mission to devise a basis for a union church. This committee unanimously recommended the following remarkable resolutions which were adopted last October at the annual meeting of the Presbyterian Shantung mission. These resolutions will be regarded with great interest by all students of the problem of Christian unity. The joint committee resolved to recommend:

"I. That there be one united Protestant Church for the whole Tsinan city and suburbs.

"II. That the said church be allowed the use of our mission chapels in suburbs and city until such a time as it can reasonably be asked to provide its own buildings. That arrangements for the control and upkeep of the buildings be decided by the respective mission stations in consultation with the Union Church.

"III. That entrance to the Church shall be by either of the recognized forms of baptism at the option of the candidate, it being understood that baptism by immersion only shall be practiced in property owned by the English Baptist Mission. Members of any evangelical church shall be received on certificate.

"IV. That the Union Church shall be affiliated with the Presbyterian and Baptist Churches in the following manner:

"1. That delegates be sent to Tsinan Presbytery and Baptist Union with voting powers, provided these bodies are willing so to receive them.

"2. That the spiritual affairs of the Church shall be administered by a council consisting of the pastor and other church officers and, in addition, two ordained ministers, one appointed by the Tsinan Presbytery and the other by the Baptist Union.

"3. Cases of appeal from the decision of the Union Church, and cases which by their nature are difficult or impossible of adjustment by the Union Church, shall be referred for decision to a commission to be appointed by the Presbytery of Tsinan and the Baptist Union.

"V. That territory in the Licheng county be allotted to the Union Church for evangelistic work as it becomes able to occupy it.

"VI. That in our opinion it is advisable that the Union Church invite two pastors as soon as possible, one selected from each of the two denominations.

"VII That statistics of the Union Church be reported both to the Tsinan Presbytery and the Baptist Union."

An Important Statement

The Christian Century's use of the names of the officers of missionary societies as representative Disciples who endorsed certain affirmations published in the issue of January 18, was altogether without their knowledge, as plainly stated in our article. Some loyal but anxious friends of the societies feel that the officers should publish a disclaimer, on the grounds that their societies are likely to be involved in controversy. This is totally unnecessary as we assume full responsibility. Their names were cited in reference to Dr. Sweeney's challenge, not because they were officials of societies but because they were representative men of the Disciples. It would be hard to imagine how the mention of their names as representative men could involve their societies in controversy! Besides, there is no probability that these affirmations will become the subject of controversy! However, it is not our purpose to leave in any one's mind the slightest fear on this point. The sacred interests involved in our missionary and educational organizations are too dear to us, as to all loyal souls, to permit us even to defend our right to refer to these leaders as we did. We therefore withdraw the names of all missionary officials and college men from the list and relieve them absolutely of any responsibility that might be imputed to them by any one.

The Perilous Situation of Turkey

By President C. F. Gates

EDITORS' NOTE: This broad and analytic description of conditions in the Ottoman Empire, by the President of Robert College, is one of the most authoritative utterances that has been given to us of the Occident. Dr. Gates' long and intimate acquaintance with and participation in the affairs of Turkish life fit him to discuss the situation most helpfully.

The eastern world is certainly in a state of unstable equilibrium and changes of great importance may easily take place in the near future, although it would be foolish to try to predict what these changes will be.

The Psychology of Europe.

China, Persia, and Turkey are all involved in wars and internal disturbances, which cannot be settled without new adjustments of their relations with other powers, and those powers are now in a state of tension, anxious to see what these changes have in store for them. Such a state of mind is always dangerous, it invites aggressive movements. In the December number of the Contemporary Review Dr. E. J. Dillon says: "Every nation is quick to feel and prompt to stigmatize the acts of injustice, real or imaginary, which its neighbors commit, and is eager to go and do likewise the moment opportunity offers and self-interest weaves a powerful motive." This cynical characterization of the psychology of Europe is unfortunately too true, and that eagerness to go and do likewise constitutes one of the most dangerous elements in the political situation.

The Turkish Empire is in a position of grave danger, which grows more serious as time passes. The Party of Union and Progress is held responsible for the present position of Turkey. This is the party which brought about the marvelous revolution that delivered Turkey from the despotism of Abdul Hamid, which subdued the counter revolution of Apr. 13, 1909, and which has had control of the government ever since. The policy of this party has been one of pronounced Chauvinism deliberately adopted, as was shown by the speech of Halil Bey, the leader of the party, in opening the conference of that party held in Salonica in 1910, which was reported in the London Times of Oct. 3, 1911. He announced as the program of the party just that policy which it has put into practice since that time. Macedonia must be made Turkish by settling in it Mohammedan immigrants, other languages must give way to the Turkish language, the ancient privileges of the Christian communities regarding schools, etc., must be restricted, and the Turkish army and navy must be greatly strengthened.

The results of this policy have been disastrous because it has cost the Turkish government the loss of the good will of its own peoples and of other nations. The new régime started in with the good will of Europe, England and America and the enthusiastic support of its non-Mohammedan races within the empire. The splendid revolution which it carried through with such wisdom and moderation surprised and gladdened the world which had lost faith in Turkey, and everywhere the thought found expression, "Perhaps after all reform can come from within the empire." On all sides one heard this sentiment, "We must now give the Turks a fair chance to show what they can do." That is the sentiment which finds expression so ably in Sir Edwin Pear's book, "Turkey and Its Peoples."

A Loss of Faith in the New Turkish Party.

If the Party of Union and Progress had been wise enough to follow the program which it announced in the first flush of victory, "Liberty, equality, fraternity, justice," and to give itself earnestly to the development of the internal resources of the country it would have conserved the loyal support of its own peoples and the good will of foreign nations, and Italy would not then have dared to lay hands on Tripoli in such a cynical and unjustifiable way. She dared because Europe and England had lost their first faith and hope in the new régime and no longer believed that the reforms they hoped for would come from it. The bright glow of the revolution has faded out so that now men question whether it was really dawn or twilight, and disappointment and sorrow have taken the place of their former hopes. The loss of that good will is a great loss to the country. The Party of Union and Progress cannot evade responsibility for it, the best it can do is to try to retrieve it, to win it back if possible. I think it is possible, but only on condition that religious equality shall be made the basis of party policy. I mean by that, the granting of full equality to all nations and races in the empire without respect to religion. Nothing less than that can satisfy the world in this age, nothing less than that can arrest the forces that operate toward disintegration of the empire.

The present position of Turkey is one that calls for high statesmanship, and the government deserves great credit for the moderation which it has shown. The government cannot yield to the demands of Italy so brutally made and give up a great province. To do this would mean a great loss of prestige among the Mohammedan races. The war has greatly strengthened Mohammedan sentiment, for it seems like an attack upon Islam. It is not really so, it is only a case of highway robbery. Italy does not take Tripoli because it is Mohammedan but because she wants it. But her attack can easily be made to appear as an assault of a Christian nation upon Islam. If the government were now to yield to Italy it would probably mean the downfall of the government and of the party behind it. It must continue the war.

Italy, on the other hand, cannot quickly end the war. It may take her many years to conquer Tripoli and Cyrenaica. Even if the Turks were now to renounce their claim upon these provinces it is probable that the Arabs would continue the struggle, for they are fighting on their own account and it is their own battle rather than the battle of the Turks.

The War To Continue.

Italy cannot strike at Turkey in the Adriatic for fear of raising the question of the Balkans and offending Austria; the powers object to blockading the Dardanelles, for that would close the natural ports of Russia, Bulgaria and Rumania in the Black Sea. She might bombard a few cities or capture some islands, but this would not end the war. She must simply devote her energies to the conquest of Tripoli.

There seems to be no way of ending the war quickly and yet the longer the struggle continues the greater becomes the danger of complications because every country is asking, "What can I make out of this?" There are plenty of vexatious questions ready to spring up. Crete wants to be annexed to Greece, Russia wants the straits—the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles—opened to her warships. The Convention of the Straits in 1841 affirmed the decision of the powers that these straits should be closed to the warships of all nations and made Turkey the guardian of the straits to carry out this decision, which has been reaffirmed on several occasions since that time. The closure of the straits, however, works hardships to all the countries bordering on the Black Sea and especially to Russia, for they cannot send their warships out of the Black Sea nor bring them in to it. They cannot have warships built in Europe and brought in. Then Austria has her scheme of securing Salonica and a strip of territory leading down to it. Bulgaria wants Macedonia to become independent, and all the Balkan States are anxious to enlarge their boundaries, while Albania has become restive under Turkish rule and dreams of independence.

None of these aims can be realized except at the expense of Turkey, and for this reason the continuation of the war is dangerous to Turkey, for it allows time for schemes to be matured aiming at the realization of national hopes and for popular excitement to gain strength to push governments to do the will of the people. Peace at any price might be cheap for Turkey, but peace is just what she seems unable to secure. The danger keeps increasing.

In Macedonia the Internal Organization has been revived, which is a union of all the revolutionary bands of Macedonia. There have been attempts to blow up the railroads with dynamite in several places and in Ichtib, Bulgaria, the revolutionists succeeded in blowing up a mosque and so provoking an attack of Mohammedans upon the Bulgarian population in which some 180 people are said to have been slain. The Turkish army is strongly posted in Macedonia and the government seems to be trying to keep order, but the task increases in difficulty. The government ordered the expulsion of all Italians from Smyrna and Salonica and then countermanded the order, it is said, on account of the representations of the German ambassador. In circumstances like these there is great need of agreement among the great powers and some definite enunciation of their policy to calm excitement and make the smaller states understand the fruitlessness of agitation, but there is now no outward sign of agreement between the great powers, on the contrary they seem to be divided into camps more or less pitted against each other.

A Rival Turkish Party.

Meanwhile, within the Turkish Empire a new party has arisen which is contending with the Party of Union and Progress for the control of the government. It is called the Liberal Union. In the election of a deputy for Constantinople two days ago this party succeeded in electing its candidate, who secured one more vote than the candidate of the Party of Union and Progress, but the new party has not seemed to have the confidence of the Christian deputies and it is a question whether it can dispute the elections successfully with the rival party in the provinces. The Party of Union and Progress still seems to be, as the prime minister, grand vizir, has said, "The only party that is organized," and, therefore, it is to it that we must look to find a solution of the many and perplexing problems now before us. It is to be hoped that it has learned wisdom from past mistakes, but no solution will prove efficacious unless it comes soon.

There is much disorder in the provinces. The Kurds are harassing the Armenians in the Van and Bitlis provinces just as they used to under the old régime, and the repeated remonstrances of the patriarch have brought no relief as yet. Business is almost at a standstill, and all projects for developing internal resources halt. The chamber has spent considerable time in discussing the project for the building of railroads in Asia Minor by an American company represented by Mr. Arthur Chester, but the project is generally considered to be so dead that the discussion can only be regarded in the light of a post mortem examination. It is probably a good thing for the American capitalists that the concession has not been granted to them, for the chances of making the enterprise profitable are small in view of the determined opposition of Germany and the conditions with which the ministers seem bent on loading the concession. It was an enterprise which promised large benefits to the country and small and precarious benefits to the investors even under the most favorable terms proposed.

The War in China

By Paul Wakefield

EDITORS' NOTE: The eyes of the whole world are upon China. The Disciples of Christ are especially concerned with the outcome of the present war. They have their best developed mission stations in China. Among their missionaries are physicians and teachers who hold high places of influence in the national life. Dr. Wakefield is one of the more recent missionaries to be sent to that country. He writes out of a rich experience before going there and an evident close study of conditions in his field of work.

I have been asked to write something of the war in China. It is very hard to refuse but extremely hard to know what to write. There is the Oriental mind and temperament, forever a mystery not only to the Occidental but to the Oriental as well. Every one is play-acting. Life is in very reality a stage. Every actor wears a mask. The illusion is perfect—you think you see reality when alas all is changed in the next act! The players, the scene, before so real, folded away—gone. "You dream and dream you are awake only to wake and find it all a dream."

For years revolution has been talked of in China. Chinese history is made up of dynasty after dynasty that has fought and driven out corruption only in turn to become corrupt. Revolution is no new thing. Yet this revolution is different. Before this the force has come from within, this time it is from without. The government has opposed and delayed western learning, for the government knew that from these foreign lands would come knowledge which would not only bring discontent with the existing order of things but would also give the needed knowledge to rid themselves of the oppression. For many a year the present dynasty has been hopelessly corrupt. It was only a matter of time.

Dangerous Ideals.

I say the force of the revolution has this time come from without, and this is quite true, for the whole movement has been developed by the study of conditions in foreign lands and the realization of China's true place among the nations. Mission schools inevitably put new ideas and more dangerous ideals in the minds and hearts of the people. It is significant that in the war with Japan the Chinese army wore horrible masks, carried bird cages and danced wild dances to scare the enemy. Eleven years ago the Boxers used chants and mystic ceremonies to make themselves invulnerable. This year they are using foreign field guns, machine guns and up to date rifles. They cut the troublesome queue and use German army tactics! It is not strange that the Regent in his first anger at the rebellion let it be known that hereafter all "Western Learning" should be driven from Chinese schools!

Most of Fighting at Hanyang.

As to the revolution itself there is little to say. You get all the news (and a great deal more) before we do. Practically all the fighting and loss of life has been at Hanyang which is situated between Hankow and Wuchang exactly as New York lies between Brooklyn and Jersey City. Here a great victory was gained at the beginning by the Revolutionists when they took the city with fort, mint, iron works, and arsenal (the largest in China) with practically no struggle. Alas a few weeks later an old feud broke out among the Revolutionary troops and a large part of them deserted under the fire of their own side and the Imperialists took the city again with arsenal and all in good working condition! Some say that an offer of 3,000,000 ounces of silver from Yuan Shih Kai really got the city. I do not know that this is true. It is more than strange that all the place should be left in such perfect condition. It does not take long to blow up an arsenal at least. However to sell out would be scarcely less honorable than to get into a fuss and to march away as did the Hunan troops at this time. It is a sorry blot on the Revolutionary history and the people consider it so. We should remember that it has been the very purpose of the government in the past to stir up strife and jealousy between the Provinces, to keep them apart. It is easy to handle eighteen small sections of people. To have permitted unity would long ago have lost the empire to the Manchu. Then we will do well to read again our own history and see how hard it was to bring together the thirteen colonies in this new country where there were few traditions to hold them together.

Disloyalty of Imperial Troops.

At Nankin there were many things which seemed to show that it was the disloyalty of the Imperial troops that gave the city to the Revolutionaries. There was surely some understanding when the whole of the Imperial army sailed across the broad Yangtse where cannon from fort and war ships at hand could have wiped the army out. The Chinese reported that Chang Hsuin, the general in command, asked 800,000 ounces of silver for the city. I do not know whether this is true or false. I can only give you the common report here. Anyway the Revolutionaries have Nankin with almost no loss of life and very little destruction of property. The press reports of the destruction of Nankin and loss of life there were absolutely false. I came from there two days ago. The old Imperial City which is walled off from the main city and is a very small part of it was burned, for the Manchus lived here almost exclusively. There was no massacre of the Manchus. This burning would not have taken place but for the treacherous setting off of a mine by a Tartar general killing needlessly several soldiers. So with the loss of Hanyang there came the taking of Nankin and practically all the empire south of the Yangtse is in the hands of the Revolutionaries.

Talk of Peace.

Now they talk of peace. Yuan Shih Kai urges a Constitutional Monarchy but the Revolutionaries will have nothing to do with the Manchu. Yuan may take the throne but no Manchu is acceptable. The Revolutionists unquestionably want a republic but Yuan will not hear to that. He thinks that the average Chinaman conceives a republic to mean that all will have an equal place in the governing and an equal chance at "squeeze," while in some mysterious way, since the people govern themselves, there will be no taxes! It is quite doubtful if a republic is the type of government China at present needs.

Situation Uncertain.

The uncertainty of the whole situation is clear. You must remember that all the fighting has been between Chinese, not between Chinese and Manchu. The Manchu has made himself as scarce as possible. With the first stroke of the war the Manchu disappeared from Chinese history. It was at once taken for granted that the dynasty was out of the question. If by any chance the Manchu is retained as emperor, he has become by edicts already passed, simply a figure head, utterly without power. Why then have they been fighting? More than anything else they have been fighting to find a man, a leader. So far two men appear, General Li and Yuan Shih Kai. General Li is little known but his handling of the situation at Hanyang, his diplomacy, has been masterly. Only the loss of Hanyang by the treason of his troops keeps him from towering far above all the people, the man of China. Yuan Shih Kai is known of old. His clever diplomacy, the friendship he has gained with foreign powers pushes him well to the fore, but the betrayal of the young Emperor Kwang Hsi, in 1898, and his reputation for trickery make him distrusted by the Chinese and especially the Revolutionists. They fear his ambition and his cunning.

Wheels Within Wheels.

So in the war there is a struggle within the struggle; wheels within wheels. In this town there has been no little striving for authority. The governor of this province was "changed" five times in two weeks under the new rule. Last week two sail boats of Revolutionaries went from here to Tatung down the river a little way to take that city from the Revolutionaries holding the place. Eighty were reported killed and our braves were driven off!

The war has brought all the evils of war: lack of governmental control, opportunity for ambition, greed and spite. Robber bands organize and loot inland cities. Old scores and jealousies are settled. Flood brought famine and famine desperation. All these things complicate.

What will the end be? I do not know. These things and all the weaknesses so clearly shown by the war are now understood by the better Chinese. These people do not like war anyway. They are talking peace in Shanghai today, may be peace is even this moment assured. The best of China and the foreign powers will bring great pressure to bear urging a settlement. I believe it will come. If not, there will be long, bitter, useless fighting or mixture of fightings. And then? Well then there is Japan and Germany and Russia and several other "matters." If there is not peace now no man can even guess the morrow.

War Through A Child's Eyes

Completing the Graphic and Intimate Account Begun Last Week

IV.

"God alone tonight knows where the vacant place may be."—Adelaide Proctor

And now came a month and a half of outward quiet, but the boom of the Vicksburg guns was a dark background to this seeming place. There soon came a new meaning to this sinister thunder. I was in the yard by the fence one day, when a man rode up, and asked where Mrs. Sharkey lived; when I told him she was my grandmother, and lived just opposite, he gave me a note and told me to take it to her, and rode hastily away. I ran over and handed it to her, and as she read it, she gave an exceeding great and bitter cry—for it told of the death of Allen Sharkey, the young cousin we all loved so dearly, whom she had reared and regarded as her own son. The note said that our troops were drawn up in line of battle, before the firing began, with only the sharpshooters picking off a man now and then; the brave boy, carried away by his enthusiasm, uttered a rebel yell and waved his cap in the air; this made him a conspicuous object, and one of the sharpshooters killed him instantly. From that time, the thunder of artillery at evening had a cruel meaning to it.

When the news came that Vicksburg had surrendered on the Fourth of July, the boasts of the Union soldiers were recalled; many blamed the commanding general for having verified the prophecies of the enemy, by capitulating on the national holiday.

And now, General Johnston's little army which had been vainly trying to relieve the besieged city, determined to make another stand at Jackson, before giving up the state to the enemy. Our home, as I said, was on the main road to Vicksburg; it was on high ground, and the orchard, beyond the house, was the highest point, commanding the road both ways—so they decided to build a fort there, which they called, in honor of my aunt, Fort Jenny Withers; and trenches were dug all around the yard for a final stand. For several days, the yard and orchard were swarming with our soldiers, digging rifle pits, and throwing up breast works before the enemy came. Our home was a large building, with an observatory on top, which commanded a view of all the surrounding country; all the time, officers with their field glasses were coming and going, looking for the approach of General Sherman, whom General Grant had sent in pursuit. The stairs leading to the observatory were quite narrow, and I recall, even at that thrilling time, a good deal of quiet amusement as to whether a certain large Kentucky general could manage to get up the stairs without sticking fast; some of us secretly watched him—and he had to go up in sidewise fashion.

Of course, as fighting was to be done in our yard, it was imperative that both our household and my grandmother's, just across the way, should move out as soon as possible; and even I, a child, grasped the thought that we should never return. Then came such a time of tearing up and dismantling the old home as can hardly be conceived by one who has never experienced it. Our good friend, General William Loring, detailed some soldiers to help my mother, and put at her disposal a freight car on the other side of town, to put our necessary articles in. The kind general would come every now and then to superintend things, and I can see him now—a stout, rather short man, with a bald head, choleric black eyes, and a tendency to let slip an oath every now and then.

But the general of that household was my mother!—perfectly calm, stern and pale, she was everywhere, directing the work, and never once giving way to tears at seeing the ruin of her beautiful and beloved home. The heavy articles like carpets and furniture and pictures and books and barrels of china were sent to the lunatic asylum; such places were usually safe from depredations, and our friend, the physician in charge, kept our things in safety for us. I think my mother took most of the silver with her, but my grandmother buried her large silver service underneath the brick floor in her basement, and the house was burned down over it; she did not dig it up until the war was over, when we returned from our wanderings; it was perfectly black then, but otherwise uninjured from the heat; it seemed as though it would never be worth anything again—but gradually, the black rubbed off, and now there are only a few obstinate spots left.

When General Sherman's army approached, we left our home for the last time, and drove across town to where our possessions were stored in the freight car, which was to be our home for some weeks to come. Our dear grandfather Withers did not go with us; he was much affected as he told us goodbye, and said,

"I must stay and fight for the old home." That was the last time we ever saw him!

"A sullen interval of war."—Dryden.

The car that General Loring gave us was not empty; there were some boxes piled up in one end of it, filled with ammunition, and on these our plunder, (which seemed mostly bedding, and cooking utensils), were placed. Our car was part of General Johnston's ammunition train, and was near the bridge over Pearl River, and was to be sent farther up the road, if the battle went against us. It was at sufficient distance to be out of range of the guns; but all that July day, we heard the rattle of musketry and the bursting of shells, but no longer like distant thunder, as the Vicksburg guns had sounded. I cannot recall any feeling of fear; the noise gave me no more concern than that of the summer storm that fell upon us that evening. Our servants cooked our meals under the trees by the river, and with all the tragic background of lost home, my father a prisoner, my grandfather fighting but a mile or so away, there was a feeling of picnic and adventure in the open air life that was by no means unpleasant.

The next day, the train pulled up to Brandon, a little town not far from Jackson. And now, we belonged to that sad army of homeless, often destitute women and children, called refugees. How much of want and pathos is comprised in that word! And yet, how many voluntarily joined that noble army of exiles, leaving home and the tender ties of a lifetime, rather than remain within the enemies' lines. To be within the lines was as hard a fate to the women of the South, as to be in a Northern prison was to the men.

I remember clearly an evening at Brandon, with the servants busy cooking supper, and preparing places for us to sleep, when the news came that our brave grandfather had been killed—his fight for the old home had been his last!

But the dear home was no more, for shells had ignited it, and it had burned to the ground—and my grandmother's beautiful home had suffered the same fate.

The next day, our heavy train moved slowly up the road to a little place called Hickory Station, where, as far as I can recall, there were only a few little cabins. General Loring had detailed a soldier, a relative of my mother's, to be with us and protect us, and he procured the use of one of these for us to stay in, until my father could join us; for, according to the terms of capitulation at Vicksburg, all officers of a certain rank were paroled, and we knew he would come to us as soon as he could.

I do not remember how long we remained at Hickory Station; it might better have been called Magnolia Station, for there were many of those beautiful trees in the woods, and at this midsummer season they were in full bloom, and the air was heavy with their fragrance. We children played happily, thanks to the well of joy in every child's heart, in the woods all day, and slept on the floor of the little cabin at night. I remember waking one night, and seeing a figure in an army cloak, which seemed unnaturally tall in that low, little room, with my mother and my aunt clinging to him—and knew it was my dear father, and I was soon in his arms, too.

He had left Vicksburg as soon as he was allowed, and had come on to Jackson, to find his father dead and unburied, his home in ashes, his fortune in ruins, his family wandering, he knew not where. I have often thought what pangs of heart he must have suffered as he buried his father that night, and realized the desolation of his home and country—for he knew that the surrender of Vicksburg was the heaviest blow the confederacy had yet received! But he was never one to waste strength in bemoaning the past, but always set his face steadfastly toward the duty of the present. He got together such poor remnants of his fortune as he could lay his hands on, and bent his energies toward finding a new home for his family. Like Abraham, he started forth, not knowing whither he went, his object being to place us as far from the seat of war as possible. We started out in our car, and slowly pulled on to Meridian, Mississippi, then to Mobile, Alabama, then across Mobile Bay and up the country to Montgomery, then to West Point, Georgia, where we stayed quite a while. These long, slow journeyings must have been not only sad, but acutely uncomfortable; but I recall none of the discomforts; there was motion, variety, many things to see, with our father's care encompassing us, like a pillar of cloud by day, and a pillar of fire by night.

But the amount of bedding in our baggage was a source of keenest mortification to me; it seemed to overflow and intrude itself on everybody's attention. I recall being set upon a mattress, while we were waiting for the boat at Mobile, and seeing a well dressed boy and girl of my age pass by, who stared condescendingly on the forlorn child on her mountain of bedding—and for the moment, if wishes could have moved it, the whole lot would have been sunk to the bottom of the Bay.

"The tumult and the shouting dies."—Kipling.

While we were at West Point, my father heard of a town in Alabama that seemed the very place for tired refugees; it was on a branch railway, it was remote from the seat of war, it had good society, being the home of rich planters, and best of all, it had good schools for his children. This was Tuskegee, since made famous by Booker Washington's schools. Here, my father bought a small farm, about two miles from town, and here we lived till the close of the war.

After coming from such a storm center of war as Jackson, the quiet and peace of this beautiful town seemed wonderful. They had never seen a Northern soldier, and had never seen a larger body of our own troops than the company which had been raised there for our army. Here, we settled down to the daily round of peaceful life, the older children going to one of the excellent academies in the town, my mother and aunt trying to make the plain, unlovely house clean and comfortable, and my father (who was not exchanged for some time) trying to raise everything he could on the farm. I remember that peanuts, or goober peas, as they called them there, were an important crop, and excellent for fattening stock;—and I need not add that they were as popular with the children, as with the hogs and mules. Sorghum was another product, and we made our own molasses from it.

Here, we first began to feel the need of the food and clothing to which we were accustomed, and had to resort to the forgotten industries of pioneer days to supply our wants. My mother soon had to get spinning wheels and a loom, to make the homespun clothes that we all had to wear. The question of dyes was an absorbing one, and she soon became initiated into the virtues of indigo, and copperas, and logwood. The scrub palmetto was plentiful, and we plaited that into braids, and made all our hats from it. We made all of our soap; our only lights were the home-made tallow candles—and they but served to make darkness visible: had it not been that we were in a pine region, where the rich light-wood made a bright light on the hearth, we should have been unable to work after dark; as it was, we would sew, or knit, or read by firelight. It was a time when there was plenty of work for even the children, who had not known before what the word meant. If household work, and sewing and carding and spinning were out of the way, there was the everlasting knitting always ready; for all the family footwear was homeknit—and the socks for the dear soldiers was the task that was never finished. When I was not at school, I was expected to knit a sock a day without being especially skillful, and grown people could easily finish their pair of socks in that time.

Coffee and tea soon became a tale that was told, and the substitutes for coffee were as varied as there were products that could be toasted and ground up. Peanuts and sweet potatoes were favorite ones with us; if we had only been able to look forward and foresee Postum Cereal as the drink of health, it might have reconciled us to these unloved substitutes!

Tuskegee, as I said, was a veritable village of peace when we went there, but it seemed as though war followed in our wake. After we had lived there about one and a half years, General Wilson, of the Union Army, passed through our town on his way to Columbus, Georgia, and the old work of burying and hiding our valuables began again. I remember that some large silver waiters that my mother owned were buried in the yard, and fruit trees planted over them; there they remained till the end of the war—now not very far off. Our home was on the highway to Columbus and Macon, Georgia, and General Wilson's army was nearly three days marching by. They did not rob the houses, as the soldiers at Jackson had done, but they took all the stock off the farm, and the feed, and this time a number of our negroes went off with them; the legend of forty acres and a mule was more than they could resist.

So we were left impoverished—but the end was not far off now. My father, who had been exchanged in the meanwhile, and assigned to the command of troops at Mobile, came home; and all the bitterness of defeat was revealed in the tears in his eyes, the first I had ever seen there, and the tone of his voice, as he told us,

"Lee has surrendered."

Our Readers' Opinions

Letters to the Editors

"I cannot refrain a line of congratulation upon the excellent paper you are giving us in The Christian Century. I want to especially tell you how much I have enjoyed the last issue. Your reply to Brother Sweeney was admirable. You answered him with the arguments of a logician and in the spirit of a saint. I also want to thank you for the articles, "The Meaning of Baptism." I have never had as much light thrown on Ephesians 4:5. The Disciples need the very kind of statesmanlike leadership you are giving us. "You came to the kingdom for such a time as this." I think no saner or wiser or more scriptural words have ever been spoken on baptism than the ones you have been writing. You doubtless remember that last spring I sent you an article on "Are We Consistent in Making Baptism a Test of Church Membership?" I do not think you ever published it, and since reading your splendid articles on baptism I am heartily glad you did not. If you consigned it to the waste basket, alright. If you have it I would be glad for you to return it to me, as I might take a notion some day to revise it and Centuryize or Morrisonize it."

[Or better still, New Testamentize it! although it came very close to precise New Testament teaching. It was not published because the author asked that it appear anonymously.—The Editors.]

"I have just read your article on the "One Baptism," also your reply to Brother Sweeney. In the light of your replies I am really sorry for the man. I had been wondering if you would make that point on the "One Baptism." Have thought for some weeks of writing an article on that myself, but you have done the job better than I could.

"Bro. ——— preached here some weeks ago on our plea for union, and quoted, "One Lord, One Faith, One Baptism" with a flourish as our preachers usually do, and as I once did myself. As we were leaving the church I said to him, "Do you think Paul had the same thought when he wrote 'one baptism' that you had when quoting it today?" He looked blank. I continued, "You quoted it to prove there is one form of baptism—immersion—and not three forms. But when Paul wrote that there was no controversy on that point." The man had never thought of it.

"I have wondered if you would say something on the symbolism of moral purity of immersion. Was not this the prime factor in it, and was not this the reason it was chosen as the initiatory form? I am delighted with your articles and want you to cover the whole ground."

[The title of the next article is The Symbolism of Baptism."—The Editors.]

"I was so delighted with your response to Z. T. Sweeney in the last Century that I must pen you my congratulations. You did it so exquisitely and at the same time with such fine spirit, that any improvement would be out of the question. Brother Sweeney's ridicule of the psychical element in baptism and his claim that it is a pure physical act and nothing more, is shocking to me. You are doing a great work."

"I must confess that while unwilling to un-Christianize our religious neighbors, my head is too thick to see your logic on baptism. However, I get many, many golden things from The Century. In expressing myself as believing that the logic of the head and of the heart should temper each other, I may be just as unintelligent as others. Of one thing I am sure, that that is not good Christianity that magnifies the real or supposed sins of our brethren. God help us all to be more studious and patient, until we come to a fuller conception of God's will."

"I enjoy your paper very much. The strong editorials are the best ever. 'The Blight of Legalism' is worthy, as well as others of last few months, to be put in permanent form. I shall ever commend The Century and its position with relation to all Christians."

"Your discussion with Brother Sweeney greatly interested me. He ruined his cause by excluding the unimmersed Christians. It

Professor Ames' Book on Christ's Divinity

The Candid Impressions of Thoughtful Readers

EDITORS' NOTE: Probably no book of recent times, written by a Disciple and seriously grappling with fundamental questions has been received with greater interest than Dr. E. S. Ames' work on The Divinity of Christ. Letters of appreciation, of inquiry and of hostile criticism are being constantly received by the author and publishers. A number of pastors have put the book into the hands of parishioners troubled over Christian doctrines and have written the author their profound gratification at the result. Other pastors declare that its influence undermines faith. We present herewith two dissimilar judgments which agree, however, in the candor and kindliness of their spirit.

By John R. Ewers

I have carefully read, "The Divinity of Christ" by Edward Scribner Ames, and have been helped by it. One can understand how it is that regular attendants at the Hyde Park Church have been stimulated by Dr. Ames' written sermons, and how they have been strongly attracted to him personally. Moreover some insight is given into that interesting pastorate, covering a period of eleven years, which has, in the past year, flowered in the magnificent foreign missionary offering.

The conventional theological expressions are missing, the terminology is elegant, but free from the shibboleths of ordinary sermonic literature. For that very reason many may be at a loss to know how to estimate these deliverances. Jesus is put into the crucible of the everyday working world. Practical values only are allowed him. "The greatness of Jesus must be conceived in ethical and spiritual terms, and therefore as something which is not guaranteed by a mysterious birth and is not lessened by an ordinary one." If any criticism is to be passed upon the book it is at this very point. Dr. Ames goes the limit in making Jesus human and in applying to him the tests which men have to meet. Again he says, "If he only acted out on earth the part for which he had been coached in heaven, or if he did a man's task with a god's strength, or if he possessed the equivalent of a magic key to unlock the plain, everyday difficulties which we meet barehanded, then he only makes our despair the deeper; for he is a constant reminder that we are mocked by a categorical imperative to perform duties too great for us, and to solve problems which to our reason are conundrums, forever dark to our natural thought by virtue of a double use of words." That is well put and calculated to be convincing but some way it does not convince, for as R. J. Campbell has said, "Jesus will never be less than nineteen centuries have made him." By no process can I make myself feel equal to Jesus. He is beyond me, and by that very fact is able to be my Saviour. Make Jesus as small as you will and still he remains so far above me that all that is so eloquently said in the above quotation stands as before. Compared with my feeble efforts Jesus did do a man's task with a god's strength; compared to my puny attempts to solve the world's problems, Jesus did possess a magic key. It may be only an affair of degree—but the degree is significant.

The book is cast in the molds of modern thinking and one feels that the writer is a master in his ability to connect the best in Christianity with current world movements. Thus the following, "What is needed to create faith in the soul of the modern man is evidence that Christianity is fitted to the task of creating a better moral order, a juster social system. This practical achievement would demonstrate the quality of the world we live in and relieve us of the present difficult task of proving the infinite goodness of God in the face of a seemingly very bad world." Graham Taylor expressed the same idea when he called attention to the apparent absurdity of our having in America many communities of Christians in communities which are obviously not Christian.

The messages of Dr. Ames ring true in the realms of social and ethical affairs. Here a measure of sympathy and large-heartedness is felt which one does not always expect in the cold scholar. The attempt to find the values of Christ for the everyday duties and common experiences of men is laudable.

The effect of the book as a whole is tonic and bracing. The atmosphere is clear like that of a mountain or of a sea. The strong thought of a great thinker grips you as the common-place stuff one so frequently reads, even in books, does not. The book is refreshing whether one agrees with every statement or not. Dr. Ames presents an attractive Christ who lives close to ordinary men, and either this Christ or some other has fashioned the life of the author into one of large helpfulness.

By Hon. Z. T. Sweeney

It is a thoughtful, virile production and one that will pay for the perusal. The title is infelicitous as it conveys the impression that the book is a treatise upon "the Divinity of Christ." The more appropriate title would be "The Divinity of Christ and Other Addresses." The book contains six addresses. (1) The Divinity of Christ. (2) An Empirical View of Christ. (3) Why I Am Not a Unitarian. (4) The Friendship of Jesus. (5) The Reincarnation of Jesus. (6) Two or Three and Christ. Numbers 4, 5, and 6, are valuable addresses, wholesome, rational and true. Number three gives the writer's views about Unitarianism as seen by him. He offers some mild criticisms upon Unitarianism, but as it is a "liberal" criticising "liberals" the chasm between them is not very wide nor deep.

If the writer of this review had no better nor stronger reasons why he is not a Unitarian he could be one without the sacrifice of principle. The second argument he gives —and the one he labors hardest—is that Unitarians hold to the "dualism between the natural and the supernatural, placing God on the side of the supernatural, and man, with all created beings, on the side of the natural." Now as between the Unitarian and Mr. Ames, I am decidedly in favor of the Unitarian. The philosophy, the logic and the facts recognize these two relations and Mr. Ames is opposing theory to fact when he contends for the opposite view.

Number one is a misnomer. It should have been "The Humanity of Christ." It makes Jesus human, gloriously human, enthusiastically human, but omits any reference to any divine nature other than is supposed by Mr. Ames himself. He specifically states this on page 17 of the address, in the following language: "The possession of the divine life is not limited to himself alone, but is the privilege of all men who will enter upon the Christ-like life themselves."

The writer differs radically with Mr. Ames upon this subject, but with most that he says, he is in entire accord. The address is not remarkable for what it says so much as what it fails to say upon the subject.

I have reserved number two for the last as I regard it as the only really dangerous address in the entire book. The title is "An Empirical View of Jesus." He defines empiricism as "human experience as we know it, and are able to test it." Acting upon this definition the speaker entirely ignores the idea that the New Testament is a revelation from God—a "faith once for all delivered to the saints"—and makes it a hodge-podge of Jewish folk lore, Greek philosophy and apostolic idealization. He says of it: "All this biblical tradition and Greek influence are being placed in ample historical perspective today." By "perspective" it is evident the speaker means "way back." He tells us "the idea of an infallible Bible arose in the seventeenth century."

He scouts the idea of the virgin birth and miracles of Jesus as witness the following: "That these miracles and this birth should still be regarded by informed men of the present day as actual literal facts, is striking evidence of how much of the primitive age of child-wonder and savaged credulity still survives in the world." Sad that so much savage credulity survives and sadder still that it is growing so rapidly—that there are more people in the world today who believe these things than ever in the past. Sadder still, they are going to the citizens of heathen countries who are not thus burdened and forcing these ideas upon them. I should think Mr. Ames would be very hostile to the work of missionaries who are teaching such ideas. But what does he propose to do with these ideas?

"As literal matters of fact they should be put aside with other childish things." But as all the value they have turns upon whether they are literal matters of fact why not bury them out of sight with all other falsehoods. If the above is not sufficient to inflict the death-blow to all genuine faith in Jesus as a savior sent from heaven, Mr. Ames will make one more stab.

"Empiricism attaches no validity to the old dualism of the natural and the supernatural, the human and the divine." Mr. Ames can't deny the natural and human—and as there is no dualism everything is reduced to what is natural and human if the "empirical view" is adopted. No divine savior, no revealed will of God, nothing but nature and humanity. The world must surrender all the hopes that inspired the apostles who preached a risen savior and conqueror of the tomb, and drop back and take its place in the procession where the world was before Christ was first preached as a divine redeemer. Mr. Ames agrees to this as witness the following: "Therefore we are not any longer concerned with the divinity of Christ."

Is this the best the "empirical view" can present to a great believing, acting Christianity? While sermon number one is remarkable for what it does not say, number two is remarkable for what it does say. While I think Mr. Ames radically wrong upon the nature and character of the gospel, I accord to him a sincere and candid spirit. He impresses the reader in that way and one can not help admiring the evident honesty of his attempts to replace the gospel with something he thinks is better.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

Why I Am Not a Suffragette

BY AN OHIO WOMAN.

If a man does one thing extraordinarily well he is called a success. The reason there are no more women inventors is obvious. To be ranked as a woman of the highest type one must be a faithful mother, a wise counsellor, a competent house-keeper, an agreeable leader in society. She cannot concentrate along one line but must to a certain extent, be diffusive. Most important things are accomplished more effectively by a few qualified persons than by the crowd. The ballot is of no service to those who know not how to use it. Could there be an educational qualification for the privilege of voting many objections to women voting would disappear but why enlarge a privilege which is already too large? We are unable to deny that certain important duties devolve upon women; they cannot escape them. Equally important duties devolve upon men. The one is made the interested observer of the other's work. Each work is incomplete without the other. It is vain to question which is the greater work, neither is great without the other and each to be perfect requires individual concentration.

Motherhood.

It is not in the busy marts of trade nor amid political harangues that women are best fitted for motherhood. It is not so much a larger American population we need as a better one. Women of refinement, education, wealth must esteem it a duty and a great privilege to transmit all these to another generation. Anything which tends to lead the thought of the best women away from a path of honor marked out for them cannot serve the highest good of society. There is a large field open to intelligent women in teaching their less fortunate sisters how to value and how to use motherhood. In the course of evolution we have a different 20th century child from that of a former age. We must meet him with different methods. We cannot control him but must teach him the far more difficult thing to control himself; must teach him the universal law of obedience, a law he must learn that applies to all both old and young. The mother must meet every act of disobedience with a loss. No threats but a definite loss which the child can perceive. After obedience should come the carefully thought out reward, some little pleasure well worth while. The child thus slowly learns the great underlying plan of God's government. The foundation is laid of an upright character.

Social Duties.

Then comes the great duty of woman to society to make it attractive, to wisely establish requirements for admittance therein, to tactfully win the weak. In all these paths there is a power far beyond any political force. We may have seemed to be writing only of married women. We do not hesitate to affirm that marriage is the normal state of woman and that any course which would tend to lead them away from this is to be deprecated. To the single woman, society offers the same claims as to the married. There are no laws which do not bear heavily on some shoulders, but they are best lightened not by fighting but by educating their makers to a higher standard of justice and kindness. Woman's work is the more enduring in that it lies at the foundation of the whole structure: but it is all one work. If each does his own part and each encourages the other, seeking divine guidance, there will arise a republic that cannot be shaken. Let us work then side by side comforting and advising one the other. It is good for men to extend courtesies to women. It is good for women to receive them graciously. In the matter of school legislation it would seem that women should have a voice for they are the more intelligent directors of the children, but here there can be a division of labor, the woman taking the visiting, the men the executive part.

Summary.

Thus here are my reasons for not being a suffragette. First: women already have work assigned them which they cannot delegate to men. Secondly: the ballot seems to imply separate interests and gives an opportunity for differences which ought not to exist. Third: woman's indirect influence on the ballot is greater than her direct influence can be. If women will stay in and work to their utmost the paths to which they have an undoubted right splendid results will follow and many stars will be in their crowns.

Mrs. Harrison's Response

The above article has been sent to this department. It is written with conviction and ability. It is unfortunate, however, that the term "suffragette" is used, because in most people's minds it stands for methods of violence, which have never been used, or even endorsed, in this country. It is an open question whether militant methods advance the cause in England, where conditions are different from what they are here; there has never been any movement to resort to them in our land—there seems to be no use for them. The gains that have been made, full suffrage in six states, limited suffrage in more than thirty, have been accomplished by the written and the spoken word—and so far, the pen has been mightier than the sword, and the tongue than any form of violence.

A few weeks ago, Mrs. Robert La Follette, one of the officers of the National Woman's Suffrage Association, came out in a written statement, expressing her disapproval of any use of force in the suffrage campaign; and a leading New England suffragist, Mrs. Florence Howe Hall, daughter of Julia Ward Howe, spoke against militant methods in a recent address before a great audience. It is to be wished, then, that the term suffragist had been used, rather than suffragette, because it carries with it no latent endorsement of such methods.

The arguments against woman suffrage in this article are presented under two subtitles, Motherhood and Social Duties. The trend of thought seems to be, that because the home, the family, and the social life of the race are committed to women, therefore they should confine themselves exclusively to those lines of activity, and leave all public and political duties to men.

From what different angles of vision people may look at the same subject! If I were going to write a plea for woman suffrage, I should use as my main argument, the responsibility of women to home and to society!

Homes are no longer isolated and independent places, as in more primitive days, but under modern conditions there is the closest interdependence between home and city. All the essentials for health and sanitation and comfort in the modern home lead us straight to the city hall; the electricity with which we light our houses, the gas with which we heat them, the telephone by which our daily orders are given, our water supply, our sewage disposal—all work under franchises or contracts within the gift of our city fathers. The taxes we pay on those homes are disbursed by our municipal officers; if we want streets or sidewalks constructed or repaired, if we wish nuisances removed, we must go to them to have it done.

The purity of our milk supply, on which the very life of the babe in our arms depends, is regulated by city ordinances, in regard to dairies as well as dealers. The meat we buy, the food we eat, may be so adulterated, that we might say with the prophet, "There is death in the pot," unless our state and nation, as well as our city, framed and executed pure food laws.

Not only the sanitation and food supply of our homes lead us straight to the city hall and national capital, but the education of the child brings us into the very heart of politics. Was there ever a more unreasonable proposition put up to mothers, than to say to them, on the one hand,

"Woman, it is your glorious privilege to bear and rear children——"

And on the other,

"At the age of six, these children must be taken from you, and put into public schools in the management of which you have absolutely no voice."

The fact that already in twenty-nine of our states women have school suffrage, shows that the majority of our people have reached the conclusion that it is the logical duty and privilege of the mothers of the race to share in the control of the schools where their children are educated.

And is not the moral atmosphere of our homes affected by the ideals that obtain in the government of our cities? If people of dishonest, immoral lives are honored with places of trust, if a low ethical standard prevails in the execution of its laws, a premium is put on immorality and dishonesty that will be a fatal poison to high ideals of conduct in every home and family in the city. In a certain town, the women took a leading part in a mass meeting to protest against a great public scandal. One of the daily papers admonished them that the home was woman's kingdom, and they had better keep their fingers out of public affairs. The women reported that just because the home was their kingdom, therefore they must be on the alert for its protection and purity, and that public evil, condoned and unrebuked, was a mortal thrust at the integrity of every home in the city.

So the very fact of motherhood, and of the pre-eminence of home duties, makes it imperative on woman that she should be vigilant and active in defending both child and home from harm. I maintain that the simplest, the most straightforward means of home protection, under modern conditions, is the expression of one's own convictions at the ballot box; it is more dignified, and therefore more womanly, than trying to influence some one else to vote your views; that involves asking a favor—and the highest price any self-respecting person can pay for a thing, is to ask for it!

Our friend takes the social duties of woman as the second reason for denying her the right of suffrage. I assume that by the term social duties she does not mean merely the usual round of society functions, pleasant and profitable as they are, but would include in it the whole field of social service. Social life, in the parlance of today, means all the life outside the home—not only the mingling with our friends for uplift and amusement, but the personal touch with any whom we may have the opportunity to serve. I regret that the limits of this page does not permit an extended treatment of this phase of the question, for to many noble minds here is the conclusive argument for woman suffrage. There are many women, of ample means, with husbands and fathers to stand between them and the world, who have had no experience of the injustice of their relations to the state; the appeal for suffrage comes to them through the woman less happily placed (and the overwhelming majority of women belong to that class!) who stands face to face with unjust laws, and has no one to fight her battles.

We find the great field of social life about us even more intimately connected with government than the home. The progress made by women in education, in industries, the larger social freedom they enjoy, have brought with these blessings many problems and wrongs. Senator La Follette, in a recent address, gave the seven millions of wage earning women in our land as his reason for believing in woman suffrage.

The young girl, exposed by new conditions of life to dangers that we older women never faced, needs every safe-guard that law and society can throw around her; the white slave traffic feeds and fattens on helpless and unprotected young womenhood; her own sex should be fighting her battles for her—and here again, woman suffrage is her most effective weapon. And not only the commercial aspect of vice that we call the white slave traffic, but the whole hideous system of the social evil will be nearing a solution when women have a share in making and executing the laws.

would take more controversial skill than he possesses to overcome so great a handicap as he has imposed upon himself."

A Statement by Charles S. Medbury

My dear Brother Morrison:—Your use of my name in your issue of Jan. 18 is wholly unwarranted and I protest against it. The shift from Brother Sweeney's challenge to your own setting forth of the issues, rather involves than excuses you.

The Christian Century in no sense speaks for me in these matters and while it may not mean much to others, it does mean much to me, to have my name used in its columns in a way to indicate the support of a propaganda with which I have no sympathy whatever. Pleasant personal relationships must not be allowed to constitute a bar to this frank expression for which I ask space in your coming issue. Very sincerely yours,

Des Moines, Ia. CHAS. S. MEDBURY.
January 18, 1912.

Mr. Morrison's Reply

My dear Brother Medbury: Yours of the 18th inst., was received. I regret to discover how completely you have misconceived The Christian Century's statement. We distinctly and emphatically disowned using your name "in a way to indicate the support of a propaganda" with which you might have no sympathy. The last words of our article, as you will note, specifically state that "these names have not been set down as endorsing 'us' or 'our views' or our 'assumptions.'"

It would be nothing less than effrontery to cite you or any of our brethren as endorsing "us" or our "propaganda," whatever that may mean. Brother Combs hit it off pretty well in his reported remark at Santa Cruz, when he said that "it would require a million and a quarter of religious weeklies to represent us all."

But there are certain structural and historic convictions which all Disciples share in common, which make the very substance of our thinking and our plea. The Christian Century may, no doubt does, differ from you and from many others in some points. But in these structural convictions I am sure we do not differ.

I think that Brother Sweeney's communication undermines every distinctive ideal which the Disciples cherish. I tried, therefore, to state positively, plainly and in the most catholic spirit, certain convictions of the Disciples, those, namely, which were involved in the correspondence with Brother Sweeney and which I believe our representative brethren everywhere will affirm.

In doing so there was no "shift" of the issue. Every alleged "assumption" with which Brother Sweeney charged us was included in these affirmations. It would have been impossible to cite any of our brethren who would "endorse our assumptions." Had we used your name as endorsing anything expressed in those terms, we would have deserved your resentment. The plain course and the only justifiable course was for us to lift the issues out of the dust of our discussion with Brother Sweeney and re-state them in definite propositional form. The issues were lifted out of the controversial form; they were not shifted.

I do not wish to argue the case with you nor try to persuade you of any position held by The Christian Century. I am gravely concerned lest I have done you injustice. This I earnestly assure you will cause me great regret. Your vague words about my being "involved" rather than "excused"—if by those words you mean that I am guilty of moral wrong or personal insensitiveness I will be truly grateful for you to point out in what respect, and will be prompt to make reparation by public apology. And if you will indicate in what point or points our six affirmations misrepresent your own convictions I shall be equally prompt to set your specific denial before our readers. Only you must not ask us to take into print a denial of something which we have not attributed to you at all! If we have misrepresented you, my chagrin and regret will only be surpassed by the genuine shock at discovering that you doubt or deny any of the affirmations which I so confidently attributed to you.

May I not ask you to read again our precise words? I am sure you will not feel like taking exception to them. With sincere affection,

Jan. 23. CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

Further Letter from Dr. Medbury

My dear Brother Morrison: Yours of the 23rd in response to mine of the 18th reached me last evening. I prepared a telegram in response but a second thought made it clear that, owing to your delay, there would be no chance of reaching you before this week's issue and so I withheld the message.

I am going to say frankly, Brother Morrison, that I think you should have given my letter place in your columns this week. I did not write you without noting, carefully, al your qualifications as to the use of the name that appeared in your issue of the 18th. I was perfectly clear to me that you evade every technical responsibility. To my thinking, however, this does not alter the fact tha you were wholly unwarranted in quoting th names as you did. The effect would naturally be, in spite of all your limitations, to lin us up as a part of the Century constituenc in relation to issues involved. We mus either suffer the embarrassment of allowin that to be so, when with me it is not at a true to the facts, or else we must bear th burden of a public disclaimer. It was a bol thing to put any men in such a position an I count it a real injustice. You surely mus see that the citation of a long list of name at the conclusion of an extended debate coul but be taken by the general reader as indi cating the support on the part of those me of your own positions in the general swee and swing of the argument.

Now, Brother Morrison, speaking personal ly, I am perfectly satisfied that you know and have known all the time, that I am no in sympathy with your positions. I fee therefore, that you did wrong in presumin so to state the question as to give to anyon the thought that in your series of article you had had my support. My name in th list may mean little or nothing to those wh see it there, but it means everything to m to have the one name for which I am a countable to God, used only in those way and places, where, in my own prayerful judg ment, I determine that I wish it to stan Again I ask you to show me the courtesy granting space in your next week's issue fo my first letter. If it is then your pleasu to quote your letter in response, you wi please also give place to this word. Beyon that I have nothing to say and nothing t ask. I have no thought of entering into discussion but I am certainly within bound when claiming the right to direct the use my own name. Very sincerely yours,

January 25, 1912. Chas. S. Medbury.

The Christian Century's Com ment

The Christian Century would rather err b doing injustice to itself than by running chance of doing an injustice to Dr. Medbur To publish his denial of something we di not attribute to him and which no disin terested reader would gather from our word is for The Christian Century to do itself i justice. Had Dr. Medbury indicated in wha respect we had misrepresented him, or tha our statements were not true to his unde standing of the Disciples' conviction, it woul have been our duty humbly to apologize fo our error. But he takes no exception to th plain definite things we did say on behalf o the Disciples, and which we said he and half-hundred other representative men whos names we gave, would endorse.

What these statements were we may briefl repeat here. We affirmed (1) that th Disciples believe that Presbyterian, Congre gationalist and Methodist churches ar churches of Christ, (2) that the members o these churches are members of the Church o Christ, (3) that the Disciples know of n other way of admission into the Church o Christ except by being baptized into it, (4 that Disciples believe that baptism as ad ministered by these churches actually induct men into the Church of Christ, (5) that Dis ciples do not believe that baptism is a phys cal act, and (6) that immersion only shoul be practiced in the administration of baptis as a loving testimonial to Christ and a mean to Christian unity.

It was in respect to these specific affirma tions concerning Disciple opinion that w referred to Dr. Medbury for endorsement. No other views of ours were involved. Questions of theology, of biblical criticism, and of the practice of Christian union about which there is difference of opinion amongst us were not included in these affirmations, nor were they involved in the "sweep and swing" of the discussion with Dr. Sweeney.

It was farthest from our purpose to "line up" this list of over fifty men "as a part of the Century constituency" whatever Brother Medbury can mean by that. To impute to us such a purpose becomes ridiculous as soon as the personnel of the list is examined.

The list was selected almost at random, and would be described by any one as "conservative."

We had no more hesitation in appealing to Dr. Medbury—or any representative Disciple—in support of these specific affirmations than we would have in calling upon him to support a declaration that the Disciples believed in the divinity of Christ, or in chronicling a piece of news in connection with Dr. Medbury's church in Des Moines. These are not partisan issues. They are fundamental to the Disciples' whole enterprise. Dr. Sweeney's views do not represent the Disciples. They do not represent Dr. Medbury. Whatever is to be said about other views advocated by The Christian Century these six theses affirmed by us do represent the Disciples and we find not a hint in Dr. Medbury's letters to indicate that they do not represent him also.

We believe that had he not misapprehended our language, he would have joined his voice with the host of others who have already written us decisively approving our repudiation of a position which excludes from the Church of Christ all save those whose baptism was administered by immersion.

A Statement from W. F. Richardson

Dear Bro. Morrison:—My attention has been called to the fact that you have used my name, with those of other pastors, in The Christian Century of January 18, as endorsing your six "statements" on the question of the validity of the practice of other religious bodies in sprinkling infants and adults, as Christian baptism. Permit me to say that I disagree with you in that position, and hold, as I ever have held, that the only baptism taught in the New Testament, or that the Church of Christ is authorized to administer, is the immersion of a penitent believer in Jesus Christ; and that the surest and shortest way to accomplish Christian unity is for the people who adopted that as their special mission in the world to adhere to their heretofore uniform practice, and continue to build up congregations which shall be, to the divided church and the alienated world, an object lesson of faithful obedience to the great Head of the Church, in the matter of his appointed ordinances. I can see no possible result of the continued agitation of this question among our churches than increasing alienation and bitterness among brethren.

Kansas City. W. F. RICHARDSON.

[The above communication comes from W. F. Richardson at the moment of going to press, with the request that it be published in this issue. This we are glad to do, without comment, save to call his attention and that of our readers to the fact that The Christian Century has not affirmed and does not hold that "the practice of other religious bodies in sprinkling infants and adults" is valid Christian baptism. With the remainder of Mr. Richardson's statement concerning the practice of immersion we are in virtual accord.—[The EDITORS.]

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. At Macomb, where Allen T. Shaw has been pastor for only a few months, there were ten additions to the church at regular services on Sunday, January 14.

District Worker J. D. Williams is holding a revival meeting at Ray. There have been nine additions, with six of these by baptism. There is a growing interest in the meeting.

E. U. Smith concluded a meeting at Windsor the middle of January, which resulted in five additions. The meeting lasted for only two weeks.

Centralia, Ill., is moving to the front, with Leroy Huff as their genial and efficient minister. Chas. E. Smith recently addressed a men's banquet there.

Waynesville Church, where F. L. Davis labors, had forty-nine additions last year and the church raised for missions and current expenses $2,084.

J. Newton Cloe, pastor at Mt. Pulaski, began last Sunday a revival meeting for his home congregation, with the assistance of a singing evangelist.

In a meeting which continued for twelve days at Allenville, conducted by Major Griffith and wife, there were twenty-nine additions and the congregations are much too large for the house.

The treasurer of Benton Church, John Davidson, reports that Benton church closed the last year's record with all bills paid. Theo. F. Hall is their minister and is a worker.

R. L. Cartwright and the church at Greenview are having the assistance of C. L. Organ and wife in a revival, with four additions near the outset of the meeting, and an increasing interest.

The church at Elkville is without a pastor since the resignation of W. F. Mott, who is leaving to accept a call to a congregation in Mississippi.

The most recent report from the meeting at East Side Church, Decatur, showed a total of fourteen additions, with the meeting to continue several days. The evangelists are Hill and Knowles.

Victor Dorris, who has not for some time been doing the work of an evangelist, is reported to be holding a meeting for Fourth Church, Danville, our youngest congregation in that city.

North Salem, Ind., has borrowed one of our best Illinois men, R. H. Robertson of Shelbyville. Mr. Robertson was twice pastor at DuQuoin and is greatly beloved by those who know him.

The church at Rossville is having merited success under the ministry of D. D. Dick. The present building is to be repaired soon, and the congregation is now busy liquidating its indebtedness on the parsonage.

J. J. Harris has closed his services with the church at Tamaroa and the church at Friendship, not far away, takes that part of his time. Friendship Church was recently reorganized by Brother Harris and is now doing nicely.

The congregation at Pekin, where O. C Bolman preaches, is not privileged to meet in its own edifice, on account of damage which was done recently by fire. Probably not before the last of February will it be repaired and ready for occupancy.

The pastor at DeLand, George W. Wise, has resigned and will be ready for a new pastorate the first of May. During his pastorate the congregation has built an extensive addition to the church edifice, which cost more than $4,000, and during the year the congregation raised $6,700.

Watseka Church, where Elmore Sinclair ministers, raised for all purposes last year $3,746. The pastor officiated at thirty-eight funerals and twenty-nine weddings, and there were added to the church sixty-three. Mr. Sinclair is on his fourth year as pastor of this church.

B. L. Wray, of Kansas City, with the assistance of J. J. Bell and Mrs. C. F. Oliver, is in a union revival meeting at Flanagan with large numbers of people hearing them nightly. There were twenty-four additions near the first part of the meeting. Mr. Wray is an evangelist in the employ of The American Christian Missionary Society. The pastor at Flanagan is E. E. Hartley.

Du Quoin has recently become a Living Link for Eureka College besides having made an offering to Moninger Memorial Bible Chair in Bethany College. A Brotherhood has been organized with over forty men on charter list and enthusiasm prevails. Increase of men at Sunday-School and other services is noticeable. One baptism recently.

At First Church, Springfield, C. W. B. M. Day was celebrated January 21. The annual address was delivered by Charles T. Paul, of the Missionary Training School of Indianapolis. A large company of people listened to Mr. Paul's address, more than an hour in length, with profound interest. Mr. Paul has the stateman's point of view of the missionary enterprise. He used China as the basis of his address to reveal the commercial, social, political, and educational effect of missions, in addition to the transforming power of the gospel on human life among the heathen. His own brief experience in that country afforded unusual illustrative material, and his modest but forceful platform manner, with a very obvious religious bearing, gave unusual impressiveness to every utterance of the speaker. Not in many a day has a missionary speaker addressed one of the Springfield churches with a more cordial and responsive hearing. The National C. W. B. M. is most fortunate in having such a man in its employ for the Training School, and the entire Brotherhood is to be congratulated for a man of such breadth and scholarship to mingle with and represent us among the missionary leaders in other denominations.

W. F. Mott, who has done such a splendid work at Elkville, has just gone to Tupelo, Miss. He stayed for the annual roll call at his old field. It was a most enjoyable affair, bringing friends and old-time neighbors back home for recreation and spiritual profit. Speeches by W. F. Mott, C. W. Freeman, C. E. Smith and Brother A. K. Adcock gave one of his delightful scripture recitations as a fitting close of the speech making.

In the revival meeting at West Side Church, Springfield, in which the pastor is assisted by J. M. Rudy, there had been nine additions up to the middle of the third week. The congregations have been steadily increasing since the modification of the weather. Mr. Rudy has spoken to a large company of union men at the Y. M. C. A., and several times at noon-day shop meetings. Without exception, his messages are being most cordially received.

F. B. Thomas and his church at Mattoon are planning for a new building to properly care for the large congregation and Sunday school at that place. The present plans look toward the building of a structure to cost about $40,000, which will enable carrying forward certain institutional features. This church last fall had a large revival meeting held by its pastor, in which more than a hundred persons were brought into the membership of the church.

Reports indicate that Christopher church progresses steadily under the enthusiastic leadership of W. O. S. Cliffe and wife. Du Quoin Church clerk frequently transfers members to the Christopher jurisdiction and frequently gets members from their bailiwick. This illustrates how all churches would make up for their losses by removal, did they establish churches wherever practicable throughout their district and would conserve a great number for service and their ultimate salvation.

H. H. Jenner, whose resignation from Stuart Street Church, Springfield, was noted in last week's Christian Century, has accepted a call to Long Point church, one of the strongest churches among the smaller towns in the state. He will begin his work in the new pastorate the first Sunday in February. Mr. Jenner goes to his new field from an experience in the city and the small town, and with an ideal for the church which is bound to make him an effective factor in helping to solve some of the problems of the country church, being stressed for solution among the leading denominations today.

At First Church, Springfield, the congregation last year received offerings amounting to $7,920 for all purposes, of which amount $2,189 was for missions and benevolence. There were thirty-five additions to the membership. The new edifice now under process of construction will be dedicated the first of May. The interior is now being finished, windows being placed, plastering done, and the ceiling wood-work almost completed. The pastor is F. W. Burnham.

A reception, in honor of the tenth wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. Edgar D. Jones, was held in the parlors of First Church, Bloomington, recently. The church parlors were beautifully decorated, and refreshments were served in the dining room. The pastor and his wife were assisted in receiving by members of the official board and their wives. During the afternoon, from two to six, it is said that over fifteen hundred guests were received, among which were all the ministers and their wives, including—let it be reported quietly—a Jewish rabbi and several priests of the various Catholic parishes. A tin box, containing $128 in silver, was presented to the popular minister and wife. On the box was the following inscription:

To help the celebration
Of this ten years' blest relation,
And to make it somewhat happier than Otherwise might have been,
Your entire congregation,
To show their appreciation,
Are handing you this little box of tin.

Clyde Darsie has been pastor of Central Church, Jacksonville, for only a few weeks. The annual report of this church for last year showed that more than $10,000 was raised for all purposes, of which amount $2,335 was for missions and benevolence. The congregation had in its treasury $355, after all bills were paid. There is an indebtedness on the building of only $1,500, part of which is provided for. During the last year there were sixty-one additions to the church, all of whom were received during the regular services. The Sunday-school has an average attendance of 411, and a South Side Mission is conducted, which had an attendance of 35. It is questioned if the record of this church, for the proportion of its membership enlisted in bearing the financial obligations, can be exceeded or even duplicated by the larger churches of our brotherhood. The report shows more than one thousand contributing members. A foreign missionary meeting will be held in this church February 23 by Secretary E. W. Allen, H. P. Shaw, and Dr. Hedges.

Secretary's Letter.

J. E. Stout is having a fine meeting at Odin. There were twenty-eight added up to the 21st, and the house crowded. The church will be reorganized and a preacher employed.

J. D. Williams closed a good meeting at Ray with sixteen additions; men's class organized and officers elected. The Sunday School reached almost a hundred.

Evangelist C. L. Organ is assisting R. L. Cartwright in a meeting at Greenview. We will look for great results.

G. W. Morton reports four additions on a recent Lord's day at Beardstown and the work moves on.

Major Griffith held a fine meeting at Allenville, thirty-four up to the 18th. He will begin a meeting at Etna the 28th. He is enthusiastic for the Front Rank movement.

The Irwins are in a meeting at Emden and the crowds are very large. The business houses are closing at 7:00 each evening which never was done there before.

The Yeuell meeting at the Centennial Church, Bloomington, is getting under good headway and there were a number of additions Sunday.

The following churches have lined up for the Front Rank standard since last report: Rock Island, Mulkeytown, Belle Plain, Howett St., Peoria, Catlin, Dahlgren, Allenville, Carmi, Kankakee, Sheldon, and Ancona. These all say they will make a heroic effort to reach the standard. The effort is sure to arouse new interest and result in good.

Rev. E. W. Allen, who resigns secretaryship of Foreign Society to become pastor of Central Church, Decatur.

We understand E. W. Allen has accepted a call to the Central church, Decatur, to begin March 1.

J. T. Alsup, of Vienna, slipped over into Missouri and held a good meeting at New Hampton with 36 additions. He served this church for seven years and it was most pleasant to renew old acquaintances.

Sorry to learn that the church building at Camp Point burned to the ground on the 13th. Bro. Reynolds says they will build a modern house soon as the weather will permit. He is not at all discouraged. In the long run it will prove to be a blessing in disguise.

T. A. Lindenmeyer of Salem is in a meeting at Kinmundy with good prospects.

A. O. Hargis writes that the Lord is greatly blessing his work at West Point—fifteen additions in the last six weeks.

The church at Deer Creek has asked L. H. Hooe to remain with them another year and he has accepted. They are planning some big things and if their plans carry we will look for splendid results. He has great audiences every Sunday.

C. R. Piety is encouraged with the outlook at Sheldon. He says they will soon be a "Front Ranker."

Bro. Jas. G. Brayfield of Sunfield is doing some good work among several weak churches in Perry county. There is a great need of men to do that kind of work and we wish Brother Brayfield every success.

The church at Brownstown recently set apart to the ministry Brother Sherman Weathery and he is ready for work. Call him.

C. W. Cummings of Knoxville has accepted a call to Ipava to begin Feb. 11.

L. A. Chapman gives a cheery report of the work at Carmi. They have paid $1,000 on their church debt and have another $1,000 almost ready. That will leave only $1,000, and they are determined to raise that this summer.

Good meetings are in progress at Clinton and Le Roy.

Roby Orahood of Cooksville is available for preaching points within reach of his home town. He is in business but will preach regularly if there is a demand for his services. Call him.

It is a very encouraging thing to us that so many churches have, just in the last few weeks, written us making inquiries concerning preachers they think of employing. With our extensive records which we have been gathering for a dozen years our office is exceptionally well prepared to give information concerning men, and churches as well. Write us freely concerning preachers and churches.

And we do need that offering for state missions. Look after it soon as possible, please. Make it as large as you can, too. You know the success of our work depends upon the funds entrusted to this cause. Let us hear from you with a check. That counts.

J. Fred Jones, Field Secretary.

Eureka College

Acting President A. C. Gray has supplied several Sundays for the Central Christian Church of Decatur. The church has been without a minister since the departure of Brother O. W. Lawrence.

Eureka always has a splendid lecture course. By working the thing thoroughly, we are able to offer course tickets for $1.00. The third number of our annual lecture course will be January 30. The Schubert Quartette will furnish a high grade musical entertainment.

Mrs. Ella S. Stewart, of Chicago, will deliver the Founders' Day address for Eureka College this year. Founders' Day is Feb. 6. At this time also a reception will be given President C. E. Underwood.

President Chas. E. Underwood will deliver the Education Day address in Eureka the first Sunday in February. Education Day has been postponed on account of the special ten days' campaign of Miss Miner in Eureka, February 1-10.

Saturday evening, January 20, Eureka had one of the best musical entertainments that has come our way for some time. It was given by Theobaldi, assisted by Miss Keller, pianiste, and Mrs. Weaver, soloist. In the introduction to the public we find the following words of commendation of Theobaldi: "Theobaldi, Chamber Musician to the Imperial Families of Russia, Sweden and Denmark, and appearing by royal command before King Edward, Emperor William II, and King Humbert of Italy, has been signally honored by the courts at which he has played. Of sixty-two gold medals and court decorations, however, he values none more highly than that of the Order of Osirius which was bestowed by King Humbert of Italy. This decoration consists of the Italian crown in gold, replete with diamonds from which a jeweled cross of gold and enamel is pendant. Despite its great intrinsic value Theobaldi treasures it chiefly for the associations it recalls; he having been presented with it at the close of the great Roman Congress in 1896."

The Eureka College basket ball team played with the team from Lincoln College of Lincoln, Ill., in our gymnasium recently. Our boys lost the game by only two points.

The debating team of Eureka College is making very thorough preparation for the debate with Bradley Polytechnic Institute of Peoria some time soon. A debate was held with this institution last year. If our boys do not win, they will at least make it interesting for their opponents.

It is too early to tell what Education Day will mean for Eureka College this year, but reports from various sources have given us encouragement in the matter. We are especially urging the Living Link this year. Last year we had nine Living Links. This year we expect to have at least twelve. Miss Miner has already reported five Living Links, four of which are new.

One of the encouraging features of the attendance in Eureka College this year is the noticeable increase in the college proper. We have the largest Freshman class we have had for years. In the changing educational conditions we feel we are better prepared to meet the issues than we have ever been.

It has been the custom of the Senior class in Eureka College each year, for several years, to establish a memorial of some character. The class this year has acted wisely. Our athletic park needs a complete overhauling. The Senior class has this work in hand. Already $250 has been raised and deposited in the bank. This will not complete the work, but others will help out. It is more important to start a big thing and inspire others to complete it than it is to complete a small task. We expect before commencement as a result of this movement by the Senior class, to have our athletic park in good shape.

We are constantly spending money on Lida's Wood, our girls' home. But one thing that has handicapped us in this matter is that we have been compelled to pay $32.50 a month out of the room rent on building and loan. The building and loan was paid off a few days ago and from now on this money can go into the improvement of the Wood. There are some other movements looking toward refurnishing and otherwise improving the wood. It will only take a small amount of money to have everything in A 1 shape.

In the last news letter we reported the endowment of Eureka College a little less than it should be. After all debts were paid and the money given to endowment was turned over to the endowment and investment committee, we discovered that we had an even $170,000 in our permanent endowment fund. H. H. Peters.

This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition has just been issued to meet the great demand. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. Last Year's Record Equalled in Three Months and a Half

It will be encouraging to our Bible-school workers to know that on January 18 the Bible-school offering for American Missions by $53.85 exceeded the total offering for this purpose made in the whole of last year. There are 1,642 schools that have sent offerings since October 1, 1911, of whom 779 sent a larger amount than last year, 275 a less amount, eighty-six the same and 502 are new schools. There are 972, or nearly a thousand schools, that sent an offering last year that have not yet been heard from. These and many others will help us during the months to reach the $40,000 mark necessary if we are to go to Louisville convention with all the work of the year done and paid for.

Twenty states have already exceeded last year's offering. North Carolina and Massachusetts have thus made the largest proportionate gains. Let every school send its American Mission offering promptly to Robt. M. Hopkins, American Bible School Superintendent, Carew Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Christian Fraternity India

O. J. Grainger arrived in India early in November and proceeded at once to Jubbulpore. He took charge of the work of the Press and Bible College during the absence of G. W. Brown, who was away on a committee appointed to work on the revision of the Old Testament in Hindi. Mr. Grainger will be located in Mungeli after the return of Mr. Brown to Jubbulpore.

On Sunday, December 24, 1911 the Indian Christians of the Christian, Wesleyan and Methodist Missions met for a united communion service. This is in line with the federation scheme that has lately been inaugurated. We were the guests of the Wesleyan Mission. There being no building large enough to accomodate the audience, the service was held out doors on some tennis courts. To the west were some fine trees which gave ample shade for the whole company to sit in comfort, even though the meeting began at three o'clock in the afternoon. The beauty of the spot added to the impressiveness of the occasion. The praise service was conducted by Dr. Felt of the Methodist Mission, the sermon was preached by O. J. Grainger of the Christian Mission and the communion was conducted by Mr. Gregory and Mr. Kay of the Wesleyan Mission. The service was such a success and the spirit of fellowship so fine that it is purposed to have such services at regular intervals. One missionary said that in all his experience of seventeen years as a missionary he had never seen such a service before. In reality it is the first time that the Christians of different missions in Jubbulpore have met for a united communion service. The only sad thing about the occasion was the fact that the Indian Christians of the Church of England did not join in the service. The church of England will not recognize as valid a communion service not conducted by a man episcopally ordained.

James Small in Des Moines

An old friend has returned to our city. The genial James Small is with us in a meeting in his old parish, the Capitol Hill Church (formerly East Side.) Fifteen years ago Brother Small held a meeting for the Capitol Hill Church and remained for years as pastor. His return is gladly welcomed by all our churches in the city. For herein is the secret of his ministry: the open-doored personality. He is a friend upon first acquaintance. He positively cannot remain a stranger. He is as frank as a child. Such is his own openness of soul that it invites the confidence of all. He knows the finest of the fine arts— how to make a friend and hold him. Other may glory in their fame or wealth or succes but James Small is above envy for he ha something worth more than any of these.

As an evangelist he is as unfettered b machinery as the Apostle Paul. If he is con scious of a "new evangelism" which has method and has forsaken its message he doe not betray it.

He is never critical of other evangelist Their success in making great reports doe not discourage him. He is aware doubtles that the ancient law of sowing and reapin applies here as elsewhere. He must kno that if he were willing to sow the sam methods he might have the same harvest. H must be conscious too that the harvest is no all wheat. Having become the pastor's bosom friend, he knows the heartache, the bitter di appointment that invariably follows a grea modern revival. James Small is not willin to pay that price. He will continue on hi happy mission of inspiring the saints an teaching the untaught and loving men int the kingdom. His type of evangelist look rather lonely in the evangelistic world, bu that does not make him the least sad or di consolate. No one thinks of commiseratin him on his lot.

What a rebuke a positive soul can be! N railing, no clamor, but the contrast makes it own protest. Hail to the man who can liv above the mechanical hubbub of his craft Hail to James Small! FINES IDLEMAN.

J. C. Ogden and Wife are Saf

It will be remembered that there has bee great anxiety about the safety of J. C. Ogde and wife and also Dr. Wm. M. Hardy of Ba tang, on the border of Tibet. They were com pelled to leave Batang October 12, on accoun of the political disturbances. The followin letter under date of November 22, the firs since the one of October 12, was received i the office of the Foreign Society January 23.

"Tali, China, November 22, 1912. Dea Brother McLean:—I wrote you at Batan October 12 telling you of our leaving for Ta in the Province of Yunnan (about 500 mile from Batang.) We are here safe afte thirty-one days of actual travel, besides de lays. The county is very unsettled an West China and Tibet are in bad state (o account of the war) and unsafe at presen Here soldiers are guarding every quarter an fighting is feared daily. The consuls hav sent us word here to withdraw to the coas and we are starting for Yunnan fu in a da or so. We are well, but these times try ou nerves. We live a day at a time. The onl thing for us to do is to take our furloug now. The Revolution will probably be ove by then. We trust we can reach the coas in safety. We shall be escorted by soldier and we feel there is not much danger. Ho we hated to leave Batang! It was a sa sad day.—(Signed) J. C. OGDEN."

They finally reached Shanghai, China, an December 22 they cabled as follows:

"You must detain Sheltons. Roads i most dangerous condition. Ogden leaving o the 25th by Japanese-San Francisco Line."

We have just received the following lette which is very gratifying and will caus great joy to the friends of the missionarie and especially relatives of J. C. Ogden an wife:

"S. S. Nippon-Maru, arriving at San Fran cisco the morning of the 18th of January My dear Brother Rains: Your kind letter o December 23 reached Honolulu and we re ceived it there. It was the first and onl letter we have had from America for severa months. Many, many thanks for your word of love. The good Lord only knows how w were privileged to get out safely and "mos thankfully" does not express our feelings.

"The brethren at Honolulu met us and gave a great welcome, a reception, and a place shore to stay one night. I did not know at we were so nearly worn out until I dertook to talk a little that night. The citement of it all was a little too much. I ll be compelled to say as little as possible out this escape until we are settled a little d rested some. People are inclined to ke a great deal of it and we can't stand much of that kind of thing just now. I n't care for too much publicity. We only e to do our duty, and that is all. We are ing to Los Angeles if possible and we must y there for a month or more. Considering erything, Mrs. Ogden has done well and s kept her head through much that is al- ost too horrible to relate. For this we are st thankful and we hope there will be no uble in the future. I am sorry we could t cable you sooner, but circumstances were ch that we could not. They would not take r telegrams in places and at other places had no money. With much love to all.— igned) JAS. C. OGDEN."

It seems from this letter that Dr. Hardy nained in China. We have not received l particulars.

The Foreign Society has never sent to the d two braver and truer missionaries than C. Ogden and wife. They left the little , six months old at the time of his death, eping beneath the wiry sod of Batang. s name was J. C. Ogden, Jr. The little l, Clara Ruth, about three years of age, s with them in the long and perilous jour- . It was a great hardship for the mother l child especially.

These missionaries went out from Nicholas unty, Ky. This is the home of their rents. The churches in the county, num- ing twelve, are preparing to tender them reat reception at Carlisle, the county seat. e churches of that county contribute liber- y to the work. The church at Norwood, io, supports Mrs. Ogden as their Living- nk. W. J. Shelburne is the minister.

The experiences of these soldiers of the ss ought to stir all our hearts and arouse to increased interest in the telling but zardous work they are doing for us under d. F. M. RAINS, Secy.

Notes From the Foreign Society

O. C. Cunningham, writing from Harda, dia, says, "Last Sunday I had the joy of eiving the confession of a bright young ndu. At the river yesterday another Hindu de the confession and the two were bap- ed. We are always hopeful and anxious, there are many adversaries."

O. G. Hertzog and Mrs. Hertzog are in dia visiting our mission stations. The mis- naries write that their presence has been ource of great comfort and encouragement them. Miss Newcomer of Iowa is also iting in India and is cheering the work- wherever she goes.

"We shall exceed last year. Columbus will se $1,200 for Tisdale Hospital, China."— G. TISDALE, Columbus, Ohio.

Payne Memorial Christian Church of Boze- n, Mont., will become a Living-Link, March This action has been unanimously decided l approved by both the board and the con- gation."—J. E. PARKER, Bozeman, Mont.

The Harlem Avenue Christian Church, Bal- ore, Md., becomes a Living-Link in the reign Society this year. W. E. Sweeney is pastor. It will be remembered that he is on of the late John S. Sweeney, who ached so long at Paris, Ky. Will E. eeney has wide vision. He knows the pel and loves it and wants the whole rld to hear and obey it. This advance step of the Harlem Avenue Church is most commendable.

There are 43 students in the college of the Bible at Lexington, Ky., that are preaching part or all of their time for churches round about and they serve all told 96 churches. All these churches may be depended upon for the March offering. The whole number of students in the College of the Bible is 255.

The First Church, Detroit, Mich., C. J. Tannar, minister, is one of the best missionary churches in our brotherhood. It supports four missionaries on the foreign field and gives as much to all missions as it spends on itself. Brother Tannar has been with the church about nine years and in that time two new churches have been planted in Detroit.

There are forty students in Drake University who preach for churches while they prosecute their studies. They serve 53 churches and they may be counted upon to do their part in enlisting these churches. Drake University is a mission center. Some of the best missionaries on the field went out from her walls.

W. R. Hunt, of the Foreign Society, writing from Shanghai, December 25, says: "I am on the field full of hope. The Red Cross is touched with love from Calvary. In Chuchow Doctor Osgood has done splendidly. My work was with the forces of the Revolutionary army. I was with them at the taking of Nankin. Scenes of carnage as well as deeds of love were found upon the battlefield. I saw sad life and it almost broke my heart. Why should war ever be! It is an inferno of blood and fire. Am in Shanghai spending Christmas in a smal lrented house with the family. It is scant and bare, but cheer is in our hearts. Oh, that the bells of peace may chime! All the missionaries have left Tibet."

It may not be known to many that President Sun of the Republic of China was born in the Hawaiian Islands and partly raised and educated there. Afterwards he attended college at Canton in southern China. Wm. C. Weedon of Honolulu, one of our faithful brethren, is of the opinion that a great work in Hawaii would be valuable for the spread of the simple gospel in China.

Last week the Foreign Society received $1,048.80 from the estate of the late John Hughes, Washington, Pa. The society should receive $1,000 every day from bequests alone. Remember this cause in your last will and testament.

Last week the Foreign Society received $150 from Miss Margaret Pugh for the support of Mrs. Justin E. Brown, Luchowfu, China. Miss Pugh sends $150 each quarter on this Living-Link. We are hoping to have many other personal Living-Links.

Now is the time to order March offering supplies and to prepare for a great March offering. Many words of cheer and encouragement are being received. Let every missionary church be in line March 3.

Miss Rose T. Armbruster reports four baptisms the last Sunday in December in Akita, Japan. She reports that the spirit of prayer is taking stronger hold in that church.

National Benevolent Association Items

Mrs. Philena Satterthwait, of West Liberty, Iowa, a long time friend of the association, has just gone to her reward. Sister Satterthwait was generous in her support of the work of the association. For years she held one of the association's annuity bonds for a goodly sum. This she leaves behind her to continue the good work while she is absent with the Lord.

Another sister who has formed the annuity habit has just sent the association her fourth gift. She is not a woman of large means, but she is a woman who has compassion upon the poor, and so she continues to lend to the Lord.

The graduating exercises of the training school for nurses of the Christian Hospital at Valparaiso, Ind., were held in the Christian Church on the evening of January 9th. President Brown, of Valparaiso Christian University, was master of ceremonies. Minister C. E. Hill, Dr. Loring, Miss Helen Brown, and the general secretary of the National Benevolent Association, all participated in the program. The young ladies composing the class had all taken the state examination and passed with a grade 20 per cent higher than the minimum required by law. At the time of their graduation they were in possession of state certificates. They are all members of the church. Our own people needing the services of a trained nurse will do well to communicate with Mrs. Nora Woodruff, superintendent of the Nurses' Training School, Christian Hospital, Valparaiso, Ind.

Two of our old preachers, Brothers Paine and Bell, are quietly waiting in the home at Jacksonville, Ill., for the call to the mansions in the skies. They both have served faithfully and well for many years in the gospel ministry, and are ripe for their reward.

While all of the homes of the association are doing unusually fine work, the home in St. Louis is making perhaps its best record. Besides a large family of children, a number of widows, mothers, are being given an opportunity to work for their support and their little ones. Thus is pure and undefiled religion being exemplified. There are a number of young babies in the home at this time.

The number of persons who make the Lord their heir increases. Two such have just died, making generous provision in their will for the care of the widow and the orphan in their affliction. Unfortunately in one case a strenuous effort is being made to set aside the will, with some prospects of success. Moral: Give your money on the annuity plan and thus avoid litigation among your heirs after death. In making a will for any department of the association's work the following form should be used: To The National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church, with headquarters at 2955 N. Euclid Ave., St. Louis, for (Mentioning the institution desired).

The Divinity of Christ

is the new work on religion by EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES which bids fair to be even more generally discussed than the same author's "Psychology of Religious Experience."

It is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says:

"Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Baptist World says:

This book is interesting, among other things, in that it rejects both Trinitarianism and Unitarianism. The author says, "Each alike accepts the underlying dualism, and without questioning its validity has chosen to champion opposite extremes." He contends that the who of Jesus is not to be decided by his human birth, but by his divine relations. An insidious, strong putting of the theology in the author's local atmosphere.

The Independent says:

"Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says:

"Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says:

"These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says:

"It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

CHICAGO

Observations

New York, city of high buildings, is fairly out-doing herself with her latest big structure, the fifty-five story Woolworth building erected by the ten-cent store man, at Broadway and Park Place. This building has been pretty generally described as the tallest building in the world. It will also be the handsomest structure of its kind in the country. Its style is a combination of the Italian, French and modern Renaissance schools of architecture, while the spires rising from the roof of the main structure, are Gothic. Straight lines are conspicuous in the plans and probably will give the building the appearance of a height even greater than its 750 feet. The tower, which will spring from the center of the Broadway facade, will add another twenty-six stories. Next to the Eiffel Tower in Paris, the Woolworth Building will be the highest structure ever erected. It will be fifty feet taller than the Metropolitan Tower, now the highest office building. According to the specifications of Cass Gilbert, who designed it, the Woolworth Building will contain more than 20,000 tons of steel girders, thirty-six elevators, 13,200,000 cubic feet of space, a swimming pool in the basement, an observation station in the tower, four self-contained stairways, and will cost more than $7,500,000. On the peak of the tower there will be a great electric light, visible for miles over the surrounding country.

At last the Florida East Coast Railway has opened its forty-six miles of extension across the water from Knights Key to Key West, a remarkable piece of railroad building. Henry Flagler, of New York, is given credit for completion of the engineering feat. It was Mr. Flagler, as president of the railroad, who overcame financial and physical obstructions, forcing the construction of a railway across the line of coral keys between the Florida mainland and Key West. For great distances between keys the rails are supported by stretches of steel and masonry.

John D. Rockefeller, Jr., who announced a few days ago that he had completed his two years' campaign to abolish "white slavery," will turn his attention to establishing a "bureau of criminalistic research." The bureau will aim at the improvement and ultimate reformation of the conditions under which women convicted in the criminal courts are compelled to serve the sentences imposed upon them. Mr. Rockefeller's plans are based on a scheme originated by Miss Katherine Bement Davis, superintendent of the state reformatory for women, at Bedford, N. Y. Miss Davis would have a number of buildings erected on a site as far away as possible from prison environment. Beginning with a small number of women convicted of crime, she would segregate them according to type, the vicious type in one class, the mentally defective in another class and so on. Trained pathologists and psychologists would make an individual study of the character, thoughts and habits of each woman. The disposition aimed at would be eventual parole.

January 13 closed the seven coldest consecutive days Canada has ever had. During them, the temperature varied from ten below to 30 below zero and was never higher, and in Winnipeg and northern points under the 40 below zero mark. This has meant suffering in the larger cities through the freezing of hot water furnace pipes, mains, etc., and unwise attempts to thaw them out have caused many fires.

It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all times must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Union of Baptists and Disciples

It is natural that after the years which have separated Baptists and Disciples, since first they worked together with a semblance of unity, there should emerge a growing interest in their union. It is inevitable that the Baptists and Disciples should increasingly consider the problem of union, since in so many regards they are closely related. This relationship does not depend upon the mere incident of immersion as an item in the practice of both bodies. Rather is that relationship to be seen in the general body of truth to which each yields assent, in the common form of organization which is characteristic of both, and in the common field of activities in which for the most part the two denominations are placed.

In earlier days this very closeness of relationship led to contests which were envenomed by proximity. It was the intimacy of religious beliefs and customs which made the few outstanding points of divergency questions of bitter discussion. Baptists and Disciples hated each other in those days with a bitterness which was wholly absent in the thought of either denomination regarding the rest of the Protestant world, or even the Roman Catholic.

But today the old controversies are dead. And it would be difficult to arouse in the intelligent representatives of either body in this generation the spirit of debate over doctrines and usages that were once the subject of eager rivalry. In fact it is doubtful if either Baptists or Disciples of average intelligence have any acquaintance with the subjects that were once the themes of antagonism. Such controversies as those regarding the priority of faith and repentance, the work of the Holy Spirit in conversion, the relation of baptism to the remission of sins, and the celebration of the Lord's Supper, would be impossible today, chiefly because neither communion has maintained its dogmatic and controversial position regarding these questions. And in most instances the debates grew out of a failure to properly define the terms employed.

Probably the most outstanding contrast between Baptists and Disciples grew out of the fact that the former did not share that flaming enthusiasm with which the Disciples of the first generation threw themselves against the romanticism of current religious teaching, and appealed to the Scriptures as the sole form of faith and conduct. It was the rejection of so much of the current teachings of that time in behalf of a literal interpretation of the Word of God which caused the Disciples to be interpreted as literalists and legalists, as over against the more emotional and ardent Christian experience of the older denominations, including the Baptists. If this tendency has persisted among the Disciples, it is perhaps because of the strong bent of their beginnings as protestants against the sway of emotion in the process of entrance upon the Christian life.

At the present time the centrifugal forces are spending themselves, and a return to closer unity is both desirable and inevitable. Whether or not we may wish it, Disciples and Baptists are drawing closer together, and in many communities are actually uniting. This is as it should be. It is truly anomalous that two bodies of people so closely related in history and beliefs should remain divided. In fact the differences between Baptists and Disciples as separate bodies are not greater than those seen between different congregations in both Baptist and Disciple ranks. In fact when both bodies are taken at their best, on the high levels of Christian intelligence and devotion, there is little perceptible difference.

Among the steps which may be taken to promote unity of sentiment, leaving the question of ultimate and incorporating unity to be decided by time, the following at least are timely and practicable.

The two bodies should coöperate most earnestly in all places where they have common existence. The old rivalries ought to be forgotten, and a spirit of comradeship cultivated that would lead to such active coöperation as to make the spirit of brotherhood apparent.

Wherever Baptists and Disciples have churches and there is not room for both, a union should be effected upon terms which will compromise the convictions of either group. And this ought not to be difficult where Baptists and Disciples are really aware of the historic testimony of the two denominations.

The exchange of ministers by the two bodies would be a step in the direction of ultimate unity. There is no reason why Disciples should not welcome to their pulpits ministers from the Baptists, nor why Baptists should not call to their pulpits preachers from among the Disciples. Such a practice would increasingly obliterate the resent lines of separation.

Common gatherings for exchange of opinions like the congresses to which both Baptists and Disciples are invited, would promote the same spirit of friendliness and intelligent regard. And that without compromise of any denominational interest.

It would be a misfortune if eager efforts at union should be the cause of strife in any locality. In some instances undue haste has undoubtedly been manifested in the effort to unite congregations of Baptists and Disciples. Nothing can be accomplished in this way. In fact such efforts only retard the day of final union.

But by the cultivation of mutual regard, by the careful study of the problem of union by the two denominations, either in their national and official capacity or as individual congregations, the spirit of union may be fostered, and the time hastened when these two peoples, historically and doctrinally so closely related, shall be one.

The Great Dream

"Dream the great dream, though you should dream—you only,
And friendless follow in the lonely quest;
Though the dream lead you to a desert lonely,
Or drive you, like the tempest, without rest;
Yet toiling upward to the highest altar
There lay before the gods your gift supreme—
A human heart whose courage did not falter
Though distant as Arcturus shone the gleam.
The gleam! Ah, question not if others did not see it,
Who nor the yearning nor the passion share;
Grieve not if children of the earth decree it—
The soul has need of prophet and redeemer,
Her outstretched wings against her prisoning bars,
She waits for truth; and truth is with the dreamer
Persistent as the myriad light of stars."

Social Survey

More Light on the McNamara Case

The McNamara case is proving to be the sensation of a decade in the labor movement. New developments continually appearing serve to keep the matter in the public prints and public interest agitated. We are reading the published charges of Detective Burns against President Gompers. We are noting that a case for bribery against Attorney Darrow has been instituted. The continual talk of going after men "higher up" is whetting our interest as to how much "higher up" it is going to be possible to go. President Gompers asserted that in recent months the membership in labor organizations has increased more rapidly than ever. We see no reason why this should not be so since it is not the principle of union labor that is on trial, but the question of leadership. We shall be disappointed, however, if there does not arise among the labor-unionists new leaders who shall demand thorough house-cleaning. The peril of all democracy is the peril of the labor union movement. There has been additional peril in this movement since its organization is not legal, but voluntary, and is not surrounded by any of the safe-guards that exist even in boss-ridden cities. It is not incredible to believe that many leaders have betrayed their trust. How many, we do not yet know. We must be in a state of suspended judgment with reference to all accused men until the courts have done their work. Meanwhile we hope no sickly sentimentalism of any sort will prevent vigorous legal action against any who are justly charged with a betrayal of a sacred trust in the ranks of labor. Every friend of labor should demand that treason against the labor cause should be punished.

Missions and Progress

One of the striking phenomena of the mission enterprise is the contribution that it is making to progress in the home church. The missionary is usually educated in the denominational school and goes out with all the fervor of a narrow denominationalist. He returns on his first furlough to tell all his old friends that his attitude on many questions has changed. A letter from a missionary to his father published in one of our journals recently is a case in point. The first thing the missionary experience does, is to exalt human problems over the dogmatic. The terrible suffering and misery of foreign lands everywhere so profoundly touches the human sympathies of the missionary that he gets to thinking in a new realm. In the second place, he is called upon through missionary comity to be the ally of men of other denominations. The smallness of Christianity beyond the sea, and its need of self-protection makes the old denominational shibboleth give way to the sense of universal Christianity. In addition to this, the hand to hand conflict with alien faiths begets a respect for these points of view that can never be had by the person at home who curtly dubs all other faiths than that of the Christian as "heathen." Thus the missionary is led out into a world view compelled by his experiences and his statesmanlike view of his task. This begins to react on the mission board. The home board is often puzzled by the strange and seemingly perverse progressiveness of those who left home with a stiff-backed orthodoxy. But at last the full force of the facts compels some readjustment upon the board. Then as the church becomes aware of these problems, the whole Christian community moves up to higher and broader ground out of the narrow valley of some purely sectarian view-point. The universities have been accused of being the mother of the progressive spirit. They have been to some extent. But no force working for progress has put the Church forward like world-wide missions. "The spirit of provincialism and the spirit of world-wide missions can never be congenial bed-fellows."

Union on the Mission Fields

Whatever excuse our denominationalism has upon its native soil, its importation to foreign lands is an absurdity that cannot command the defense of a single worthy protagonist. We cannot see the significance of a Methodist church, South, for China. We are unable to get much enthusiasm about the propagation of the Missouri synod of Lutherans in India. Divisions that have grown up over local, sectional or political issues have no place among people on the other side of the world. If we are to carry our quarrels to all the world, it might even have been better that we had never gone! In view of this, therefore, it is of deep significance whenever we see any signs of larger comity in the work of world-wide evangelization. Among the items of progress for the past year are the following: "The Conference of Federated Missions and the League for the Promotion of the Union of Christian Churches, are signs of the tendency in Japan. China has educational union in full swing at several important centers, such as Peking, Nanking, Tsinan-Fu, Wei Hsien, Teing-chowfu, Chentu and elsewhere, while a movement for federation is under way, to be inaugurated in each province in China. The Evangelical Union of South Africa was formed during the year. In India much has already been accomplished in uniting churches of similar polity and kindred creeds. In South Africa, a basis of union has been drawn up, to be submitted to the Baptist, Congregationalist and Presbyterian churches who are seeking to unite. On the Pacific coast, an interdenominational movement has been organized over into an Oriental Workers' Association for purposes of comity and coöperation in the care of over 100,000 living on the borders of the Pacific." These changes looking to the union of the work on the foreign field would move much more rapidly but for the unwillingness of the church at home to consent to them. The sectarian spirit has given vitality to many groups of Christians here in days gone by and sometimes a little group thinks the very future of Christianity depends upon the perpetuation of its tiny contention.

Insurgency in Religion and Politics

It is hardly possible to read now-adays without learning more of the "insurgents." We have usually connected this term with those Democrats and Republicans who stood for progress but wished to remain in the party. There is also an insurgency, less noisy perhaps, but equally determined, in all the denominations. The Catholic church, even, has to face the issue of "modernism" which might have been called "insurgency." Between all these groups of reformers there are certain great class resemblances. They are all giving a renewed emphasis upon the importance of human problems. The insurgent in politics would protest against obscuring the human questions of our age with the commercial questions. The insurgent in religion insists that the church shall give larger attention to human welfare and less attention to the maintenance of an ecclesiasticism. These insurgents are all marked by another common peculiarity. They wish to remain where they are and bear their witness. This is due to the social spirit of our age. Men are less willing to create divisions. The modernist does not wish to leave the Catholic church even though he is often as protestant as Luther. Republican insurgents get so near to the socialists in their political platform that it is hard to distinguish but they still wish to remain loyal republicans. It is to be remarked also that the methods employed by the insurgents in religion and politics are different from those employed by the agitators of progress in the past. There is argument in place of war. There is the experimental attitude in place of cock-sure dogmatism. This insurgency will test to the full the tolerance and breadth of mind of the leaders in politics and religion. There is no denying the insurgent has something new and different. He may he given the reward of the prophets of the past, or humanity may have shown itself so advanced as to cease stoning its prophets!

—President Taft has now equalled President Roosevelt's record for trust prosecutions under the Sherman law, the total number being forty-four.

A Call for Church Union in Canada

The following appeal from the Churchman will be of more than ordinary interest. With the Disciples a comparatively feeble folk in Canada, this searching call may not be as vital to them as to us on this side of the line. Incidentally, the history of the Canadian Disciples, should it ever be written, will show how much they have contributed to the cause of apostolic Christianity in men, and in heroic devotion to the cause itself. Canada has been a great field of heroism in the annals of the Disciples. What a pity that we have not been able to lead the movement in the direction of unity! But we can show ourselves sincere by entering into the ranks with others, and following the consecrated leadership which we know Canadian Christianity offers. There is a battle ground where convictions are tested, where testing is a delight, and where the last measures to be considered are those that have to do with compromise. For many years union has been more than a dream to the leaders of the historic creeds in Canada. Here is a worthy utterance of a far-seeing man, and an empire in which to work out this mighty problem:

Principal Gandier, of Knox College, Toronto, writing in The Globe of that city, makes an earnest plea to the Churches of Canada to avoid the mistake that was made in this country when the Churches of the East failed to recognize their call to the Western frontier as it advanced westward from the Alleghanies. "The Churches of the East missed their opportunity," he said, "in the formative period of these communities, and never since have they been able to secure the place and influence which might have been theirs. Not only have these communities suffered, but the nation also is suffering." Canada, half a century later, is facing a similar problem. It has not repeated the American mistake. It has carried westward the leaven of the Gospel. No one, he says, can read the reports of the synods and conferences in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia without a thrill of joy at such evidence of moral alertness and missionary aggressiveness. In good measure he would attribute this better record to the measure of union achieved more than a generation ago, which gave Canada one Presbyterian Church and one Methodist Church. Prejudices were then overcome; old world associations given up. There were then some noble Christians who felt that the faith of their fathers had been denied, but the movement, as all could now see, was of God. It began a new era of missionary effort and efficiency. Now, continued Principal Gandier, "the time has come for us to face the question of a larger union." In all the provinces, but especially in the north and in the west, "Methodists, Anglicans, Baptists and Presbyterians have their churches and their missionaries, where all receive help from home missions or augmentation funds and where one decent congregation, housed in one comfortable building and ministered to by one competent man would command the respect of the community and reach the men as all four do not. Even in Canada we are wasting money enough and men enough through dove-tailing and overlapping to evangelize a whole race of heathen. . . . With from 300,000 to 400,000 immigrants pouring into this vast country every year, the Church of Jesus Christ cannot afford to perpetuate conditions which waste men and money, discourage the hearts of our missionaries and turn aside young men of high spirit and broad outlook from the ministry. With the forces of evil organized as never before; with present day attacks not on the outworks, but upon the very citadel of the faith; with a home mission task greater than has ever been; with all nations open to the Gospel and calling not for a bewildering variety of sects but for a united Christendom to speak in the name of Jesus; with historical and national reasons no longer requiring division among us in this new world; surely it is time that there should be not only the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace, but unity of organized effort, and, so far as may be, unity of name."

The Ministry, Morals, and Murder

We all must have harbored the thought as we read of the degenerate Boston minister's crime, that the ministry and the cause of Christianity must suffer a serious blow. The faith of many, no doubt, in the honesty of purpose which the ministry affirms concerning itself, was shocked if not shattered by the astounding revelations of the crime. President Horr of Newton Theological Seminary in which the guilty minister was a student, in a masterly review of the events connected with this crime lays bare the responsibilities of the ministry in its sacred relationships to the families of the congregation. "The minister," he declares, "is more than a man among men. If he does not rise above other men in purity of thought and motive and conduct he is not fit to be a minister. You might as well say that it is not necessary for a naval commander to be more skillful in navigation than other men, or for a soldier to be braver than other men. The integrity of his moral life, the wholesomeness of his relation in every situation, are essential qualifications of a minister." The fact that the country is appalled at this minister's crime is evidence of a profound appreciation of the claims and work of the ministry. Better than any labored argument is the following picture which the Churchman has brought to our attention:

The New York Evening Mail, of Jan. 10, in a brief editorial article told of a group of young men in the smoking compartment of a Pullman car who were discussing the crime of a recreant minister, whose confession appeared in the morning papers. His moral collapse seemed to them to discredit all preachers of righteousness. When things were at their worst a quiet man who had been listening behind his paper, spoke up. "Hear this," he said, so the Mail editorial runs, as he put his finger on a modestly printed news item. "It is in the same daily news. A hardy bishop of Alaska reports that he has covered thousands of miles on snowshoes, with only an Indian guide. Mercury 70 degrees below zero often—generally 50 degrees below. This clergyman is physician to the sick Indians; he is dentist, he is adviser; he marries them, and buries their dead. He begins and ends all with the teachings of the Christian religion. Often he walks hundreds of miles on one trip. Often on his sledges he takes provision to the starving solitary miner's hut." "That's the kind that evens up!" broke in one young man. Every man echoed the statement. In a moment the whole sentiment that was slumping in social ruin, was changed. Men smiled as if in real relief. "Perhaps the worthy bishop, now in New York," the editorial concluded, "will be comforted to know that his heroic story, on the same page of the day's history with noisome treason to all virture, is like the 'salt of the earth.' It cures putrescence. He had no idea, no forecast, that the noble and sweet music of his Christian life was to be sounded in this great city on this precise day. But something always happens to prove that the virtue of mankind increases. There are countless martyrs now, as of old."

Episcopal Bishop Pities Mormons

Bishop Spalding, the Episcopal Bishop of Utah, in an address in New York recently, according to the Churchman, declared the situation of the Mormons to be the most pitiable on earth. The bishop declared, that no other sect suffered from such bitter attacks of unreasoning enemies. Even the heathen came in for a richer need of brotherly love. Yet there was not in America today a body of people more deeply instilled with the religious spirit and a yearning for religious truth. Polygamy, the logical outcome of their theology, was inevitably coarsening and degrading. Against it and the commercializing of their religion he and those who worked with him were battling with less immediate thought of winning individual converts than of raising up within the Mormon Church a sprit of insurgency that might purify its theology and spiritualize its practice.

An Octogenarian Hymn Writer

William Howard Doane Mus D., was born February 3, 1832. He is known throughout the English speaking world as the author of such hymns as "Jesus Keep Me Near the Cross;" "Tell Me the Old, Old Story;" "Rescue the Perishing;" "Safe in the Arms of Jesus;" "Take the Name of Jesus with You;" and hundreds of others which have made a place for themselves in our hymnology. He is a consecrated millionaire, an inventor, a philanthropist, a fellow of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, the American Society of Mining Engineers, the American Geographical Society, the American Society for the Advancement of Science, the American Archeological Society.

At the present time he is president of the American Baptist Publication Society, president of the Ohio Baptist State Convention, and director upon innumerable denominational and interdenominational boards. Mr. Doane's busy life has been spent in Cincinnati, where he has made his influence felt for good in many branches of religious work.

Why He Was An Episcopalian

An Episcopalian clergyman who was passing his vacation in a remote country district met an old farmer who declared that he was a "'Piscopal."

"To what parish do you belong?" asked the clergyman.

"Don't know nawthin' 'bout enny parish," was the answer.

"Who confirmed you, then?" was the next question.

"Nobody," answered the farmer.

"Then how are you an Episcopalian?" asked the clergyman.

"Well," was the reply, "you see it's this way: Last winter I went down to Philadelphit a-visitin', an' while I was there I went to church, an' it was called 'Piscopal, an' I heered them say that they left undone the things what they'd oughter done and they'd done some things what they oughtenter done, and I says to myself says I: 'That's my fix exac'ly,' and ever sence then I've been a 'Piscopalian."

Christian Courage

Cowardice magnifies the strength of the enemy. It overlooks the strength of friends. It creates misery. It means defeat. Nobody likes to face the fact that he has been a coward. We cover up our weakness by attributing our failure to other persons or to circumstances and thus build up a counterfeit self-respect. The brave man knows when he loses courage and he seeks the cause of his weakness rather than a cloak for it.

"Now he who bears bravely, and who fears what he ought, and from the right motive, and in the right manner, and at the right time, and feels confidence in like manner, is brave. For the brave man suffers and acts just as the nature of the case demands, and right reason warrants." Thus Aristotle describes the brave man. It will be observed that he includes wisdom in his idea of courage or courage in his idea of wisdom. Neither is complete without the other. The Christian has no quarrel with Aristotle, for his emphasis on wisdom. The courage of the Christian is more than blind impulse. It is persistence in well doing in the face of danger and difficulty. The danger and the difficulty are seen and they are met for the reason that duty must be done.

It takes courage to live your own life and not allow the neighbors to make all your plans. Civilization produces variety. Liberty creates differences. We ought not to be all alike. The necessity of coöperating with others we need not overlook in order to assert our right to think our own thoughts and to act as we see fit. The courageous man is willing to be called a coward if the acts which prompt men so to designate him are demanded by his conscience. We decide how our friends ought to act and when they do not meet the situation as we have planned we set them down as cowards. We have not sufficient confidence in the intelligence of men.

We are all members of political parties, ecclesiastical organization, and social groups through which we are supposed to express our political, religious, and social convictions. We admire the man who is loyal to his party and to his church. It cannot be said, however, that our ideas of loyalty are above criticism. We apply the term traitor to one who cares to differ somewhat from the majority. We slander the men who tell what we are going to do to-morrow that we are not doing to-day. We make it uncomfortable for him who is fair to an opponent. It is bad enough that there is anybody anywhere whose opinions do not agree with ours; it is intolerable that members of our church or of our party have kindly feelings toward independent heretics. Those who would be just and kind must have courage, for they will be denounced by partisans, and sectarians.

Christian courage appears in the life of routine. The minister is told by some of his congregation that a church in some other town is drawing great crowds by the use of spectacular methods and he is made to feel that his congregation expects him to do some new thing that will arrest the attention of the people. He knows about the preacher who is drawing the multitudes and he knows that in six months or a year this same preacher will be ready to leave and that the church will be the worse for his sensationalism. The wise minister therefore goes on doing what is required of him by the needs of the people. He knows that there are some things which do not attract public notice and which are yet the most important part of the work of a minister. The plain man and the plain woman do the work of day in its day, deaf to invitations to get a living or to uplift humanity by schemes that work themselves without the aid of patience and skill. They are sensible enough to know what counts. Nevertheless, their steady attention to duties is an exhibition of courage worthy to be commemorated in poetry and song.

Christian courage is needed when church and state are disgraced by unworthy leaders and indifferent members and citizens. Of course the church has in it hypocrites. We wish they were all outside. But what shall we do? Shall we stop because somebody says he is scandalized by the hypocrisy of the church and for that reason will not unite with it? Certainly not. We must give our testimony even when we know its power is diminished by false friends. It is selfishness to do otherwise. It is cowardly selfishness that keeps citizens of an American commonwealth at home on election day. If the crooks are in office, there is all the more reason why the good citizen should have a part in the primaries and in the elections. The courageous citizen fights for the things tha tought to be. The taunts of the "practical" politicians cannot drive him away from the ballot box before he has deposited his ballot. [Midweek Service, Feb. 14. 1 Tim. 6:11-16; 2 Tim. 4:7-8.]

XVIII—THE SYMBOLISM OF BAPTISM.

Up to this point we have been striving to understand the essential meaning of baptism, its primary function in the Christian church and in personal experience. This meaning we have described variously as the act of initiation into the church, the act of incorporating a convert into the social body of Christ, the act of conferring upon a candidate the status of a Christian, the act of self-identification with the Christian community, the act by which the church defines itself as a distinct organism in the social order. All these are desciptive of one and the same act from somewhat varying points of view. They all refer to the essential meaning of baptism.

But the whole meaning of baptism is not included in this functional description. It possesses also a secondary meaning, a symbolism which has been imaginatively imputed to the physical act of immersion in water. One of the motifs of our study all along has been to effectually distinguish the essential baptismal act from the physical act of immersion. The essential baptismal act is psychical in character, not physical. It is a joint-act of the church and the candidate. Such an act can not take place without some objective physical form or action to signalize it. No psychical act takes place without involving a physical element or factor in it. Even the most abstract idea, psychologists tell us, is accompanied, if we examine it, with a physical core or image which serves as its carrier or sign. If this is true in our individual psychical activity, it is more obviously true in social psychical activity. The purposes of a society are executed by the use of forms or tokens. The physical act of raising the right hand in taking oath, the signing of one's name in a contract, the kissing of the Bible in an inauguration, the handing over of his sword by the vanquished general, the the clasping of right hands in a pledge of loyalty, the giving and receiving a ring in marriage—all these, not to multiply illustrations, are overt signs by which psychical acts of a social nature are carried out. Our whole life is shot through with this sign language. By means of it all our social meanings are conveyed, and there is no other way by which a corporate act can be performed.

In the act of initiation into the Church of Christ the physical form of immersion was used, as we have seen, in early times, as the outward sign or marker of the joint purpose of candidate and congregation. This physical sign was never confused with the spiritual thing signified in the early times as has been true in our day. It was taken for granted, as the ring is taken for granted in the marriage rite or the raising of the right hand in the oath. There were no critics of the particular form nor apologists for it. The sign was not a matter of conscience: the thing signified was the matter of conscience. The sign was hardly a matter even of consciousness. No gospel evangelist tried to persuade his hearers will with respect to immersion; he tried to persuade his hearer's will with respect to the duty of identifying himself with Jesus Christ and the Christian community. Baptism was this act of self-identification, and immersion was the sign by which the baptismal act was carried out.

It is important for us to recognize the indispensableness of a baptismal sign. The life of every social community depends upon its receiving new members into its fellowship. A voluntary community like the church can receive its members only by means of ceremony. It might be a very simple ceremony, with a very bare and casual sign like, perhaps, writing one's name in a book, or standing up to give assent to certain statements. Or it might be a very elaborate ceremony with very rich and involved formalities. We may argue that one sign is more fitting or less fitting than another, but we can not deny that some sign is necessary. The sign is the church's method of distinguishing its members. If the church was not able to distinguish its members it would be the same thing as if there were none. It is only through the sign that the church is able to define itself as a corporate community is the social order.

Any overt act may serve for signalizing and carrying out a social purpose. The only consideration is that it shall be understood and agreed to by those participating. Many signs of social acts, however, became such originally by virtue of some intrinsic or poetic analogy to the act. For example, the custom of clasping right hands in mutual pledge or reconciliation indicated that the fighting hand and arm were now weaponless. The ring in marriage is a very ancient token, dating back to the time when it was used for purposes of signature. Its bestowal thus carried with it a beautiful compliment. Such signs were not mere signs of the social act which made use of them. They were also symbols. It was more fitting that they should be used than that some other sign should be used. They were not chosen arbitrarily; it was natural, almost instinctive, that they should be adopted in preference to a thousand others. So in the original use of immersion as the sign of initiation into a religious order—whether in Egypt or among Greeks or Jews—it seemed fitting that the transition from the old status to the new should be signalized by an immersion in water, an actual bath.

Thus at its origin, immersion was not only a sign, it was also a symbol. It was not arbitrarily chosen, but it seemed to have a poetic appropriateness. The initiate had abandoned old habits, associations and interests as if they had been a pollution. He stood forth in his new relationship fresh as from an actual bath. It is not strange that immersion in water was so widely used as the token of this transition, not strange that the Jews adopted it as the sign and symbol of a proselyte's initiation into their religion. Nor is it to be wondered at that the sign gave its own name, baptism, to the thing signified.

In John the Baptist's use of immersion the symbolism of the act was enriched by the reflection into it of the ethical character of his baptism. His was a moral community of penitent men seeking righteousness. To be baptized into this community was a moral act presupposing the forsaking of one's sins. Naturally the act of immersion lent itself to the symbolism of washing away sin or guilt. The physical ablutions thus came to symbolize the cleansing of the soul.

In the Christian Church baptism was practiced by immersion and with no change in its symbolism for some time. Ananias exhorts Saul to be baptized and "wash away" his sins. This expression indicates how closely the analogy between inward moral cleansing and the washing of the body had been carried. Indeed the analogy was so close and fascinating that there was constant danger of degrading the moral character of baptism by identifying it with the physical act of immersion. So the author of I Peter felt it necessary in speaking of baptism to call attention to the fact that it was "not the putting away of the filth of the flesh but the search of a good conscience after God." Baptism has never lost this symbolism of cleansing which the act of immersion originally reflected so appropriately. And it is not likely to lose it so long as the words "clean" and "unclean" hold their place in our vocabulary as descriptive of states of the soul.

In addition to this obvious and original symbolism nothing was more natural than that the constant practice of immersion in the induction of new converts into the Christian life would suggest the imputation to it of a symbolism specifically Christian. All ceremony tends to take on new and richer symbolism by long continued use. This is especially true of a ceremony involving intimate and sacred personal experience. The heart instinctively idealizes the outward sign, reading into it poetic analogies of its own emotion. Thus in the circular shape of the wedding ring the heart finds an analogy to its unending love. The ring is more than a sign that one is married; it is a symbol of the actual experience that makes marriage beautiful.

In like manner the baptismal ceremony was enriched by Christian experience. The outward sign of immersion in water lent itself happily to the influence of the poetic and mystical mind of Paul who gave it a distinctive Christian symbolism. It is not too much to say that Paul Christianized baptism. He did so by imputing a Christian symbolism to the outward sign by which it was solemnized. Up to this time baptism was merely the customary initiation into a religious order. There was no difference between it and John's baptism. Its only symbolism was the generic symbolism of cleansing which it possessed in common with all religious orders that used immersion. Under Paul's hand it received a specific and distinctive symbolism possible only in the Christian Church. Paul conceived it as reflecting the most significant features of Christianity—on the historical side and the side of personal experience. It is not strange that a symbolism so rich and meaningful should be imputed to immersion when we consider that it stands at the very turning point in the soul's attitude toward the Christian gospel, the most stressful and intense moment of Christian experience.

The historic features of Christianity with which Paul imaginatively associated immersion were the death, burial and resurrection of the Lord. These facts were to the apostle the pivotal facts of the Christian gospel. "Know ye not," he says, "that so many of you as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death?" "We are buried with him by baptism into his death, that like as Christ was raised up by the glory of God the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." It may be objected that Paul does not specifically speak of being immersed into Christ's death, or buried with him by immersion. This observation of course is valid. It would have been totally unlike Paul to have affirmed that a physical act could induct one into any spiritual state whatever. But because he is so thorough-going in his spiritual and ethical views, we must not deny him the right of normal poetic expression. It can hardly be doubted that Paul's profound mystical insight into the identity of the soul's experience with the Master's experience found poetic affinity and suggestion in the beautiful act of immersion at baptism. "This very immersion," he would say, "shows forth the Lord's death, burial and resurrection. That he died and was buried is pictured by your burial in the watery grave; that he arose from the dead is symbolized by your being raised again from the water." In this way Paul made of immersion a monument to the great fact of historic Christianity.

Closely interwoven with this historic symbolism is the symbolism of personal experience. This is the main thought in Paul's mind in these utterances. He is dealing with actual Christian experience, the moral side of it. He affirms that the self dies and is buried and rises anew. The experience of death to sin and the burial of the "old man" is pictured by the burial in water. It was not only for Christ to die and be buried; we also must die to sin and be raised from our burial, as he was raised from his, into newness of life. The temptation to tarry here with the substance of Paul's great redemptive thought is strong upon us. But we are studying it now with the hummle purpose of disengaging the symbol from the substance. Our fervent interest is in the fact that into the outward act of immersion Paul read this profound experience of the human soul and made it so that to think of the very physical act by which our baptism was consummated was like looking into a mirror and seeing the reflection of one's face.

It is important to distinguish clearly between the function of baptism and its symbolism. Baptism itself is not a symbol though it contains a symbolic element. The Book of Common Prayer has neither Scripture nor psychology to support it when it says that baptism is "the outward sign of an inward grace." Baptism is not a sign of anything. It is a positive and efficacious act, as positive and efficacious as faith and repentance. It actually effects something. It changes the face of the soul's moral situation. Symbols do not effect anything. They "stand for" what is effected. The active, efficacious function of baptism is, as we have seen, the self-identification of the convert with the Christian community. The symbolic feature of baptism is found in immersion, its outward sign. A sign is essential to the baptism, but the symbol is not. The symbolism is the creation of the poetic or mystical imagination dwelling upon its inner experience and seeking analogies of that experience. Symbolism is always ideally imputed to the sign. It is never, even in its most appropriate and obvious instances, intrinsic and necessary. Baptism was without doubt administered in the early church many years before any one thought to interpret its outward form as a picture of the salient facts of Christ's redemption and of the soul's transformation. Its function as initiation was not dependent upon any particular symbolism inhering in its outward sign.

The idea prevails quite generally in immersionist circles that the Savior commanded immersion in order that in his church there might be this perpetual dramatic memorial of his death, burial and resurrection. There is not an icta of evidence for this. It is altogether improbable. The symbolism of Christian baptism was put into it by Christian experience. What our Lord commanded his disciples to do was to make disciples and to baptize them, that is, to exercise the baptismal function, to initiate and incorporate them into a spiritual community of which he was to be the Head. In the exercise of this baptismal function the Christian symbolism grew up. This is not to derogate from the beauty and sacredness of that symbolism, or from what we might call the authority of it, but it is important that we do not weigh down our Lord's lips with legislative detail for which he was in no sense responsible.

It is important also that we recognize that the realities do not depend upon the symbols but the symbols upon the realities. So great has the confusion upon the meaning of baptism become in certain minds that the reality of Christian experience is denied because the symbolism of immersion is not present. The realities of baptism are death to sin, burial of the old self and the rising up of the new self to walk henceforth with Christ. The presence of these realities of the spiritual life depends, as we contended in the previous article, upon baptism, but they do not depend upon the particular act of immersion with its symbolism. We do not die to sin and bury the old self by immersion in water. We do not rise into the new life by emerging from the water. The physical act is not spiritually efficacious. Millions of Christians there are who have been buried with Christ in baptism who have not been immersed in water. Of them any unbigoted judge will gladly affirm every spiritual reality which the most extreme water salvationist will affirm of himself. They have died to sin, they have been buried with Christ, they have risen with him into a new life. They are Christians, members of the Church of Christ. We would not be able to affirm these things of them if Paul had said that we were immersed into Christ, or immersed into his death. Paul did not allow his poetry, his mysticism, to lead him into any such magic or legalism. And we must not change Paul's statement that we are buried by baptism. Those who have been baptized without immersion have in our judgment missed something. They have missed something valuable, something important. But they have missed nothing essential. We think there are good reasons why all converts should be immersed at their baptism and why the Church of Christ should practice only immersion in the solemnization of this rite, but neither our Bible nor our heart tolerates among these reasons one that disfranchises those who have come to their Savior by some other sign.

McLean College Burned

Friends of that splendid Kentucky institution, McLean College, will be saddened to read the following telegram, from Rev. H. D. Smith, and no doubt many of them will be quickened in heart to respond to the appeal for aid.

A Note From W. F. Richardson

Dear Bro. Morrison:—I have just read your comment accompanying my published protest, in The Century of this week. I note your expression regarding my criticism, that "The Christian Century has not affirmed, and does not hold that the practice of other religious bodies in sprinkling infants and adults is valid baptism." What then do you mean by saying, in your "statement" of the belief of the Disciples, that "the Disciples believe that baptism as administered by these churches actually inducts men into the Church of Christ?" Is a baptism invalid that "inducts men into the Church of Christ?" Please enlighten me on this point. Fraternally yours,

Kansas City. W. F. Richardson.

The same mail that brought the above communication brought us also a long letter from a reader who makes the criticism that our articles on baptism are "repetitious;" that we are "plowing over the same ground again and again," and begs us to assume that what we have already said it well enough understood by the intelligent constituency that reads The Christian Century. His letter was opened and read before Mr. Richardson's. It was earnestly pondered. The editorial consciousness confirmed the point of fact that there had been much repetition and was almost persuaded to plead guilty to the criticism. Perhaps we had needlessly consumed our readers patience if, indeed, we had not reflected upon their intelligence. The fact that our articles had been written primarily as chapters for a book and only secondarily as editorials, came to mind as a sort of justification, and we found a certain comfort in the thought that occasion for further similar criticism would be removed by the completion of the series with the twentieth article.

While we were thus pondering, Mr. Richardson's letter was opened. Imagine our surprise! The essential thesis of our series, the one thing we had reiterated in very chapter from the first to the current one, had been missed by this good friend than whom there is no more intelligent reader of our pages! It is disclosures like these that keep editors humble. Mr. Richardson's "protest" published last week came, as we said, just at the moment of going to press. There was no time nor space to make any further comment than to say that the "protest" was entirely irrelevant to any assertion The Christian Century had made. The exact words of his disapproval were as follows:

My attention has been called to the fact that you have used my name with those of other pastors . . . . as endorsing your six "statements" on the question of the validity of the practice of other religious bodies in sprinkling infants and adults, as Christian baptism. Permit me to say that I disagree with you in that position.

Our simple comment in reply was as follows:

The Christian Century has not affirmed and does not hold that "the practice of other religious bodies in sprinkling infants and adults" is valid Christian baptism.

The Christian Century has affirmed for itself and on behalf of the Disciples of Christ and does re-affirm it, that the baptism administered by these other religious bodies is valid, that it actually does induct men into the Church of Christ. As Disciples we regard its manner of administration as irregular, defective, objectionable, but we do not on that account regard the baptism itself as invalid. Presbyterians are not without baptism. No fair representative of the Disciples will endorse the Christian Standard's description of Methodist converts on the mission field as "unbaptized heathen enrolled by denominational missionaries." Any such bigoted characterization of God's saints and children is repugnant to the Disciples. We believe they are Christians, members of the Church of Christ, baptized members of the Church of Christ.

The reason Mr. Richardson's "protest" did not apply to any affirmation of ours was that he charged us with teaching "the validity of the practice of sprinkling infants and adults as Christian baptism." This we do not do. We have affirmed again and again:

That the practice of sprinkling infants is not baptism.

That the practice of sprinkling adults is not baptism.

That the practice of immersing adults is not baptism.

That the practice of immersing penitent believers is not baptism.

That no physical act is baptism.

That no physical act performed by or upon a penitent believer is baptism.

That no physical act performed by or upon a penitent believer with the use of the august words of the Trinity is baptism.

That baptism cannot be stated in terms of a physical act.

That it is essentially a spiritual, a psychical act which makes use, as all psychical acts must do, of a physical form as a sign and symbol.

In affirming that baptism is a psychical, and not a physical act we are in accord with the most authoritative work among Disciples on baptism—N. J. Aylsworth's "Moral and Spiritual aspects of Baptiesm." This book has been much praised, its essential argument has never been called into dispute, and it comes as near being standard as any book can be for a community of over a million free thinkers. The basic thesis of this book is that baptism is a "mental as well as physical act, and that the mental part is the very heart of it." "Whatever it can mean to be 'in Christ' that condition is said to be reached in baptism. But that spiritual goal can only be reached by a spiritual step; therefore baptism is a spiritual step—the journey of the soul 'into Christ.'" Of this book we hope to present a critique to our readers at some future time. We quote from it now only as approving our single point that baptism cannot be defined in terms of a physical act, no matter how that act is qualified.

This then is what The Christian Century means—and, if he will pardon our temerity, what Mr. Richardson and the Disciples generally mean—in accepting as valid the baptism of members of these "other religious bodies"; the essential spiritual act of baptism has been performed; they have been inducted into the Church of Christ; what the Scripture says baptism does has beyond question been don in their cases. Without abating a jot or tittle of our contention for the practice of immersion only, the Disciples of Christ owe it to their plea for unity to save themselves from their reputation as a bigoted sect by proclaiming in unequivocal speech their true attitude toward their brethren of the whole Church of Christ, and by making good their words in their practice.

Editorial Table Talk

Insane Evangelism Again

Another controversy has been started in the pages of a contemporary on the question of evangelism. It is interesting to the readers of The Christian Century only as it serves to illustrate the unfruitfulness of dealing with the problem with inadequate data, with no well defined criterion of success and in personal passion.

The method of the controversy is stereotyped. When charges are made in general terms, one of the evangelists, probably freer from objectionable practices than some of his brethren, appears as a defender of the class, calls for specifications which he knows beforehand will not be produced, not because they are not within easy reach, but because it would shame us all to see them in print. Not appearing, a shout goes up from the accused; the objector is set down as a disgruntled pastor, a traducer of his brethren; the triumphs of New Testament evangelism are proclaimed, while the charges of insane evangelism are committed to the limbo of forgetfulness. With one fell blow the accuser of professional evangelism is laid in the dust.

This controversy continues from everlasting to everlasting because the objections to the methods of many professional evangelists are stated in general terms. Let the specifications be made, and the controversy would end. The guilty would not be likely to attempt a defense, and the innocent could not be dragooned into an attempt. Publicity with respect to evangelistic methods and results is what we need, if any improvement be expected. With indefinite charges made, the defense comes with magnificent wrath and boldness to the help of New Testament evangelism, which was never under discussion, ignores the real issue, puts the objector in a false light, covers itself with glory, and retires from the field loaded with honors.

The Greatest of Schools

The International Sunday-school Lessons Committee, meeting recently in Indianapolis, in which city was held its first meeting forty years ago, mapped out new Bible lessons for English speaking Sunday-schools in this and other lands that contain learnes to the number of 25,000,000. There is a British section, and action is taken here only after consultation with it, but leadership in this vast religious educational work is in America, and has been from its inception.

Lessons which these millions of children study, and will study until 1917, are as follows: This year the Life of Christ as related by St. Mark, but with citations from some other of the evangelists; 1913, the Old Testament from Genesis to Joshua, or to be more specific, from the Creation to the third settlement in Canaan; 1914, the Life of Christ, concluded from 1912; 1915, the Old Testament, beginning with the Judges, taking both Books of the Kings, and the Greater Prophets; 1916, the New Testament, Acts, Epistles and Revelations; 1917, first half of the year, the Gospel of St. John, and last half, from the Book of the Kings to and including the minor prophets.

The Growth of the Churches

Dr. Henry K. Carroll, secretary of the Ecumenical Methodist Conference, but United States census enumerator of churches in 1890, figures that Christians increased in numbers, within continental United States, 786,000 a year during the ten years from 1900 to 1910. Since making religious statistics officially Dr. Carroll has made them on his own account for several years. These figures are his own for the year 1911. During the decade covered the population of continental United States increased 1,597,691 a year.

The growth of Christian churches, Catholic and Protestant, during 1911 was, according to Dr. Carroll, 600,000 members, or somewhat below the average for the previous decade, and 2,800 churches, also below that average. He finds that many great bodies, like the Presbyterian, and his own, the Methodist, do not average gains of two members each year in the local churches.

During the last twenty-one years Catholics in America have doubled in number, according to Dr. Carroll, and Lutherans and Episcopalians have come within a few thousands of doing the same. Lutherans displaced Presbyterians as fourth in rank. Methodists and Baptists increased by 2,000,000 members each, Disciples by 667,065, Presbyterians by 700,000 and Catholic authorities give their population for 1911 as 14,618,000, while Dr. Carroll, by deducting a percentage for children too young to be concerned, arrives at a communicant membership for this church of 12,575,000. He points out that Methodist and other figures are on a somewhat different basis from Catholic, and that comparisons of figures should take this fact into account.

Openings for Christian Workers

Nearly 700 men and women are wanted for the Christian mission fields of this and other countries. Once a year the Student Volunteer Movement collects and publishes lists of workers sought for by the societies of North America. Often it is incomplete, but this year the number and variety are beyond any previous one. Volunteers are wanted for medical, educational and evangelistic work. The salaries are small but sure, and there is choice of practically every country under the sun. The contract for service is two to seven years. For nearly all of the positions only graduates of college or high grade training school are accepted.

Of the 700 required, a few more than half are men. Civil, mechanical and electrical engineers; teachers of music, agriculture, manual training, chemistry and almost all other high school subjects; athletes to develop out door sports; physical directors for gymnasium work; architects and builders; physicians, business managers for colleges, mission presses and stations; stenographers, both to serve as private secretaries and to teach; printers for mission presses, and preachers to learn foreign languages, to teach in seminaries and to preach to English speaking congregations—these are the lines of service demanded of men. Of women there are wanted physicians, nurses, kindergartners, teachers, almost all grades, evangelists, and superintendents of orphanages and heads of homes for students.

These demands for workers are made by almost all societies, home and foreign. China is especially in need of men, and South America is steadily increasing its calls.

—Bishop Anderson of Chicago, Bishop Vincent of Cincinnati, Bishop Brent of the Philippines, and the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning, rector of Trinity Church, New York, have been appointed by the Episcopal Commission named in 1910 to further the cause of Christian unity, to visit England this summer and there explain the purposes of the proposed World Conference on Faith and Order. Bishop Anderson is president of the Commission, and Bishop Vincent is chairman of the Episcopal House of Bishops.

First Impressions of China

By Guy W. Sarvis

EDITORS' NOTE: The quality of intimacy in this article from Mr. Sarvis is explained by the fact that it was written as a news letter to the congregation of Hyde Park Church, Chicago, which supports Mr. Sarvis at the University of Nanking. Upon reading it we begged it from the pastor, Dr. Ames, just as it was about to go into the local church's monthly paper. It is Mr. Sarvis' first word to his church since his arrival in China. These first impressions which the oriental world makes upon the virgin mind of the western worker or traveler are always especially interesting.

This letter, or news sheet, will have to do mainly with our trip to Nanking to spend Christmas with the Garretts and other friends there and to see our future home. We had intended moving to Nanking permanently before now, but continued uncertainty as to the outcome of the revolution together with the fact that we can study the language about as well in Shanghai as in Nanking and that the people at home will feel more secure if we are here, has decided us to stay indefinitely. We were anxious, however, to see our future home, and the more so because there is still a possibility, though not a probability, that the imperialists will return and try to recapture it, in which case the entire city will probably be burned and we should not have seen it at all. So at the cordial invitation of Mrs. Garrett, with whom we were living here before she returned to her home there, we decided to go.

First Sight of Interior.

This trip was our first into the interior of China, and also our first on a Chinese railway. It is about 150 miles from Shanghai to Nanking, and the fast trains make the run in about six hours. We traveled second class and were the only Europeans (you see how I involuntarily class all white people together!) in a car full of Chinese. We were very much interested in the life on the train. We got on a half hour before starting time, but the car was two-thirds full of Chinese, most of them drinking tea. The cars are made with the seats facing each other and little stationary tables in between, and tea is served for a few cents. A coolie comes through periodically and fills up the tea-pots out of which the tea is poured and drunk without cream or sugar from the tiny Chinese cups with out handles.

Day-Coach as Driving Car.

The ordinary day coach serves also as a dining car, and at all hours the Chinese passengers were eating, and usually they made quite as much noise as a lively little pig trying to steal the best of the swill from its pig neighbor. The reason for this seems to be that they are compelled to suck up their food, if it is liquid, when they use chop sticks, and they are still at the barbaric stage of the small boy. All cars are smoking cars on these trains, and the cigarettes and tobacco the people smoke are terrible. Some people are saying that the cigarette evil is fast becoming greater than the opium evil. Of course their cigarettes are of the vilest sort. Another characteristic custom which we saw for the first time was that of using hot towels. A coolie comes through carrying a basketful, and he hands them out to each passenger and each wipes his face and hands with them—primarily for heat, not for cleanliness. The train had most of the western institutions, including electric lights and the ubiquitous newsboy who came through selling the daily papers, both English and Chinese, and also a variety of literature.

Outside Obesrvations.

As we passed through the country the sights outside the train were no less interesting than those inside. One of the most striking things about the Chinese landscape, especially in the neighborhood of the large cities is the graves scattered everywhere, in the midst of fields, on hill-tops, and in all sorts of impossible places. Some of them are marked with headstones; numbers of them consist of coffins with brick walls and roofs covering them; but the greater number of them are simply mounds of earth which lie uncultivated and grass-covered in this land where every available square yard of space is in demand for food production. This practice is of course connected with ancestor worship, and is only one of the indications of the economic influence of religion here. Someone has estimated that close to the cities (where land is most valuable) twenty-five per cent of the land is occupied by graves. Another striking feature of the country is the winter gardens.

Guy W. Sarvis.

Heavy Frosts.

We have had heavy frosts, so that ice has formed in the puddles in the streets, but all over the country are gardens, absolutely unprotected, in which grow many kinds of vegetables, especially cabbages, spinach, beets, turnips, lettuce and similar things. All this garden is tended with the minutest care, being planted in ridges of earth between which are ditches where the water can be run. All fields in this part of China are level. If they are on hill-sides, these are terraced. There are no roads in our sense of the word. No wheeled vehicles are used out in the country, but all carrying is by men, donkeys, or boats. The country (it is in the neighborhood of the Yangtse river) is cobwebbed with canals, and on these hundreds of thousands of people live in house-boats. A touch of beauty is given to the otherwise monotonous and uninteresting landscape by the numerous bamboo groves with their long, slender stems, and their dainty, feathery foliage.

Refugees Returning.

At Hsiagwan, the terminus of the railroad outside Nanking, we were met by Mr. Garrett, who took us to the "city train," which runs through the wall into the city proper. The trains are crowded these days, for people who fled before the capture of the city, are returning. Nanking was the first city in China to admit a railway within the walls, and it is the more remarkable because this railway runs through a gate which had been closed for hundreds of years because a son had killed his father in Nanking, a crime which is so enormous that the whole community must suffer for it. However, it was at the wish of the Manchu ruler of the city that the road was built. It was dark when we reached the city, but we got some idea of its size from the time it required to get to our destination. The walls of the city are more than twenty miles around, but there is much open space within the city. But we shall tell more of this later when we go there to live. Mr. Garrett took us up to their comfortable home where we spent the evening around the open fire visiting as if we had known each other always. The Garretts are very "homey" people, and the illusion of being on the old farm was increased when in the morning we heard the cattle in the stable and later when we had real cow's milk for breakfast—for we less fortunate creatures have to depend on Borden's and Carnation Cream for our dairy products and on tinned butter for our bread. The Garretts, in common with the other foreigners in Nanking, have a large, comfortable house and plenty of room in their back yard for a garden and in front for flowers and trees. One can be as comfortable as middle-class people are at home, so far as the material wants of life are concerned.

Nanking a Beautiful City.

Nanking, and especially the end of it where the mission homes are located, is lovely. The famous "drum tower" stands on a hill at one side, and the famous Budjigo hill crowned by a beautiful Buddhist pagoda is on the other, while in the distance is the long range of lovely mountains running up to 1,500 or 2,000 feet in height with Purple Mountain just outside the city walls. The city wall is typical of China and is a symbol of the medieval civilization which still prevails here. There are eleven gates in the Nanking city wall, and these are closed at six o'clock now. During the siege they were kept closed most of the time.

Dr. Macklin's Hospital.

On Saturday morning Mr. Garrett and I walked over to Dr. Macklin's hospital and saw the rows of wounded—not more than half as many as they had at first—lying in their cots. Dr. Macklin and Mr. Garrett of our mission (in addition to some ten other foreigners) stayed in the city throughout the siege, and the people were very grateful to them for their influence. They undoubtedly did very much to prevent indiscriminate massacre as well as to care for the wounded. It has added greatly to their prestige. It was a thrilling thing to walk through the rooms of this hospital with their equipment for the treatment of all sorts of diseases and surgical cases and to realize that none of it was here twenty-five years ago, and that one man has lived to see the change, indeed to be largely instrumental in it, and to find himself one of the most respected men in China instead of an outcast or an enemy. We went through the "beggar wards" given by a Chinese because he was so much impressed with Dr. Macklin's work for these wretched people whom the Chinese had been in the habit of leaving to die.

Meeting With General Djow.

Our real errand over to the hospital that morning was to meet General Djow, who was in command of the imperial troops who surrendered to the revolutionists. He is a man from the north of China where the people grow taller and sturdier than in the center and south, and was evidently born to command. He is fighting for the revolutionists now, as are most of the Chinese soldiers—for this revolution is fundamentally a rebellion against a foreign dynasty (the Manchu) as well as a movement toward progress. One reason why the government has made so feeble a resistance is that it has had no troops it could trust. I had my kodak along and took a picture of the general at his request. Later he sent Mr. Garrett a present in recognition of his services during the siege. This is quite in accordance with the Chinese custom.

In the afternoon we rode over to the South Gate, four miles across the city, where we have a chapel and women's work. Two of our unmarried ladies live here among the Chinese. Some visitor remarked that they either ought to be put into the insane asylum or draw a pension because they lived right here in the midst of the Chinese city. We had a good opportunity to see what the native city is on a rainy day—narrow, slushy streets only wide enough for two rickshaws to pass, shops opening right onto the roadway, food exposed to the mud in the wet weather and the dust in dry, all life lived in sight of one's neighbor.

University of Nanking.

We rode through the grounds of the University of Nanking, where our future work is to be. All schools in the interior are closed now, and some unsightly holes in the ground were being filled in by famine refugees in charge of one of the professors. It used to be the custom in famine time simply to give relief gratuitously, but now a serious effort is made to give only where relief is deserved and to give it only in return for work. There is much suffering from famine throughout central China this year. Incidentally the dirt which was being used to fill in these depressions in the campus was being removed from the ground just outside which was literally covered with graves. A few years ago this would have raised a rebellion and would still in some places, but now it is not noticed. The buildings of the university are good brick structures as large as those of the average small college at home. The location is fine, and I am sure we shall enjoy our work there.

Space forbids a description of our Christmas day here. Suffice it to say that it was a very happy one, spent with the Garretts, Osgoods and others of our missionaries who chanced to be in Nanking. We had a tree and Santa Claus and all the home accessories, including a couple of inches of snow on the ground. In the evening we had our Christmas dinner and a social time.

The Tartar City.

Tuesday forenoon Mr. Garrett and I rode over to the Tartar city, that part in which the Manchus resided before the capture of Nanking by the revolutionists. When the city was captured, this part was burned, partly because there were secret mines in it and partly in revenge for what the Tartars (a term used interchangeably with Manchus) had done to the people before the capitulation. On the whole the revolution has been characterized by generous treatment of the Manchus by the revolutionists, and even in Nanking only those who had evidently been looting were killed. There is not a roof left on a house in the Tartar city save where temporary matting roofs have been erected to shelter those of the Manchus who remain huddled together in unbelievably unsanitary conditions—without sufficient bedding, food, or medical attention. Mrs. Sarvis went into some of these refugee camps with one of the physicians and was terribly saddened by what she saw. One man had lain in a hut dead three days because the people had not sufficient money to bury him. Relief is being organized but cannot be adequate. The whole city is a scene of desolation such as I have never witnessed.

The Perils of Middle Life

A Sermon by Rev. C. Sylvester Horne

Pastor of Whitfield's, London, and Member of Parliament

"And Samson called unto the Lord and said, O Lord, remember me."—Judges 16:28.

The story of Samson has so often been treated as if it were merely a book written for the entertainment of children—as one of the many giant stories of the world which hold the imagination—that it is difficult to secure for it careful and devout consideration. Yet, when all is said, it remains a pregnant study of life and temptation, one of those great stories intended to show how the decline of strength is inevitably connected with the decay of moral integrity. Tennyson's knight, who could say "My strength is as the strength of ten, because my heart is pure," was not a scientific impossibility.

If there is one listening to me who is inclined to believe that there is nothing of dignity and of gravity in this story to recommend it to a Christian audience, I advise that person to read over again the pages in which, perhaps, the greatest of the Puritans concerned himself with this final incident in the story. John Milton, when he wrote "Samson Agonistes," was blind and old, and in disgrace. True, he had no moral fall to reproach himself with—and that is what makes the story we are considering this morning so sad, that aggravated the misery of the hero patriot. But, at the same time, John Milton turned to this last scene in the story of Samson with a sort of divine prayer in his heart that God would give him back his manhood's power that he might avenge himself upon the Philistinism which in his latter days was darkening the life of England, and usurping the rule of good, and destroying the moral fibre of the people.

Midway In the Story.

The story of Samson divides itself into two parts. Midway in the story is the simple assurance that he judged Israel for twenty years. That is the central portion of Samson's life. He came to that time as one who loved righteousness and hated iniquity, who held no truce with the principalities and powers of evil. He is no model youth, and he is not intended to look like one. He is not intended to stand for the youth of today as a pattern of discretion. He is rash, headstrong, impetuous, like so many others we have known—more like ourselves, perhaps, than we care to face. Some of his rashness he paid dearly for, as who does not?

But the secret passion of religious patriotism sprang to birth in him. Again and again he became the saviour of his country. This is the Samson of thirty to thirty-five. And then he ruled Israel for twenty years. But when he emerges from middle life, when he comes out again into the light, we are all of us struck by the change. What has happened to his life? He is a man of the world now, that worst form of sensualist, an old sensualist, a man of broken character, a man of broken ideals. Lost to self-respect, his vigor has gone, his clear, firm will has gone, his unselfish enthusiasm has gone, his courage has gone, his devotion has gone, everything that made him noble, pure, great, has gone; all lost, buried, sepulchred somewhere in the desert of middle life.

The Darkest Ages.

He was a very acute and very interesting writer who once said that in regard to our individual lives the same law holds good that holds good in regard to history—that the middle ages are the darkest. When the idealism has gone, and the nobler realism has not come, when the perilous delusions of this world are seen and known for what they are, there, midway between youth and age, lies the darker age. Those are the years through which men, and women, too, are so absorbed and engrossed in doing, that they have little time to think of being. That is the time when the average man places his neck under the yoke of business, looking forward to some deliverance twenty or thirty or forty years on, and hoping in his heart of hearts that there may be time then for a few quiet thoughts before the end. Add to these busy hours the time that every city man demands for recreation and relaxation in order that he may keep his body fit, and you may well ask, where does the soul come in? And the answer is that in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred it does not come in, it goes out.

In early life Samson had a history to be proud of. He had no history in the middle. The writer of this book tells nothing about those years, because there was nothing to tell.

A Warning.

Let me offer a strong warning against the perils of middle life, when the brave ideals of youth begin to seem to you a little ridiculous, when you feel ashamed of some of your old enthusiasms, when the moral zeal begins to weary. God save us from the worldly wisdom of our middle years! It is the period when men start what they call their career, when they put themselves to school in the very worldliest school that they can find, to a career which often leads to nothing—I mean no permanent enrichment of the soul, I have nothing to say about the banker's balance. Middle life is the time when we live most for self and least for God, and the peril is that at the end we should have suffered such wastage of the soul, such shrinkage of the spirit that we shall not even have strength to profit by the few remaining years, if any do remain, of meditation and devotion and worship.

A Spent Soul.

It is in the closing picture that the story of Samson becomes so significant and so eloquent. Upon the man with the spent soul the old enemies descend. He is delivered into the power of his foes, and, blinded by them, he begins to recover his inward sight. Remorse first accuses and then inspires him. "What a genius I was," said poor Swift in his years of wreckage, "when I wrote that book." "What strength I had," Samson might well have said, "When my heart was young and I was pure." Slowly, but surely, the old vow began to frame itself again in his soul. He would never again see the sights that dazzle, but there was still opportunity to see the face of God, whose fiery pillar of truth is given us for our night-time. The day of Samson's disgrace was his day of grace, just as a man's day of serious trouble is the day that brings him back to purer thoughts and better aspirations. Disgrace of man, grace of God. His fall had meant the humiliation of his people. If he could recover their freedom, now gladly would he die, and dying save Israel and expiate his sin. So the wish, the thought framed itself, and wrought itself into prayer. It was to be no petty revenge, it was to be a great and splendid witness for God and freedom and religion. If he was wrong, living when he did, being who he was, others must judge him. I cannot. This thing I know—in the night of his blindness he grappled with God in the dark, and held him fast.

His Heart Turned Back.

His life spun on blindly till the end, but his heart turned back to his youth, and became the heart of a little child. He was a patriot once again, now with a patriotism the dross of which had been purged out, the self-interest of which had gone. The Philistines saw him old and bent and blind, grinding in the prison mill, and they never suspected that the man's heart was becoming young again. No place so fit, he said, for the confession of my recovered manhood as the idol temple, no day so auspicious as the idol feast. "O Lord God, remember me." His whole being is flooded with the tide of sacred passion. One sees in Milton's poetry and on many a canvas, a tragic, stately form, bowing itself against the central pillar, the rocking of the building, the deluge, and avalanche of wood and stones. We feel that here, going to his death, he was at any rate doing something to avenge upon himself the pusillanimity of his middle years.

His Time and Ours.

His times are not ours. His temptations are not ours. His witness was not ours. His vows were not the same as ours. But at least ours are not less than his. Is it true of any listening to me to-day that only the husks of your vows remain; that you are in the desert of middle life where souls are lost? Was it the vow of your Church membership? Was it the vow of your confirmation service? Probably at some time every one in this building was vowed to the Lord Jesus Christ. Some sort of reverence for it, I can quite believe, remains in your heart; but what has become of it? Oh, back to the old pure vow, back to the sense of separation to a holy and a Christian life, back to the awful call of Deity to your soul, back to where the Christ is standing on the lake side while the mists of the morning are breaking. The day is far spent, and the night is at hand. God bless you with his reviving grace before your lamps go out and you have no light left for the time when you need it most.

The Company's Doctor

By Edgar White

We had just come out of the deep black hole, Bill and Jack, the shotfirers, and myself, and after leaving our mine clothes on a peg in the room next to the big engine, we started along the path to town. I had been with the shotfirers as their guest, and had traveled afoot along ten miles of more or less muddy roadway under ground to see how they handled the exceedingly delicate work entrusted to them. The matter had been one of the greatest interest to me, and when I got my "eyesight," and over the first feeling of nervousness that comes to a tenderfoot when he finds himself in a perilous place, I thoroughly enjoyed the novel experience. The shotfirers had lots of fun with me, blowing out my light, and making out like they were going to block my way after they had touched the cartridge fuses. They confided to me afterwards that it wasn't often they could get a green hand to go on a trip like that, and when they did find a victim, they made the most of it.

It was just about sunset of a beautiful summer afternoon, and as we were walking down a long hill of velvet green we met a gentleman and lady, walking toward us, hand in hand, apparently delighted with each other. They spoke pleasantly to Bill and Jack as they passed, and bowed courteously to me, the stranger. The man was of middle age, with kindly eyes and a good, strong face. His companion was possibly twenty-eight or thirty. Her hair was light, parted evenly in the center of her head and waved attractively over the small eyes. At first glance one might not call her handsome, and yet with the lovelight so manifest in her eyes she came mighty near deserving that description.

"The company's doctor and his woman," said Bill.

In the mining district the wife is always "the woman," a term of equal reverence.

"Recently married?" I hazarded.

"About ten years."

"My gracious!" I exclaimed. "One would think they were just having their honeymoon."

"Yes," replied Bill. "But one time it come awful near setting for good—their honeymoon. That's why they're having another one."

As my train wasn't due until ten that night I went with Bill to his little house over on the edge of the valley, where we washed some of the soot and dirt off our heads and faces, and sat down to a delightful supper of fried chicken, gravy, potatoes, biscuit, coffee and molasses Mrs. Bill had prepared for us. Many a time I've sat at table in dining rooms of hotels and in restaurants of high character, but never where I enjoyed the menu as I did that plain board of Bill's. Perhaps it was the long, dangerous journey we made, the keen evening air that swept over the hills, or maybe just the plain, pure food itself that gave the unusual appetite. It paid for all the weariness, the cuts and bumps with which the sombre depths had marked me, and I would gladly undergo the same experience at any time again if for no other purpose than to acquire the honest hunger it gives one.

After supper Bill fetched three chairs out in the little front yard, one for Mrs. Bill, one for himself and the other for his guest. The southern wind coming up the valley brought the long hoarse exhausts from the pumping engine, which was run all night to keep the water down in the mine, and we could hear the switch engine shunting cars about so as to have them for the morrow's work, and to get today's coal out of the way. As the moon came over the eastern ridge Bill began the story of the doctor and his wife.

"A few months back we all knew there was something wrong in the little white house up there"—indicating where the doctor lived—"and of course none of us talked about it then, but now it's all right," he said glancing at comely Mrs. Bill, who nodded approvingly.

"Martha—that's the doctor's wife—was reared in a big city, with all the pleasures and advantages one has in such a place, and when she was married and come up here with the Doc—Jerome Dartmouth is his name—it was a rather startling change for her. Instead of smooth sidewalks and clean city streets, there were dirt paths and muddy roads. For amusements there was a traveling show about once a month in the little building we call an opera house. There were no art galeries, no libraries, no splendid parks to drive in. I guess to her the first winter in the hills must have seemed about as bleak and dismal as the arctic explorers find it way up north.

"The Doc came here as the company's physician and surgeon to be paid so much per case. At that time there wasn't much in the job, because the development of the coal hadn't been carried as far down the valley as it is now, and there was only one camp to look after, and what little practice he could get over in town. The job didn't pay him half what a miner made, but he knew it was the company's intention to extend its tracks and open up more mines. That would bring a great many more men, with a consequent increase of work for the doctor. So he and Martha lived very economically and put their trust in the future.

"The Doc was one of those sociable, good-natured fellows who could make friends easily, and he soon was on intimate terms with every family in the camp. He had a little office and study room over by the mining offices at the pit-head, and there he carried on all sorts of experiments especially to help men who worked below the sunlight, and he did something no other camp doctor ever did. He would go down in the mines, and wander all through them, studying black damp, foul air and bad places, and he made some very practical recommendations that the company very promptly adopted.

"But Martha wasn't of the doctor's turn—not at first. There was nothing attractive to her in the squalid little two-room houses of the miners and the many bare-footed kiddies playing 'round in front of them. To her it seemed like a slum district, and she didn't feel any call to get up an acquaintance with that sort of people. She wasn't a proud, stuck-up girl, but she was what you might call a—er—'ristocrat, and had their ways, you know. At some fine party or a reception to the governor or president she'd outshine a queen; she was so nice and graceful, and so full of dignity, that she seemed made for court life, as they call it in the old country.

"But Martha was a brave little woman and the Doc worshiped her. All he did was for her, and he never tired talking of the good time coming—some day. He'd let her go back to the city to visit her folks when she got homesick, and she never knew how close he had to figure to get the money for expenses when she made such trips.

"Martha might have come 'round all right and been contented with her life in the district but for her fool kin She had a maiden sister, who was a bit jealous because Martha—who was many years younger—had got married first, and this old spinster would write Martha letters in which she took pains to tell how well all the lads who went to school with Jerome were doing. One of 'em had got to be a big man in railroading, and his wife lived in a fine house and had servants. Another had made a killing in real estate, and figured his pile by the thousands. Even the slow boy at school had found a job that paid him ten times more than Jerome was making back in 'those savage jungles.'

"Being a woman and good-looking, Martha liked fine things to wear, and coveted a nicely furnished home, and every letter her old maid sister wrote her drove the iron of discontent deeper in her soul, as the old spinster knew it would.

"As the years went by without any improvement, Martha came to the conclusion that the fault must be Jerome's; he wasn't the intellectual giant she thought him in the days of her infatuation, and never could make good, because it wasn't in him. She had read about bright boys at school who had been disappointments in practical life, and she classified her husband among them. He would always be good and kind and work hard, but he would never rise above the mediocre, and she was doomed to a life of toil, with no more sunshine in it than that of the poor women in the little miners' cottages about her. She remembered, with some bitterness, that she had pitied them when she first came, and it would end by their pitying her. You see, this was a time before Martha had acquired the great philosophy which came through—

"Well, the coal company finally opened its new mines and extended its tracks down to them. To man them it brought in a lot of men from Southern Europe, mostly Italians. There must have been a thousand new men put on, and many of them had families. Then there came talk of constructing a large handsome hospital in the center of the district to care for the sick and wounded. The very day that the Doc, with glowing eyes, told Martha of this, and of his chances to be given the superintendency of the hospital, with a big salary, a new doctor came into the district. He was a large, aggressive fellow, and seemed to act like he was here for the purpose of taking charge of things. His name was Ralph Squegee, and it was said he had some sort of a stand-in with the general manager of the coal company by right of relationship.

"Dr. Squegee put up a two-room frame office near the company's headquarters, and furnished it in elaborate style. He had large flat-top desks, a typewriter and many cases full of books. His name was in big letters over the door so all could see. Jerome's modest little shack of an office across the way looked like a chicken-coop in comparison with the work-shop of the new doctor.

Squegee soon became acquainted with his rival and visited his home frequently. He appeared like an open-faced chap, rather too much so to please those who could see deeper. In a calm, matter-of-fact way Squegee spoke of his superintendency of the hospital as something foreordained, and Martha's heart sank within her. The struggle had been long and severe, and just at a time when conditions seemed to promise relief another man stepped in and carried off the prize. Nothing could exceed the blackness of her despair after the visit of Squegee, when he so breezily stated that the coveted position at the hospital was his. Perhaps he detected some sign of distress in Martha's face, for he was good enough to say:

"'But I shall need assistants, and I intend to give Doctor Dartmouth a good position under me."

"'Under me!' Martha could have torn out his eyes for the patronizing remark. From that hour the man she hated most in the district was the new doctor, and it made her mad at Jerome because he would condescend to notice him. Yet she felt that was just the way it would work out—the new man would be given the place of honor, and Jerome would have to be content with such crumbs as he might choose to offer him.

"Squegee was around the company's offices a great deal, and seemed to be on terms of close intimacy with all the heads. He smoked cigars, played billiards and was a good comrade on fishing and hunting expeditions.

"A great many of the aliens were put to work in 68, the old mine we went partly through this afternoon, because the entries hadn't been driven far enough in the new mines to accommodate but a hundred or so men.

"No. 68 is one of the oldest mines on the track, and when you get out pretty far the air is bad. They have improved the ventilation a great deal since this thing I'm going to tell you about happened, but at that time it was no trouble to run into the black damp on several of the far-out cross-entries. These aliens didn't know much about mining, and they shouldn't have been put to work in that mine, but they were clean out of money and had to do something. So the superintendent decided to risk it. For several days thereafter there was trouble with the ventilating system, and one day a lot of the foreigners came out at noon shaking their fists at headquarters and talking loudly in a tongue none of us could understand. The boss reported the air on the tenth, eleventh and twelfth-east was getting thick, and the men were ordered out of that section. Some of the aliens came up staggering and going on like they were in dire agony. This added to the tumult of the Mediterranean crowd, and we began to look for trouble. You see, the poor fellows had an idea that they had been deliberately put in a place of danger for the purpose of killing 'em off. There were designing men among them who talked that way—anarchists who thrived amid scenes of violence. While things on top were boiling, a dark-eyed, sallow-faced woman came rushing down from the hills screaming like somebody was bent on her murder:

"'My Petro! My Petro! Save my Petro!'

"Believe me, friend, I've been here in squally times, but I never felt the cold shivers crawl up my back like they did when that half-crazed Italian woman rushed into camp with that announcement. "Petro—Pete we called him—was a trapper boy, working out there in the bad air district. His job was to look after the ventilating doors, simple enough but very important. In their eagerness to save themselves, his countrymen had fled without him.

"A hoarse growl went up from the swarthy men about the pit-head, and one of the leaders, a man with big black eyes and a heavy black mustache, a malcontent, a disturber, and yet one who by his superior education had acquired a great deal of influence over the foreign element, began a harangue, when—

"'Stop right there or I'll blow your head off!'

"Friend! That was a sight for a man that makes pictures, out there in the gloom of a dying winter day, with the pall of smoke from the big engines making it still darker, until the hard faces gathered about looked ghastly. We Americans appreciated the danger of the situation, as explanation seemed impossible, and we awaited with anxiety to see the outcome of the strange scene. A Winchester rifle was pointed squarely at the head of the black mustached anarchist and the man holding the rifle was Doctor Jerome Dartmouth, the business failure. Lord! It was good for weak eyes to see that criminal fall off the box and slink away. He wasn't a fighter; he only incited other people. I don't know his nationality. It seems he never did any work around here, but merely hung about to extort money from the foreigners for certain alleged services.

"Doc looked around until his eyes lit on Tomasco Commella, an interpreter, whom he called up, and then made Tomasco explain what he intended to do. Then he hurriedly ran to his little office, donned an oxygen helmet of his own invention, and hastened to the pit. There he picked out two American miners, gave the signal to the engineer and the 'cage' went down into the darkness.

"While they were down Squegee came running up and demanded that he be let down into the pit to rescue the Italian trapper boy. The engineer replied that he could not lower the 'cage' without authority. Squegee swelled up and wanted to know if a man's life was to be jeopardized through a lot of 'infernal red tape.' The superintendent finally issued the order, and went down himself with the volunteer physician.

"Along about this time Martha learned from a woman who was running in that direction that something was happening over at 68, and she hastily threw some garment over her head and trailed behind the woman. She had never been at the pit-head before, although it was not a great distance from her home. It was close to dark. A number of oil lamps flared about the shaft and engine room across the tracks. As she passed the many cottages of the miners she also noticed lights, small tapers burning at shrines for the little trapper lad lost in the black depths of the underworld.

"At the pit-head were many women. Most conspicuous of these was the mother of Petro, who refused to be comforted, despite kindly ministrations of her countrywomen.

"To Martha all this made a strange spectacle. It was a long time before she gathered an idea of what was happening. The kindly American who explained things to her was careful not to mention that her husband was at that moment in the most dangerous part of the pit, staking his life to rescue a little Italian boy whom he had probably never seen.

"Presently the signal bell in the engine room was sounded, there were two blasts of the whistle, and the 'cage' was coming up. Would part of its cargo be cold in death? That was the tremendous question, not only as to little Petro but to the men who had risked their lives to find him amid the deathly air.

The Book World

Professor Ames' Book on Christ's Divinity

Further Impressions of Thoughtful Readers.

BY J. B. BRINEY.

When Mr. Ames stated in the little discussion he and I had in the columns of the Christian Standard, that he had a book in press on the divinity of Christ, and referred to that for his views on the subject, I naturally supposed that something new was to appear, and I hoped, rather against hope, I confess, that it would clearly differentiate his views on the divinity of Christ from Unitarianism. But I find that the book is composed of six sermons that had been preached and printed before, some of which I had read before our discussion began.

The sermon entitled, "Why I Am Not a Unitarian," is misnamed. It should be, "Why I Am Not of This or That Particular School of Unitarians," for there are different schools of that cult. Mr. Ames truly says that there is "great divergence of doctrine among its representative men," but their unifying principle is found in their common denial of the virgin birth of Christ, and their rejection of miracles as historical verities, and on these vital and characteristic features Mr. Ames manifestly stands with them. The reasons that he gives for not being a Unitarian are of a metaphysical and philosophical nature, while he fails in said sermon to grapple with Unitarianism proper.

The book is saturated with Unitarianism, though it is not so manifest where it might be expected to be found, namely, in the sermon just alluded to, and the one styled "The Divinity of Christ." One might read these sermons without detecting it unless in a severely critical mood; and if the question were to be decided simply in the light of these documents, perhaps a majority of readers would say that their author is not a Unitarian. But full-grown Unitarianism floats upon the very surface of the sermon on "The Empirical View of Jesus." There is no mistaking the import of the following language:

> Miracles and wonders were familiar to the Hebrew mind, as to all primitive minds, and consequently this teacher and leader was accredited with miracles and wonders. It was commonly believed that the gods took the women of the human race for wives, and it was inevitable that as Jesus came to be regarded as a great personage, this half divine, half human parentage should be ascribed to him also. That these miracles and this birth should still be regarded by informed men of the present day as actual, literal facts is striking evidence of how much of the primitive age of child wonder and savage credulity still survives in the world. The only reason one is under any obligation to treat these things with some consideration is that they have involved the profoundest reverence and allegiance of many believers.

Again:

> But on the other hand, if he really was like us, born of two human parents, nurtured by a good mother, schooled in the lore of his people, sensitive to its plaintive minor note, responsive to the best of the prophetic ideals and the wisdom of the wise men; able to translate all this into the beatitudes and the story of the prodigal son and the good Samaritan, * * * then he makes our hearts burn within us, he draws us into his fellowship, he affords us courage and faith and redeems us from all sin and weakness.

The meaning of these quotations is so plain that comment is not needed. They deny the virgin birth and miracles, and thus ally Mr. Ames with Unitarianism. But perhaps the most astounding statement in the book is the following:

> It was natural that the ancient Jewish Christians should associate the blood of Christ with the blood of the Lamb upon the ancestral altar. It is equally natural and right for us to associate the blood of Christ with the blood of our great suffering servant of his people, the martyred Abraham Lincoln.

The book also scouts the idea of an infallible Bible in the following fashion:

> Thus our notion of an infallible Bible arose in the seventeenth century and was directly occasioned by the need among Protestants for an offset to the infallible authority of Rome. It is highly amusing now to see this seventeenth century point of view projected back to the writers of the New Testament themselves and supported by a few texts of Scripture.

It is well that this book has been issued, for it definitely locates its author in the Unitarian camp. The little volume is well written, and its mechanical features are excellent.

Pewee Valley, Ky.

BY CARLOS C. ROWLISON.

Just now, there is no question so intensely before the minds of thinking Christian people as the question of the divinity of Christ. A short time ago, many were at sea as to the nature and value of the Bible. Now there is less agitation, and those who have had time to think the critical problems through at all, have come to rather definite working conclusions. We can patiently wait for criticism to secure its final results, but we have a real Bible that is more vitally ours than in any preceding age. But such a working conception of the nature of Christ has not yet been arrived at.

Meantime there is great uneasiness. Men who are clearly modern in their modes of thought and their attitude toward the universe find difficulty in admitting the Divinity of Christ, or any other uniqueness beyond that of extraordinary human greatness. And yet this attitude does not satisfy them. They have a profound feeling that Christ really is the master and savior of men. But how he performs such functions they have no way of explaining. If they are teachers of the young, they find themselves all the time confronted with questions of the most perplexing nature, and they are lost for satisfactory answers.

For such people, I know of nothing so helpful as this small book of six sermons, by Dr. E. S. Ames, on "The Divinity of Christ." Perhaps it ought to be read with R. F. Horton's "My Belief," by every one who is sincerely endeavoring to readjust his faith, and yet who has not the time for a course in systematic theology. Both these books are warm with life, while they are also sane, reliable and true to the underlying principles of genuine modern thought.

For those having had trouble with their older beliefs, and who have concluded that therefore they are Unitarians, Dr. Ames' sermon on Unitarianism will be the most valuable of all. This sermon has a most practical mission, for I find many such people who, because of this very conclusion, have lost their vital touch with religion. A wise pastor may have this chapter read with finest effect by those of his congregation who need it.

But for my own interest, the most valuable chapter in the book is the one entitled "The Empirical View of Jesus." Go back far enough, and all our difficulties about Jesus are the difficulties we encounter in really reconstructing the forms of thought by means of which we conceive our modern world. Theologically, therefore, this chapter works at the fundamental problem.

Though this volume is published as a book of sermons, the thought throughout has a genuine consecution. The first three sermons are more definitely theological, and form the mould for the systematic organization of the thought of this age about the meaning of Christ.

In the last three chapters of the book, one finds sermons that appeal to the highest ideals of the preacher. They are not primarily theological discussions, but are great appreciations of spiritual values that are found in Jesus. They are sermonic presentations that appeal to the universal in humanity, and would be in place in any age, and among any intelligent people. In these chapters we have revealed to us something of the reason why the people of his congregation, and others who know him, love Dr. Ames so dearly.

Iowa City, Iowa.

THE GOSPEL FOR BOTH WORLDS, by Edward Eells. This is a volume of ten sermons preached in the Presbyterian Memorial Church, Worcester, Mass., with the object of encouraging the hope of universal salvation. One is reminded in the reading of them of the earlier literature on the subject when much more attention was devoted to the question of universalism than is today. In this volume the plea is made for the reasonableness of the doctrine and its conformity to the scripture. Evidently in other volumes published by the author his reasons for maintaining his position are set forth. Such reasons are ably stated in Farrar's Mercy and Judgment, and possibly that and the other works are assumed by the author to be within easy reach of those who desire a compendium on this subject. The sermons are free from dogmatism, of a popular and easy style, pleasing, doubtless, those who heard them, and awakening a new interest in this age long theme. (Chicago: Sherman French & Company. 1911. Pp. 133.)

PRELUDES and INTERLUDES, by Amory H. Bradford. "No longer able to preach, I shall endeavor occasionally to suggest a few thoughts which may be helpful to our people." Such is the introductory note to "Preludes and Interludes," the greater number of which were written during the last months of this distinguished minister's forty year pastorate at Montclair, New Jersey. Often these messages were printed in the calendar of the church. "He used to say that their preparation required more time and thought than the writing of sermons." They are brief homilies of two or three pages on such subjects as "The Pastor's Creed;" "The Way of the Cross;" "Sin;" "Miracles;" "Prayer;" "The Passing of Hell;" and other themes equally important. Beauty and conciseness of expression characterize every one of these messages. This would be a charming gift book in ministerial circles; and for all who are familiar with the writings of Dr. Bradford a medium through which they may hear again the music of this noble preacher's ministry. Our Readers' Opinions

Editors The Christian Century: I must except to your views on capital punishment. Society is protected against criminals through fear, and not by means of the "golden rule." McNamara confessed to avoid capital punishment. This shows that capital punishment has more terrors for the criminal than life imprisonment, and is therefore a greater deterrent of crime. You say "the business of society is not to condemn, but to save criminals." I rather think the "business of society" is to protect itself against criminals, and to adopt the means most conducive to the end. Keep your guns trained on General Sweeney. Here you are in your own bailiwick, and are firing some splendid shots. I write to express my admiration.

Editors The Christian Century: I greatly enjoyed the essay on "The Blight of Legalism." I don't see how there can be any dissent from your position, or how any one could frame an answer. You will find as you write such articles that you are speaking for scores of our men; they have believed just such things for years without ever stating them, or having them stated for them. A few years ago I saw legalistic religion full-blown, and I knew, in spite of the shouting, that it was doomed. No religion at all would be an improvement on that.

Editors The Christian Century: Your editorial par excellence in the current Century on "The Blight of Legalism" was read and read again—the first editorial I've reread in years.

Editors The Christian Century. It rejoiced my heart to have you use the word "immoral" in characterizing our practical attitude of fellowship with neighboring Christians, and then preaching from our pulpits a doctrine that cuts them out of the Church of Christ. I confess with shame that I did that very thing myself for several years of my earlier ministry, until the good spirit showed me I was playing the hypocrite. I am now less sure about myself that I am about many of them. For better or worse we are one, and we must try to fix up our small differences so we may truly express our unity.

Editors The Christian Century: I love the spirit of the paper, and wish you much success in your great work. May heaven's richest blessings rest on your labors.

Editors The Christian Century: You are certainly publishing a great paper. It is the one church paper that comes to my desk that I read.

Editors The Christian Century: I am irresistably impelled to write this note to you on whose face I have never looked. In the spirit of Christian liberty and culture you are making a great Christian paper. To me it seems ideal. You have chosen the highest Christian course. That way lies progress and ultimate success."

Editors The Christian Century: I read with increasing interest your leadership in the editorials of The Century. I am with you intellectually in the position you take relative to the unimmersed Christians. I do not think 5 per cent of our ministry regard them as other than fellow Christians. As a matter of expediency, however, I question seriously any attempt to urge the matter on the brotherhood. The prime matter with many of us pastors is to emancipate some of our folks from the old dogmatic theology of baptism in its relation to the remission of sins, and in doing this we are accomplishing a vast deal. Still, of course, a paper to really lead, has to go ahead of its constituency—this I know—but I believe there is a danger of your getting too far ahead of the rank and file on this one proposition, and Mr. Editor, you and I and every other man who wants to serve the cause must consider the masses, the common people, the man of the streets. In a sense of course I know this is just what you are doing or seeking to do in calling for a re-examination of the baptism question. Many things that used to perplex and even distress me have "changed front" since I no longer think of the church and the kingdom as identical. Wonder now how I ever came to think that the New Testament taught that they are. Surely there are a vast host in the kingdom who are not in the church and alas! alas! there are some in the church who are not in the kingdom, if the latter is indeed the spiritual commonwealth of all who are living or desiring to live close to God through prayer and service.

Wants a Demonstration

Editors The Christian Century: In The Christian Century of January 18, S. D. McConnell tells of the difficulty of finding what he wanted in various church services and that as a fact he did not find it. Then he advises that the supreme task of the church is "to increase the flow of milk in her dry breasts for her own children."

This, we have all heard before and in various ways. Likewise everything and everybody via the magazines and the Sunday papers have informed us of the ineffectiveness of the church today and it may be all true.

But, whatever the truth in the case may be, will not some one of these wailing prophets "make the milk flow" and we can then get somewhere. Just one of the wailers to do this will meet a general demand. Also, will not at least one of the brethren who is so clear as to the ineffectiveness of the church kindly take hold and really show us a working church? Something worked out here on the surface of the earth by just one of these critics should now be forthcoming and it is up to them to show us.

This wailing spirit has been so long in the ascendency that something should come of it rather than more wails and deep groans. Let us now have the sure word of prophecy.

A Letter from Dr. Combs

Editors Christian Century: My attention has been called to a recent editorial in The Christian Century in which there is a recitation of certain "principles" to which a number of men among us are supposed to be connected. My own name appears on this list. Pleading guilty to having overlooked the article in question and knowing nothing of its contents I submit that any use of my name in such a connection that would seemingly place me in sympathy with The Christian Century's position as to baptism, is without justification. With that position I am in decided and entire disagreement and regretfully conclude that to the measure of its influence the course of The Christian Century in this matter is divisive and disruptive. No man in our brotherhood, I think, appreciates more fully the rare and beautiful personal qualities of The Christian Century's editors, the real fineness and attractiveness of their work, than do I, and out of this high heart regard I beg of them to cease this irritating propaganda whose only issuance is discord. Persistence in such a program means only further hurt.

Kansas City. Geo. H. Combs.

[We are somewhat puzzled to know how to understand Dr. Combs' letter. He writes to register his "decided and entire disagreement" "with The Century's position as to baptism." His name was not used, however, in connection with any position which may fitly be called The Century's position.

This paper affirmed the Disciples' position on six specific points, and referred to Dr. Combs and some fifty other representative men of the Disciples for endorsement of that position against a disputant who denied them. The Christian Century holds certain views on baptism and other subjects which might, no doubt, properly be referred to as The Century's own position. But these distinctive views were not included in the affirmations we made concerning the Disciples. We made no use of Dr. Combs' name in connection with them. Yet Dr. Combs declares that he is in "decided and entire disagreement" with our views as to baptism. Thus we wonder if Dr. Combs read for himself the six affirmations concerning the Disciples position? He says his attention was called to the editorial, but further on he pleads "guilty" to having "overlooked the article," and, "knowing nothing of its contents" he submits a protest against the use of his name. It would seem hardly possible that a man of Dr. Combs' wisdom would make a public denial of a statement he had not read on the basis of his attention having been called to it by some one else who had read it. But it is much more charitable to construe his communication in that way than to take him literally. It is inconceivable to us that he disagrees with that portion of our position on baptism in which we stand in accord with the best Disciple conviction of today. It was this portion of our position only to which we confidently referred to Dr. Combs for endorsement. Let us repeat here briefly what Dr. Combs' denial involves. It was affirmed by The Christian Century:

1. That the Disciples believe that Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregationalist churches are churches of Christ.
2. That the Disciples believe that the members of these churches are members of the Church of Christ.
3. That the Disciples know of no other way of admission into the Church of Christ except by being baptized into it.
4. That the Disciples believe that baptism as administered by these churches,—irregular, defective and objectionable as they regard the manner of its administration—does actually induct men into the church of Christ, and is therefore valid.
5. That Disciples do not believe that baptism is a physical act.
6. That Disciples believe that immersion only should be practiced in the administration of baptism as a loving testimonial to Christ and a means to Christian unity.

Is Dr. Combs in "decided and entire disagreement" with these affirmations? With them all? With any one of them? We make bold for his own sake to reaffirm our former statement that he endorses them all. We believe every truly representative Disciple endorses them. And until Dr. Combs offers a direct disavowal of one or more of these specific affirmations we feel in duty bound to protect his reputation in the eyes of our readers against the informant who in calling his attention to our article gave him a misapprehension of what we said.—The Editors.]

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

Woman and Child Bearing

"Time was when the first and all important duty of the female to society was to bear children, and to bear unceasingly. On the adequate and persistent performance of this passive form of labor depended, not merely the welfare, but often the very existence of the tribe or nation. Where, as is the case among almost all barbarous peoples, the rate of infant mortality is high; where the unceasing casualties resulting from war, the chase, and acts of personal violence tend continually to reduce the number of adult males; where, surgical knowledge being still in its infancy, most wounds are fatal; where, above all, recurrent pestilence and famine, unfailing if of irregular recurrence, decimated the people, it has been all important that woman should employ her creative power to its uttermost limits, if the race were not at once to dwindle and die out. 'May thy wife's womb never cease from bearing,' is still today the highest expression of good will on the part of a native African chief to his departing guest. For, not only does the prolific woman in the primitive state contribute to the wealth and struggle of her nation as a whole, but to that of her husband and of her family. Incessant and persistent child bearing is thus truly the highest duty of the primitive woman, equalling fully in social importance the labor of man as hunter and warrior.

"Throughout the middle ages of Europe, and down almost to our own day, the demand for continuous child bearing has been considered woman's loftiest duty; the rate of infant mortality was almost as large as in a savage state; medical ignorance destroyed innumerable lives; antiseptic surgery being unknown, serious wounds were still almost always fatal; in the low state of sanitary science, plagues swept across the civilized world, from India to Northern Europe, well nigh depopulating the globe; while wars were not only far more common, but, owing to the famines which almost invariably followed them, were far more destructive to human life than in our own days. So strong was the consciousness of the importance to society of continuous child bearing on the part of woman, that as late as the middle of the sixteenth century Martin Luther wrote: 'If a woman becomes weary, or at last dead from child bearing, that matters not; let her die from bearing—she is here to do it.'

"Today, everything tends toward a decrease of human mortality. The infant death rate among the upper classes in modern civilization has fallen by more than one-half; while among the poorer classes it is more slowly falling; the increased knowledge of the laws of sanitation has made the plague a thing of the past among all civilized peoples. Famines of the old desolating type have become an impossibility where rapid transportation obtains; while war is becoming episodal in the lives of nations as of individuals; and the vast advances in antiseptic surgery have immensely decreased fatalities from wounds and accidents. All these changes have tended to diminish mortality and protract life, and have already made it possible for a race not only to maintain its numbers, but even to increase them, with a comparatively small expenditure of woman's vitality in the labor of child bearing.

"The demand for woman's labor as a child bearer has diminished in another direction. Every mechanical invention which lessens the necessity for untrained muscular human labor, diminishes also the social demand upon woman as the producer in large masses of such laborers. The demand now is not merely for human creatures in the bulk for use as beasts of burden, but rather for human creatures trained for the more complex duties of modern life—not now for many men, but rather for few men, and those well born, and well instructed. So difficult and expensive has become today the rearing and training of even one individual in a manner suited to fit it for coping with civilized life, that to the family, as well as the state, unlimited fecundity on the part of the female, has already, in most cases, become an irremediable evil. . . . . The command to the modern woman is not now simply, 'Thou shalt bear,' but rather, 'Thou shalt not bear in excess of thy power to rear and train efficiently.'"

Woman's World

—Miss Grace Strachan, the woman teacher who brought about the equal pay for equal work ruling of the New York legislature, says that $100,000 was spent, not as pay for legislation, but in fees to lawyers to accomplish it.

—The pearl divers of Japan are women. Along the coast on the bay of Ago and the bay of Kokasho the 13 and 14 year old girls, after they have finished their primary school work, go to sea and learn to dive. They are in the water and learn to swim almost from babyhood. They pass most of their time in the water, except in the coldest season, from the end of December to the beginning of February. Even during the most inclement of seasons they sometimes dive for pearls. They wear a special dress and the hair twisted up into a hard knot.

—Mrs. W. C. Anderson, wife of the chairman of the independent labor party of England, known in this country as Miss Mary MacArthur, was with her husband in the campaign that was carried on recently for member of parliament. They began the work before the end of the honeymoon, and found it most interesting. She chatted with the wives and children of the poor of Yorkshire while her husband made speeches to the men.

—Miss Edith Campbell of Cincinnati, is said to be the first woman for whom a president of the United States has ever voted. She is the first woman elected to any public office in Cincinnati and the first candidate ever elected to the board of education on an independent ticket. Miss Campbell is a graduate of Cincinnati university. She was appointed by Gov. Harmon to the state board of woman visitors to inspect public charitable institutions, and is said to have been largely responsible for the investigation of conditions in the Delaware (O.) industrial home for girls, which recently aroused clubwomen.

—Selma Lagerlof, who received the Nobel literature prize in 1909, seems to be the idol of her Swedish compatriots. To celebrate the awarding of the prize, as well as her fiftieth birthday, a woman's dinner party was given at the beautiful Grand Hotel Royal, Stockholm, at which 1,200 women were present.

—The feminine element is larger than ever on the latest matriculation lists of Berlin University. This semester 334 freshwomen have entered the university. There are now enrolled 845 women students and 270 additional women have permission to attend the lectures. Of this total of 1,115 women students, sixty of whom come from the United States, no fewer than 659 are inscribed on the philosophical faculty roster, 172 study medicine, thirteen law and only one theology.

—Princess Patricia of Connaught, who, according to her pictures in the daily press, is decidedly homely, is the first princess of the English blood royal ever to set foot on the soil of the United States. She is twenty-six years old, and is said to be democratic, whatever that means when applied to a princess. She was the favorite niece of King Edward. She is an accomplished horsewoman, and has shot big game in Africa. It is said that she once refused the proffered hand of King Alfonso of Spain.

—The Empress of Germany has appointed a commission to look into the state of the beggar children of Germany. Her interest in these children was aroused by a book, "The Little White Slaves," recently published by Henrietta Arendt, a member of the Stuttgart police force. In this book Miss Arendt is said to prove that cripple factories still exist and carry on a thriving trade in the larger German cities as well as in Paris and London.

—Clara Barton, Betsy Ross, Susan B. Anthony, and May Arkwright Hutton, are to have voting precincts named after them in the state of Washington.

—Kate Shelly, the only person to whom the state of Iowa ever granted a gold medal for heroism, died on January 21, at her home near the scene of her heroic act of 1881. The deed which placed her name in the list of heroines was a bright example of the courage of a fifteen-year-old girl who believed she was saving the lives of the passengers on a limited train on the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad, although later developments proved the number of lives she actually saved was two.

—Mrs. Henry White, wife of the well known American diplomat who served in almost every court in Europe, is the authority for the statement that the nationality of a woman may be easily betrayed by the kind of fancy work in which she engages as she sits on hotel verandas in famous spas or resorts of Europe.

Between the Ring and the Altar

BY MARY MADELINE WOOD.

Between ground is always unsafe ground, or perhaps I would better say, debatable ground. This is where the engaged girl of today stands. The final leap to what should be security has not been made. Two people have become engaged who at the best have only a very superficial knowledge of each other. They have met under favorable circumstances. Each has striven to please the other, to make a favorable impression, and, judging by the engagement, they have succeeded.

The reasons for this engagement may be any one of several. It may be pure and true love—the meeting of persons whose taste and desires are of sufficient similarity to promise a congenial life together. It may be passion instead of real love which has brought them together; one may have appealed to the sensual nature of the other in an unusual degree. Again, it may not be love—the love which will endure—but simply a light and passing fancy. Or it may be that the young man has decided that it was about time he married and settled down to the comforts of a home and the responsibility of a husband and father, and therefore he may have been "looking out" for a girl whom he thought he "could get along with," one who would not require too much—make too many demands upon him; or one who would reflect credit upon the establishment he could give her. Perhaps one whom he imagined would be economical, or who would be a good mother to his prospective children.

A Girl's Reasons.

The girl, on her part, may become engaged for an equal variety of reasons, aside from the only one—love—which ever justifies marriage. She may ardently desire a home of her own: she may find friction, or too many demands made upon her, in her father's house. She may decide that it is time she became her own mistress. She may wish to be relieved from the drudgery of earning her own living. She may wish for a brilliant wedding in which she will figure as one of the principals, and the most interesting actor. Or an elegant trousseau may be the impelling motive.

There are innumerable reasons why a man or a woman may decide to marry other than love, which is the only sanctifier of the marriage relation, and the only thing which will enable two human beings of opposite sex, of diverse tastes and aspirations, whose environments have been dissimilar, who have been educated on different lines, and whose outlook upon life is different, to grow together, in thought and purpose, to live harmoniously and joyfully together.

Her Behavior the Factor.

It depends, it is true, in part upon what the reasons are for the promise which has been asked and given, whether the two leave the debatable ground of engagement hand in hand, stepping upon the firmer soil of married life, or if they turn back, single-handed, to their former state. Yet the behaviour of the girl during the crucial or engagement period is by far the larger factor.

Whichever happens, it is largely the girl who is responsible. Hers is the demanding nature. She looks for attention, deference, money to be spent upon her, entertainments furnished, and many other attractions which the lover is to provide. If he does not do so freely, of his own initiative, the average engaged girl of today will have little hesitancy in "hinting" for these things; and if hints fail, none at all in first asking, then demanding them.

The Man Yields Most.

The promised husband is yielding far more than the promised wife in simple material matters, and is assuming in these matters far greater responsibilities. The making and the providing of a home is to be his. The winning and holding a place in the business world his. On the other hand, the responsibilities of the wife-to-be are greater in other lines, in other respects. It is she who must keep the house and make the home happy; she must send her husband forth day by day fitted to grapple with the problems of existence. By virtue of her tact, her womanly charm, her grace of personality, society will open or close its doors to them, although it must be remembered that the class of society to which she will be admitted will be the class to which her husband has claim.

But the promised wife's conduct during the period of engagement, is now a matter of very great importance. Many a man would be glad to call the bargain off forty-eight hours after he had declared himself as an impassioned suitor, could he do so without loss of his pride and self-respect. The engaged girl is responsible for this. She has already made him question the wisdom of his choice. She has thrown aside some of the girlish graces, some of the conventionalities, some of the deference—for woman usually does pay man deference until she marries him, and unfortunate indeed, is the woman who then ceases to give deference to her husband's wishes, to his tastes, to his comfort, to his wisdom; the wise wife always yields, and finds a pleasure in so doing, remembering that other deference he instinctly yields her if she is deserving thereof.

The Quicksand.

But the quicksand on which the engaged girl is oftenest lost is doubtless that of demand and possession. She feels that she has achieved the great thing in life. She has become engaged. Some man has recognized her superiority over all her young friends—over all the girls he knows, and has placed her on the pedestal of exalted perfection, wishing to give her his name, to share with her his home, in the making of which he has conceded that she is worthy to bear a large part; he has selected her as the one woman in all the world adapted to always be at his side, to bear his children and to represent him in the ways in which a married woman must always represent her husband.

Unless the girl is very sensible, this thought is apt to become the entering wedge to their disunion, or lack of consummation of union. She is proud—and any girl does well to be proud of a good man's love, as he of hers—but she may have that weak pride which likes to show off the promised husband as a satellite, so to speak; she wants every one to know that he is to be hers; she takes possession of him, so to speak; she orders him around; if she desires to go anywhere, he must drop business and accompany her, otherwise she accuses him of lack of love, and tears soon bring the untried man to terms.

The Rift.

In too many instances he becomes disgusted with this, and with her freedom of manner. Then she commences to censure his friends, and to come between them and him so far as she can. She also demands a rigorous account of the manner in which he spends his time. She has always been accustomed to the oversight of her parents; he has not for years; he has had the man's right of going when and where he chose without oversight, without supervision, comment or criticism. The newly engaged girl proposes to change this, and is so insistent in knowing all about his affairs and his friends, that in many instances he soon wishes he had not been so hasty, and looks about for a convenient projecting hook on which to hang some reasonable reason for breaking the engagement.

Let engaged girls remember that in becoming engaged they have only crossed half way over from girlhood to married life, and they must be careful to keep the charms of manner and of speech which won. Probably there would be ten broken engagements where there is but one, and for these very reasons, did the man consider himself as free to break an engagement as he was to enter upon it.

—Noel Lambezellec, fisherman, twenty-one years old, of Brest, France, saved eight lives in March last, and was one of those who received the Carnegie reward for heroism, presented by ex-President Loubet on Christmas eve. He had earned his reward by an act of valor that was beyond question.

Three Books for Girls

MOTHER CAREY'S CHICKENS, by Kate Douglas Wiggin. Children's books were rare when I was a little girl, and they were entirely different from what they are now. I remember a book I read out of a Sunday-school library, whose heroine, little Ellen, was so faultless and so instructive that she filled me with despair; she said long prayers, she was not afraid of thunder storms, she did not care for pretty clothes, and was continually admonishing a frivolous cousin who visited her. There never was, on sea or land, such another child as little Ellen. Of course, this youthful paragon died young, for goodness, in that style of book, was generally a fatal disease, that took them off in their early bloom. My hopelessness of ever emulating little Ellen's virtues, my grief at her untimely end, was one of the shadows on my childhood—I am not sure I am quite over it yet! How different are the true and helpful books for girls today! And what a pearl among them is "Mother Carey's Chickens!" I suppose there is no child's book of the year at all comparable to it, unless it be "The Secret Garden," by Mrs. Burnett. While the author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy" has thrown around the boy and girl in it all her well known charm, yet in spite of the beautiful background of an old English castle the story is not altogether pleasing, because neither of the children are wholesome—in fact, they are distinctly abnormal. But all four of the Carey children, Nancy, Gilbert, Kathleen and Peter are perfectly dear. Mrs. Wiggin's Rebecca has been called the "nicest child in American literature," but Nancy Carey is a formidable rival to her. And Mother Carey is the dearest of the whole brood—the ideal American mother! May her tribe increase! (Boston, Houghton Mifflin Company. Price $1.25 net.)

MADGE AT CAMP WELLES, by Edith A. Sawyer. This is another story for girls, and it tells of a summer camp, in a setting of beautiful New Hampshire hills and lakes. While it has a New England background, and a number of New England characters, the heroine is a spirited Western girl, two of the teachers are from the South, and one of the leading characters is Uta, a picturesque Japanese girl. The negro cook and waiter lend variety to the camp, though they speak a dialect that no southern born darkey ever used. Why will authors make their characters speak in tongues unknown to them! A neighboring boys' camp gives the necessary masculine element, and the unexpected marriage of one of the teachers furnishes a romantic flavor to the close. It is a pleasant story from beginning to end, full of touches of nature, and the overflowing vitality of American girlhood; we feel after reading it, that we have been out in the woods, enjoying the free outdoor life that only a summer camp affords. (Boston, W. A. Wilde Company. Price $1.50.)

SIX GIRLS AND BETTY, by Marion Ames Taggart. This is the sixth in Miss Taggart's Six Girls Series. It is like meeting old friends to greet again the charming sisters, Margery, Happie, Laura, Polly, Penny, and the sweet little niece, Bettie Blossom. Some of the girls are mothers now, and have their own little daughters, but the spirit of youth, and high hope and love are still in their hearts. It is a book of home and family life, and the group of girls make us think of the immortal "Little Women"—in fact, Miss Taggart has often been called a second Miss Alcott. The book is full of entertaining situations and incidents, and its influence is all for good. It is handsomely bound, and attractively illustrated. (Boston, W. A. Wilde Company. Price $1.50.)

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

Tuscola Church, where Lewis R. Hotaling is minister, has in recent weeks received ten additions, five of whom were by baptism.

The Bennett and Castle meeting at Noble, with Pastor M. O. Dutcher, had added thirty-three persons to the church at last report.

At Bowen, where Sword and Kay have been conducting a meeting for three weeks, there have been twenty-seven additions. The pastor is C. R. Gains.

J. E. Stout is in a revival at Oden, where he is seeking to enliven the congregation. There have been twenty-eight additions, twent being by baptism, and the edifice is being crowded nightly.

At Stanford, where Norman R. Robertson is pastor, the additions last year numbered thirty-two, and the congregation contributed for missions $534. Fro mall sources, there was received a total of $3,170.

C. W Cummings, who has been pastor at Knoxville, has received and accepted a call to the church at Ipava. By the time this is in print, this pastor will have been settled in his new charge.

Barry Church has invited H. L. Maltman to become its pastor. The invitation has been accepted, and Mr. Maltman will shortly begin his labor there, removing from Rushville, where he has formerly been pastor.

The Breeden-Rockwell meeting in University Church, Champaign, had resulted in twenty additions at last report. Since the severe weather has passed, congregations are large and a fine spirit is showing itself in the meeting.

In the great campaign at Paris, where Lockhart and Lintt are assisting Pastor Sniff, there have been more than one hundred additions, and the capacity of the church building is not sufficient to accommodate the multitudes in attendance.

Clinton Church is having a revival meeting conducted by its pastor, J. F. Rosborough, assisted by J. K. O'Neil as singer. An unusual interest is being manifested in the meeting, and at last report thirty-five additions had been received.

The pulpit of First Church, Danville, was supplied on the last Sunday morning of January by W. R. Warren, editor of The Christian Evangelist. The pastor, W. E. Adams is in Ohio holding a revival meeting.

The Herbert Yeuell revival meeting at Centennial Church, Bloomington, is attracting large congregations of people, and the evangelist's sermons are listened to with unusual interest. At last report there had been about forty additions.

The Rudy-Golden meeting at West Side Church, Springfield, was nearing its conclusion with eleven additions. Good congregations have been hearing the evangelist, and his message has been meeting with the approval of the church people.

In two weeks' revival services at Fisher, the pastor, J. Frank Hollingsworth, had received nineteen additions, most of whom were on profession of faith. The pastor is being assisted by Walter Scott as singer. The meeting is continuing.

Major Griffith's meeting at Allenville closed with a total of fifty-four additions. The house was filled to its capacity at practically every service, nothwithstanding the most unfavorable weather. Mr. Griffith is pastor of this congregation.

At Canton, where J. G. Waggoner is pastor, there were twenty-seven additions last year to the church. Three hundred and five dollars was contributed to missions and benevolence, and a total of two thousand six hundred dollars was raised for all purposes.

The union revival meeting at Flanagan, being conducted by B. L. Wray, had counted twenty-eight additions shortly before its close. Mr. Wray, who is continuously in the evangelistic field, was to enter upon a meeting at Rutland immediately after concluding at Flanagan.

A revival meeting at Atlas, which lasted for three weeks, was concluded with eighty-five additions, all but thirteen of these being by baptism. The men among this number considerably outnumbered the women. The evangelists were B. G. Reavis and W. W. Robertson.

M. W. Yocom, who has been pastor at Taylorville for two years, has received an unanimous call from First Church, Jeffersonville, Indiana. It is probable the call will be accepted, though definite anouncement has not yet been made to that effect. The chrurch at Taylorville is a strong church, as is also the church in Jeffersonville.

C. R. Piety, who is pastor of Sheldon Church, was recently surprised by his congregation, who came in large numbers and left a variety of goods for the culinary department of the house. The relations between pastor and people here are most cordial, and as a result of this mutual trust the church is prospering.

Evangelist C. L. Organ's meeting at Greenview resulted in fifty-two additions, and large congregations listened to the evangelist's message. Interest grew amazingly up to the last. On the last Sunday night there were twenty-one responses to the invitation, and it was generally recognized the meeting should have been continued.

Evangelist F. F. Walters, assisting the congregation at Shelbyville in a revival meeting, had succeeded in reaching eight additions at last account, with the revival to continue another week. Mr. Walters will, immediately on concluding his meeting at Shelbyville, begin a similar effort at Edwardsville. He is available for other meetings in the spring, and may be addressed at the latter town.

At Moline, the revival meeting conducted by the pastor, W. B. Slater assisted by singing evangelist George E. Crist, was concluded with a total of forty-one additions, all but three of these being on profession of faith. This church has been established only a few years, and is still being assisted by the Jacksonville church, through the agency of the State Board. Progress is being made, which undoubtedly will in a short time render the congregation self-supporting.

A reception, attended by a company of people entirely filling the church, was extended Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Jenner at Stuart Street, Springfield, the night before their departure for the new pastorate. Mr. Jenner began his ministry at Long Point Church last Sunday. The last ministry performed in his pastorate at Springfield before leaving was the administration of baptism to four persons, and the receiving of one individual into the church by statement. At the reception, in their honor, generous words of appreciation were spoken by members of Stuart Street Church and other Disciple churches of the city, and a farewell message from the pastor and his wife.

James M. Haughey of Mason City, a pioneer preacher of central Illinois, passed to his reward January 29, after an illness lasting but four days. Mr. Haughey was seveny-eight years old, was a native of Ohio, and had lived in Illinois since 1856, three years later than this becoming a Christian. He was at first in the Baptist ministry but afterwards entered the ministry of the Disciples. It is reported of him that he married more than sixteen hundred couples, officiated at an equal number of funerals, and was evangelistically successful in his ministry. His funeral was conducted at Mason City, O. C. Bolman of Pekin being the officiating minister.

A very neat annual directory of Eureka Church has recently been distributed to the congregation. It contains information of local and national interest. Under the head of "Family Affairs" the pastor gives a summary of last year's work, showing that there was given for college endowment from this church last year almost twenty thousand dollars, and that the Brotherhood pledged two thousand two hundred thirty-eight dollars for the National Brotherhood expense. The congregation now numbers seven hundred eighty-three, including forty-six additions during the year. The duplex envelope was used so successfully last year for gathering funds for local expenses and for missions, that the system is to be perpetuated. Aside from the money given for endowment, there was raised for current expenses about four thousand twenty dollars, making a total of all monies raised during the year twenty-six thousand eight dollars. The successful pastor of this church is David H. Shields, whose pastorate had continued for about three years.

Church Life

F. M. Fields, of the Norwood Avenue Church, of Toledo, will hold a meeting next month with the church at Hicksville, Ohio. D. F. Harris is the minister at Hicksville.

Ten congregations among the Disciples annually give over $1,000 each to Foreign Missions. They are Akron, O., Richmond, Va., Des Moines, Ia., Cleveland, O., Los Angeles, Cal., Beatrice, Neb., Chicago, Ill., (Hyde Park), Chicago (Englewood), Ill., Hopkinsville, Ky., Cincinnati, O.

The South Side Church of Akron, Ohio, of which W. G. Loucks is the efficient minister, has recently become self-supporting. This congregation is a child of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society, and has made splendid progress during the past four years. Their Sunday-school had an average of 247 during 1911.

Evangelist John T. Brown, of Louisville, Ky., assisted by Miss Una Dell Berry, of LaFayette, Indiana, is holding a meeting in the Norwood Avenue Church of Toledo, of which F. M. Field is the minister. During the first two weeks of the meeting the work was greatly retarded by the extremely cold weather.. Up to last report there had been sixty-six additions.

The Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, W. F. Rothenburger, pastor, held a two weeks' meeting with L. G. Batman, of Youngstown, doing the preaching. Mr. Batman delivered a strong social message in keeping with the needs of the hour, and in a most optimistic spirit. Despite the intensely cold and stormy weather, there were thirty-seven accessions to the church.

Ira M. Boswell, pastor of First Church, Chattanooga, Tenn., has been appointed by the local federation chairman of the committee whose duty it will be to interest the colored people in the Men and Religion Forward Movement. The churches in the South have a unique opportunity to influence the colored people and it is interesting and encouraging to see this effort to meet the situation.

Mrs. Martha Trimble, the only woman pastor in the Christian Church in Indiana, has resigned a charge at Michigan City, Ind., to accept a call to Fulton, Mo. Mrs. Trimble and her husband, who is also a preacher, were called to Gary, Ind., from Kansas City, and erected the first Christian Church in the steel town. Mrs. Trimble went to Michigan City from Gary, the Fulton call quickly following.

A branch of the American Peace Society was organized at the meetings which will be held at First Church, Lincoln, Neb., Monday, February 5. Charles E. Beals, western secretary of the American Peace Society, was present and delivered an address, as also was Rabbi Hirsch, one of the most prominent advocates of the work of the Peace Society in this country. Professor George E. Hoard, also delivered an address at the evening meeting and Professor F. M. Fling introduced a resolution in support of the arbitration treaty now pending in the United States senate.

Nathan Earl Beach reports that the meeting Parsons, Kansas, has reached a total of 1,002 additions. William H. Sanday has been addressing large bodies of railroad men in the shops at noon. Mr. Minges, the evangelist, and Mr. Beach have both been preaching special sermons to the railroad men. Mr. Mallory, the pastor, has been confined to his bed for a few days but is better now. The tabernacle is far too small for the audiences.

B. S. Ferrall writes: State Supt., N. C. Prewitt of Niagra Falls, planned and conducted a valuable Sunday-school institute in the interest of the Niagara Frontier Schools, Sunday p. m., Jan. 21, at the Jeff St., Church, Buffalo. N. Y. He introduced our warm-hearted, genial and efficient National Supt., Robt. Hopkins, to representatives of eleven Frontier Schools, and these teachers and officers are far wiser in Sunday-school methods than ever before. Such gatherings should be encouraged in other sections of this good commonwealth and plans should be laid for the best Sunday-school session at State Convention at Keuka College, next June.

Evangelist Sunday is in one of his great campaigns in Canton, Ohio. Canton is one of the best church-going and Sunday-school-attending cities in Ohio, and as a consequence it is likely to be Mr. Sunday's record meeting. The Christian Church at Canton is one of the largest and most widely known congregation in our brotherhood. Immediately after the Sunday campaign this church will dedicate its new building. This building will be unique among the Sunday-school buildings of our people; it is planned to accommodate a school of more than two thousand. We have but the one church in this city of fifty thousand people.

E. E. Moorman writes: The Englewood Christian Church, Indianapolis, closed a short revival effort last evening with their annual business meeting of the congregation. There were two confessions at the business meeting, making a total number of twenty-seven added. The reports showed an encouraging growth in all the departments of the church. In addition to a yearly increase of our running expenses, the church has paid off a $4,000 indebtedness in three years. The mortgage was burned with tears of rejoicing. The pastor's salary was increased $200 on the year. For the first time since the building was erected the Englewood church is out of debt and a surplus in the treasury.

From March 9 to April 7, Cincinnati is to have a wonderful eposition of missionary work throughout the world. It is to be held in the great Music Hall, and its annexes, and will be on a very large scale. The exposition is to cost something near $100,000, and ten thousand stewards from the local churches are to be engaged in it in the exhibitions and pageant. This is the second appearance of this great exposition in America. The first was in Boston last year, where 376,000 people were in attendance through the month that it was held. In this exposition will be reproduced native life, mission conditions and mission victories in the great missonary fields of the world. In the afternoon at 3 o'clock and at night at 7:30 the missionary pageant of "Darkness and Light" will be produced in Music Hall. Two hundred thousand people attended this pageant in Boston. It is a dramatic presentation of the great events of missionary history. No one who is interested in Christian work should miss it. The admission price is 25 cents, and 25 cents also to the pageant. The exposition will be self-sustaining. The Disciples of Christ will be strongly represented in this undertaking. Copies of the "World in Cincinnati Herald," fully explaining the exposition, will be sent free upon application to Stephen J. Corey, Box 884, Cincinnati, who is editor of that magazine.

INSPIRATIONS FOR THE MARCH OFFERING

MAKE THE DAY MEMORABLE.

The day for the annual offering for Foreign Missions in all the churches is one of tremendous importance. This is a great day throughout our whole brotherhood. Those that observe the day rejoice in their high privilege; those that do not, feel that they should do so. It is a day of enlargement and joy. It is the milestone that has marked our growth for a third of a century. It grows in significance with each passing year. Its importance this year is even greater than in the past.

1. Growth of the the Work. The growth of the past points unerringly to our possibilities. In a third of a century the Foreign Society has come to be a world power. It has grown firmly into the hearts of our people. Sons and daughters have been given to the service. Some have given life itself and now sleep beneath heathen soil. The income has grown every year for eighteen except two. The annual income has grown $207,184 in ten years. It has grown $104,755 in the past three years. Last year the receipts were $379,082, an increase over the previous year of $18,369. The average church offering has increased $11.85 in five years. There are now 128 Living-link churches and new ones are being added constantly. These figures cheer all Christian hearts.

2. Growth on the Foreign Fields. The wonderful things accomplished in the regions beyond by the Foreign Society thrill and inspire us all. Every day the medical missionaries treat 400 patients. Think of it! Last year they treated all told 157,988. Ten years ago they treated 45,838, five years ago 90,333. Note the increase. Ten years ago the Foreign Society had a total of 2,327 pupils and students in all schools. Today 5,096 report for recitations. Ten years ago less than a dozen were preparing for the Christian ministry, five years ago 79, last year 295, and this was a gain of 65 over the previous year. Ten years ago the Foreign Society had 159 native helpers, five years ago 333, last year 759. Ten years ago less than $10,000 was raised on the mission field for all purposes, five years ago $45,827, last year the amount raised reached the splendid sum of $52,579.

We are all justly proud of the splendid increase. In a single decade our magnificent work has grown up from practically nothing in Africa and the Philippines and Tibet. The great things accomplished in these three fields have challenged the world and thrilled our brotherhood. The missionaries supported by the Foreign Society toil in the Orient and in the Occident, in the burning heat of the tropics and in the cold of the northlands. They labor in the midst of different civilizations and touch many races and nationalities.

3. The Harvest of the World is Ripe. "Send forth thy sickle and reap; for the hour to reap is come; for the harvest of the earth is ripe." "And I saw another angel flying in mid heaven having eternal good tidings (the gospel) to proclaim unto them that dwell on the earth and unto every nation and tribe and tongue and people; and he said with a great voice 'Fear God and give him glory for the hour of his judgment is come, and worship him that made the heaven and the earth and the sea and the fountains of water.'"

The nations of the earth are being awakened from their long sleep of ages. Their cry is piteous. They ask for a guiding hand. We dare not close our ears and hearts to the overwhelming appeal that comes to us. How dare we? The gospel has been put into our hands as a trust. The world calls for its birthright. We dare not refuse to give it to men of all climes and tongues and races. Our gospel is their gospel. It is not ours to hold selfishly. It is ours to distribute. It is ours to "sound out" as did the church in Thesallonica. The more of this truth we give to others, the more we have to enjoy and to enrich our own lives.

Please begin now to make thorough preparation for a great offering the first Sunday in March. Order your March Offering supplies today.

NOTES FROM THE FOREIGN SOCIETY.

Dr. C. C. Drummond, Harda, India says, "We trust that the offerings this year will be far beyond what they have ever been. The work starts off this new year with promise. The evenagelists report some enquirers in the villages. We hope for visible results from the work this year such as we have not had."

D. O. Cunningham, writing from Bilaspur, January 4, says. "There were about eleven baptisms at Mungeli ten days ago. The work is progressing there."

The Best

The Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 are in The Life of Christ. You want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition has just been issued to meet the great demand. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

O. J. Crainger, Jubbulpore, India, writing to President McLean, says, "We are remembering you and the secretaries of the society these days when the rallies are going on. We realize that very much depends upon your work in awakening the churches to the missionary call. Jubbulpore is in the midst of an epidemic of plague. The city is deserted. This has occurred every second year since we have been at work here. About sixteen of our Christian families have had to leave their homes and are living in grass huts. The probability is that the epidemic will last for about six weeks. We pray it may not be longer."

C. E. Robinson, writing from Sendai, Japan, January 5, says, "I am happy to report two baptisms at Fukushima during the month of December. This makes twenty that our John the Baptist, Mr. Hawamura, has led to obey the gospel during the calendar year. A leading member of one of the small congregations some months ago became indifferent and even backslid in heart and life, but on Christmas day he reported with deep emotion and promises to continue faithful in the service of the Master."

The work continues to grow in India. H. C. Saum reports the baptism of four girls from the orphanage at Bilaspur, Sunday, December 31, and he expected to baptize two or three from caste the Sunday following.

The missionaries at Harda, India, report two baptisms both from caste on December 19.

Through the kindness of the Australian brethren 1048 school children in Harda, India, received remembrances at Christmas time. Some received copybooks, some pencils, some cards, others clothing, and some a handful of sweets.

James Ware, writing from Shanghai, China, says, "Brother Sarvis and wife are doing fine in the language. I wish we could keep them here, but they are needed in Nankin badly enough. Send a dozen more like them."

Alexander Paul, who has had large experience in China, expresses himself as follows on the present revolution in China: "We are optimistic as to the results of the revolution, whichever side may win, it can only spell advance. It will mean greater opportunities than ever before to carry on our work."

It is time for the churches to be all astir in preparation for the annual offering for foreign missions the first Sunday in March. Many churches are planning large things. Let this spirit sweep through all the churches and we will all rejoice in a great victory.

The Foreign Society is selling more mission books than ever before. The first edition of "Social Work of Christian Missions," by A. W. Taylor, is all gone and we have a stack of orders awaiting the second edition. The seventh edition of "Bolenge," by Mrs. Dr. Dye, is now on the press. "Ten Lessons in World Conquest," by S. J. Corey goes like hot cakes. About 2,000 copies have already been sold. The Missionary Intelligencer was never so popular. We are doing the best we know along all lines.

CHRISTMAS DAY IN LUCHOWFU, CHINA.

War, or rather rumors of war, had made it seem wise to most of the missionaries to leave the city for a place of greater safety. For some weeks Mr. Buck and I have been holding the fort for the Master. It has not been a trying situation as the only sign of war near us has been the enrollment of about 3,000 volunteer soldiers and their constant drilling. At the beginning of the revolution we heard many rumors of trouble for our city. Recently the city has been exceedingly quiet and even free from rumors. Our work is going on almost as if there were no war in China. The daily clinic even in the absence of the foreign doctor is large and the wards are fairly well filled. The evangelistic meetings, both at the hospital and at the Street Chapel, are up to the usual mark. Our three schools are going on as usual, while all the government schools are closed. Only our girls' school has been closed as all the foreign women are away. It seems that peace will soon be established and all can come back to their work. This short interruption will mean greater opportunities for mission work than ever before.

It has been the custom of the Christians to get together for a social occasion on Christmas day. Tea, nuts and sweets are usually provided by taking up a collection. They usually have some sort of public meeting. This year I planned an all day meeting with the Christians and we decided it was best to have no public meeting, so we made no effort to decorate the chapel as this would have drawn a crowd of the outside public. The only announcement was a written invitation to the Christians and inquirers, inviting them to the meeting and also to a Christmas dinner given by Mr. Buck and I. We had a very pleasant day together.

At eleven o'clock we had the Christmas meeting and Mr. Hsia, the Chinese evangelist, preached the sermon. After this the seventy-five of us gathered about the eight tables, with our chopsticks, rice-bowls and tea-cups. We all enjoyed the six or seven course Chinese dinner and had an excellent social time.

After a rest of about an hour we came together again in the chapel and held a church meeting discussing plans for next year's work. As the Christians had not been asked to help pay for the "eats" they gladly took up a collection to help remove a deficit in the annual account. This deficit was brought about by some extra expenses incurred in the work at Liangyuen, which the local church supports. There was also a deficit of some sixty dollars mex., on the new chapel just completed at Liangyuen. This will have to go over for a year or two and I advanced it personally rather than see the building of the chapel postponed. The work at Liangyuen is very promising, but because of the removal of one or two well paying members, the local church will be hard pressed for funds with which to carry on this work.

Mr. Hsia forcibly presented this problem to the members and urged them all to be a little more liberal in their subscriptions for next year. Then the subscription blanks were distributed to be handed in next Sunday. It will take some hard work and some sacrifice on the part of the Christians, but I feel that they can keep the work going.

Heretofore the missionary has directed all the church work, of course with frequent consultations with the Chinese workers. This year I have urged the church to formally appoint a committee to have charge of this work. Two Chinese were appointed on the committee with men and this committee will probably be enlarged soon. In this way we hope to put more system into our church work and thereby to accomplish more. This committee with the consent of the church will direct the church work in the city and the two out stations.

One of the members announced his purpose of giving some money and his time toward the development of some industrial work for the help of the needy Christians and inquirers. The plans for this are only in the bud, but we hope it will blossom out into something useful.

Mr. Buck called in the boys from our school and they gave a short entertainment which we all enjoyed. This was followed by tea and nuts and sweets and when we finished with that it was beginning to show signs that the day was about over, but it had been a pleasant day and we hope profitable as well. We hope much good will come of it. The Christians were pleased and they are enthusiastic about the work. The prospect in Luchowful is growing brighter.

THE SITUATION IN CHINA.

The situation here is serious. The peace convention seems likely to fail. The contending parties are fighting among themselves. The drift seems to be toward foreign intervention and that means the sacrifice of many foreign lives in the inland stations.

Our consular and diplomatic bodies have ordered us out and should any of the men stay or visit the mission stations, to be very cautious.

The Revolution is widespread and determined. Mr. Hertzog thought the Revolution was a mere local rising and prophecied that it would all be over like an April shower.

The missionaries are all well. We are establishing a Red Cross in Chuchow. Dr. Osgood has done fine work, but without Evangelist Shi we could have accomplished nothing there. In God's hands he was the instrument in the saving of the city. Red Cross is about the only work missionaries can actively do now. In this we can do effective service for Christ, but the strain and the drain on nerve and strength is great. Pray for us often. The Lord give us a mighty energy of love that will exalt only Jesus our Christ in all our service.

W. R. Hunt.

Chuchow, China, Dec. 20, 1911.

INDIA NOTES.

The Christmas holidays were enlivened in some of our Indian stations by the presence of visitors from America. Mr. and Mrs. Hertzog, of Hiram, spent Christmas in Jubbulpore, and Miss Newcomer, C. W. B. M. secretary of Iowa, spent the day in Harda. It is not often that we have such visitors, and their presence with us is always much appreciated.

Mrs. Brown and I were able to spend the holidays in Jubbulpore, also. On December 1 we went to Benares to assist in the revision of the Hindi Old Testament, and worked there until the 22nd of December. On the 1st of January we came to Mirzapur, where the committee is now in session, and expect to stay here until the 1st of March, when we will have to return to our regular work. Of course we will by no means be able to go through the whole Old Testament in that time, but we are working as hard at it as we can. It is a difficult and most important piece of work.

Three baptisms and a wedding were recently reported from Harda. Bilaspur has also had some more baptisms. Thus we grow, slowly but steadily. Jubbulpore is just now suffering from a very severe epidemic of plague. The native city is practically deserted and some deaths have occurred in the Civil Lines, where the European population lives. Nearly all the Christians of our mission have been inoculated, and hence are in but little danger. They have been in danger, though, as dead rats and squirrels have been found in their houses, and this is always the forerunner of the disease. Our Heavenly Father has certainly taken good care of the Bible College students in times of plague, for, though we have passed through four or five epidemics of the disease, up to this time we have not had a single case connected with the institution.

Christmas eve witnessed an unusual service in Jubbulpore. The Christians of three missions, our own, the Methodists, and the Wesleyans, united in a general service followed by the Lord's Supper. The sermon was preached by our Brother Grainger.

John T. Stivers of Los Angeles began a meeting with Cedar Street Church, Missoula, Mont., Feb. 1.

E. L. Powell, of Louisville, Ky., will lecture in the Christian church at Liberty, Mo., on Feb. 10, on "Citizenship in the Republic.'

W. H. Bock, pastor at Tabernacle Church, Columbus, Ind., is in a meeting with his home church, with A. E. Buss leading the music. There have already been 60 additions.

The Christian church at Cedar Falls, Ia., started with seven members six years ago. They now have sixty and have a good house to worship in and will be able to have a settled pastor before very long.

The convention of the Northeastern District of Arkansas was held at Paragould, Ark., in the latter part of January. G. A. Hoffman, pastor at Helena, was one of the speakers.

H. E. Tucker of Platte City, Mo., reports a good meeting with 74 added under the leadership of J. M. Lowe, whose methods are always sane. Mr. Tucker speaks most highly of the evangelist.

A. P. Johnson, pastor at Durham Avenue, Cleveland, O., reports 16 additions at the regular service on January 28, all men but two. The church is prospering in every way and they are planning great things.

Leslie W. Morgan, pastor of Wrightman Road Church, Hornsey, England, had a series of meetings in the latter part of January with E. H. Spring to do the evening preaching, Robert Hindle to conduct daily Bible readings, and Eli Brearley to assist in the caling and personal interviews.

The church at Tipton, Ind., held seventeen days' special services under the leadership of Geo. L. Snively and C. L. Marks during the past month. The meetings were educational and inspirational and the pastor, G. I. Hoover, speaks most favorably of the work done by the men. There were 40 additions to the church, 26 on confession of faith.

The Men's Brotherhood of First Church, Joplin, Mo., has been taking the initiative in a movement to unite the brotherhoods of the different denominations in the city into a sort of federation of brotherhoods. They have been discussing municipal betterment and considering the question of Sunday closing of theatres and higher licenses for saloons.

The Fifteenth Street Church, Keokuk, Ia., where Geo. A. Reinhardt is pastor, dedicated their house of worship on Jan. 28. Judge Chas. J. Scofield, of Carthage, Ill., delivered the dedicatory address. The money was all paid in before the dedication so that it was not necessary to call for any at all. A. L. McArthur, of Hamilton, Ill., a former pastor, was present.

It is reported that the three churches in Nevada, Ia., the Congregationalist, Methodist, and Disciples', are contemplating uniting into one congregation and, as a compromise, the new one will be Presbyterian. The Disciples church may not be a party to it, but the other two will certainly unite. It would be a good opportunity to unite on a basis of being simply Christian.

When G. W. Muckley began work for the Board of Church Extension in 1890, the fund consisted of $35,000. At the present time there is $912,367.16 and the effort is being made to reach a million dollars this year. This was the aim for the centennial year but it was not realized. Nearly 1,500 churches have been aided and over $2,000,000 handled.

"In solemn silence the car came up. It seemed to us that it had time to travel a mile before the gates were thrown open, and out stepped Dr. Squegee, holding the staggering form of little Petro.

"'Here he is, people!' he cried. 'We brought him back to you alive and well!'

"No use for me to tell you how that poor Italian woman rushed and embraced her boy until she came near breaking every bone in his body, and the vociferous congratulations of her countrywomen who followed her to the little cabin home back on the hillside.

"Martha saw Squegee, beaming with self-complacency, hand the boy over to his mother, and then stand proudly shaking hands with those who gathered about him, but she didn't notice two or three men silently carrying a dark form around to the company's office, for they thought best not to surprise her until they knew for sure the best or the worst.

"The news went around the camp that Dr. Squegee had gone down into the mine and rescued little Petro at the peril of his life, after Dr. Dartmouth had been overcome with the black damp because his helmet was out of fix.

"Late that night, as Martha sat in the company's office beside her slowly recovering husband, a dark-eyed, sallow-faced woman tiptoed into the room and kissed the hem of her garment.

"'The good mon,' she murmured, 'the candles burn for him tonight that God will make him well.'

"'You are Petro's mother?' said Martha.

"'Petro my son,' said the woman proudly, 'and your good mon safe him life.'

"'And Dr. Squegee,' suggested Martha, determined to be fair.

"'Squegee nothink!' returned Petro's mother, 'he one great big bluff. The doctor—your mon—went in far, far back, through water, black and nasty, on and on till he find boy—my Petro—then he come back carrying Petro through water and air like death—the—what you call it?—hat he wear with air—it runs out—but on he comes, with Petro—always with Petro—he fall, get up, stagger along, foot by foot, air all gone—just a little way, a little further in the dark and the air like death, and there the strong arm men are to hold and take them out!'

"In after days Martha wrote down at speech and framed it. She calls it the Doc's certificate of membership in the Legion of Honor.

"For a while after the affair there was some talk about an investigation being made of a certain party who was suspected of tampering with Doc Dartmouth's oxygen helmet, but before anything was started Squegee decided to leave the camp, and he afterwards claimed a great deal of credit for having thus assisted in making Jerome the head of the hospital.

"The incident of little Petro gave Martha a new viewpoint of the mining people, and she now shares her husband's interest in them, for she had learned that no folks on earth are more grateful for a little kindness, and that under their somewhat rugged exterior are hearts as loyal and loving as those she had been reared with in the great city."

The shotfirer paused.

"Your train's crossing the North River bridge," he said; "it will be here in ten minutes."

"But the Doctor's oxygen helmet—did he ever perfect it?"

"Sure," said Mr. Bill, earnestly. "He had it perfected the day he went in after little Petro, but he didn't take time to examine the air reservoir, and that's what caused the trouble. Somebody, either accidentally or designedly, had touched the valve. That thing has been a wonderul success, and is used today in many of the biggest mines. The Doc has money enough now to go into a big city and establish himself, but Martha would rather stay here."

The Divinity of Christ

is the new work on religion by EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES which bids fair to be even more generally discussed than the same author's "Psychology of Religious Experience."

It is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says:

"Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Baptist World says:

This book is interesting, among other things, in that it rejects both Trinitarianism and Unitarianism. The author says, "Each alike accepts the underlying dualism, and without questioning its validity has chosen to champion opposite extremes." He contends that the who of Jesus is not to be decided by his human birth, but by his divine relations. An insidious, strong putting of the theology in the author's local atmosphere.

The Independent says:

"Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says:

"Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says:

"These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says:

"It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

South Idaho

W. J. Dodge, who has charge of our churches at Jerome and Bliss, reports three additions by letter during the month of January.

Benjamin Smith, pastor at Payette, began a meeting with T. J. Golightly and the church at Caldwell, Feb. 4.

The M. E.'s and our people have united in the organization of a Christian Endeavor Society at Bliss. This was a splendid thing to do.

W. E. Rambo, formerly missionary to India and later under the direction of the American Christian Missionary Society at Farson, Wyoming, has taken up the work, at least temporarily, at Idaho Falls. After two Sundays Brother Rambo reports encouragingly, and believes it possible to do a great work in that important field. He will endeavor to work up two country points in conjunction with the work in town.

We are glad to have B. F. Clay located in Idaho again. Though he is developing his ranch across the river from Caldwell, he is preaching at Deer Flat, and will probably soon organize a congregation at Homedale. The townsite company have promised us lots when we are ready to build at Homedale. Joseph E. Bird, of Caldwell, is also looking up the matter of lots at Wilder.

The superintendent of missions spent Sunday, Jan. 28, with the church at Twin Falls. The very marked improvement in every department of the church was a pleasant surprise. They will remember for a long time the meeting held by C. L. Organ and wife. It was a great meeting, with more than 100 added to the membership of the church. There seem to be no bad after effects to this meeting. We shall be glad if Brother Organ comes to Idaho again. Twin Falls probably has one of the best organized Bible schools in the state. The new converts in their meeting pledged $400 toward the current expenses of the church.

The Twin Falls church was apportioned $75 for our state work. They thought this a little high, and had once decided that they ought not to be asked for more than $50. They surprised themselves, however, when, after the superintendent had presented the claims of the work, the pledges and cash amounted to $137. Though Brother B. F. Shoemaker and wife have not been with this church a year, they are beloved by the entire church for their lives and tireless energy in behalf of the Master's work.

We hope our men over the entire state are preparing to attend the Men and Religion campaign in Boise. Preparations are complete for the greatest religious gathering Idaho ever has had. To fail to appreciate this opportunity by being absent will mean not only a loss, but a keen disappointment when the campaign is over. The convention part of the campaign will begin Tuesday evening, Jan. 13, and continue until Thursday. The denominational luncheons will be held at 12 m. Thursday. The theme will be, "The Application of the Men and Religion Message to Each Church." Arrangements will be made to care for our own men. It is now definitely announced that Fred B. Smith, accompanied by the International Quartet, will be at the convention. He will speak at Pinney Theater Wednesday evening and at the First M. E. Church Thursday evening. If you expect to be at the luncheon on Thursday, or if you wish entertainment in the homes of our own people, be sure to send word to A. L. Chapman, 1214 Fort St.

Vital and Timely Books

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing. You need every one of this splendid list.

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST

By Edward Scribner Ames, Ph. D., author of "The Psychology of Religious Experience." 123 pages. Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all times must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Call of the Christ

THERE has been no moment in the history of the Christian enterprise in which the call of Jesus to the men and women of the world has been more imperious and insistent than now. The success of the church and the progress of human society toward nobler ideals alike depend upon response to this summons of the Master.

But the call of the Christ to the world in our generation is very differently interpreted from the terms in which that call was couched in earlier generations. Formerly it was understood largely as a summons to the acceptance of a form of doctrine or compliance with certain rites, or membership in a particular organization. Today these features of the call are quite subordinate to other considerations which have emerged to attention with a more careful study of the character and program of Jesus.

There are still those who believe that Jesus requires of men assent to certain facts in his life, such as the virgin birth, the fulfillment of Old Testament prophecies in his ministry, the performance of miracles by him, and the chief incidents of his earthly career. These facts they regard as the basis of faith, and without their acceptance they are unwilling to admit others into their fellowship.

Others there are who put their emphasis upon certain doctrines which they derive from New Testament teachings, either of Jesus himself or of the apostles. Such doctrines as the inspiration of the Scriptures, the divinity of Christ, the atonement, the work of the Holy Spirit, the divine mission of the church, and the nature of the life eternal they consider essential to the evangelical faith.

Still others hold particular theses in regard to the ordinances and ritual of the church. These views may vary from extreme high church convictions to broad and tolerant opinions regarding the place of rites in Christianity. Yet they are the determining elements in the confession of faith of many Christians in this generation.

And again there are those who are convinced that a particular organization is the essential form in which Jesus desired his kingdom to express itself, and that outside that organization, whether the Roman, Greek, Anglican or some form of the Protestant church, it is difficult if not impossible to obtain acceptance with God.

All these are types of an obsolescent order of Christianity. They are survivals of an earlier and cruder conception of Jesus' purpose in the world. They have been effective in the development of Christian character in their special fields of doctrine, ritual, ordinance and organization. Perhaps it was well that the church should pass through such periods as laid emphasis upon these matters of lesser importance, but it is clear that today they are losing their grip upon the conscience of the Christian world and are giving place to more vital elements of faith.

And at this very point the call of Christ becomes both commanding and illuminating. He summoned men to himself, not to a belief in the facts of his career, nor in doctrines taught either by him or his followers, nor in forms of worship however venerable, nor in ordinances however symbolic and useful, nor in organizations however inevitable and helpful they might have proved. These are all subordinate to the central purpose of Jesus' summons.

He calls men to himself, to his point of view, to his attitude toward God and man, to his interpretation of life, in accordance with which he lived aand became the representative Man of all the ages.

He calls men to himself, to his school of life, to the acceptance of his service, which is simple imitation of his character and his activities. He calls men to his humility, his sympathy, his friendship, his love. He calls them to his prayerfulness, to his serenity of spirit, to his fearlessness, to his divine indignation against wrong and his convincing championship of every righteousness cause.

One is not to suppose that the call of Christ excludes the acceptance of belief in the facts of Jesus' life or in the truths he taught. A knowledge of these things is essential to the approach which the answering spirit must make to his supreme command. Nor are forms of worship and ordinances of the church to be neglected merely because they have lost somewhat their earlier importance. Nor are Christian organizations useless merely because they have become so numerous and unfortunately so competitive. These all have their place in the enterprise of realizing adequately the purposes of Jesus in the world.

But they are not the essential things. They are only means to the end of realizing Christian character in the lives of those who respond to the great call. In so far as doctrine, ritual, ordinance and organization minister to this end they are of value. In so far as they obtrude themselves between the listening soul and the summoning Lord they are valueless and impertinent.

And the fact that this generation is less patient than any earlier one in the presence of these lesser things, and is eager to come straight away into the presence of Christ himself, the supreme and satisfying interpreter of God, is proof of the fact that this age in increasingly Christian at heart, and wishes less than any in the past to spend its time over unessential things. The call of doctrines, ordinances, ritual and organization finds men listless and indifferent. The call of the Christ reaches conscience, heart and will, and rouses the best manhood of this age to attention, interest and action. It is the call of the Christ for which all the world is waiting.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

Social Cure-Alls

In the field of medicine we are familiar with that kind of advertising doctor who used to announce a remedy which would cure a list of diseases long enough to consume a quarter of a column of type in telling about it. We have long since devised a name for this kind of doctoring which is expressive if not elegant. In the study of social diseases and their remedies, we are in danger of just this sort of quackery which would reduce all social disorders to one and then proceed to cure it. There is the kind of prohibitionist who would make us believe that the eradication of the saloon would carry in its train all the human benefits that one could well conceive. He calls the saloon the parent of all crime and disorder. Yet in those states in which the saloon has long been abolished, we still have social questions quite as urgent as in the saloon-ridden states like Illinois. We do believe that the annihilation of the saloon would be an important advance in social welfare, but it would not be the final step.

Then there has been the kind of socialist who has traced every human ill to poverty and has insisted that the inauguration of Utopia was to be accomplished through the nationalization of industries. He has thought that men drank because they were poor. They committed crimes because they were poor. The guarantee of a steady income with a minimum of work would place the individual beyond the reach of moral evil. We have not failed to note, however, that the Prince of Darkness is no respecter of persons. He has friends both among the rich and the poor. The tempting bait he holds before the eyes of his prospective victim is not always money. We fail to see how even a Socialist state would cope with licentiousness, laziness, drunkenness and other evils.

The latest candidate for the list of social cure-alls is woman's suffrage. Just as there is a careful statement of prohibition and socialism, so there is in this movement; but as with the others, so with this, there are not lacking those who would make woman's suffrage the fundamental question. They assume at the outset some superior human sympathy and moral integrity among women to that among men. They would have us believe that through the application of suffrage the saloon, the brothel and a thousand other abuses would be ended. We have seen but few saloons abolished in western states where the suffrage has been granted. Moral conditions in Denver are as bad as in Chicago. The labor laws with reference to women in the west are less progressive in some cases than those of Illinois.

It is by no such easy roads as these that we shall solve the complex of our social problems. The wise physician must ever make new diagnoses and apply new remedies, and doubtless to the end of the ages he will still have something to do. Let us leave Utopias to the dreamers and work out our salvation in the social order with all available remedies.

Roosevelt and Woman's Suffrage

The article in the Outlook by our ex-president on the suffrage question will doubtless make quite a stir in the suffrage camp. The ex-president takes the position that the suffrage movement will likely succeed but he is not much interested in it and it will not make much difference with things. This is doubtless the position of millions of thinking men and women throughout the country. No man of consequence cares to fight the suffrage movement. The opposition to it has been mostly from the women themselves. A man may have his opinion about it but instead of playing the role of "the tyrant man" he much prefers to accord to women anything in reason that they want.

This attitude is the flower of our modern chivalry. As long as the suffrage movement is a discussion of woman's rights, there is not much reply possible. If women claim the ballot, it is theirs. If they want to become structural iron workers and construct bridges, we should favor no adverse legislation that would prevent them from doing so. They would be within their rights. When, however, we cease talking about woman's rights and begin talking about woman's functions, we are on an entirely different subject. Men and women have been functionally different in every civilization. In spite of co-education and every other levelling modern influence, women will be functionally different to the end of time.

If monogamy is not to be succeeded by herd life, if the mothering function is not to be superseded by the state nursery, if the hotel is not to supersede the home, women have a perpetual job, the tenderest, the most beautiful, the most important job that was ever given to human beings. Miss Ida M. Tarbell, who is one of the great representatives of that type of woman who has chosen the public life rather than the home, would not have women rush into the assumption of these public duties. We are not opposed to woman's suffrage. We do feel, however, that the subject is not socially half as important as some would have us believe. We could wish that the steam expended in this movement had been directed toward securing better living and working conditions for women. The wife of the mayor of Chicago, who is unfranchised, has done as much to fight vice as all the women of Colorado.

The Increase of Suicide

The Prudential Life Insurance Company is responsible for statistics showing a fifty per cent increase in suicide in fifty cities of the United States in ten years. Suicide has always been the mark of a decadent civilization. We have been accustomed in our kindness of heart to assign all suicides to insanity, but that theory does not find support in modern science. It is well known that suicide goes in waves, showing that newspaper accounts may produce an epidemic of that kind of death. Different races show different suicide records.

Of the countries of Europe, the people of Saxony have the highest percentage, and the Irish the lowest. The fund of good humor in the Irishman undoubtedly protects him. Of the different religions, Protestants are far more likely to commit suicide than Catholics. This would indicate that religious beliefs play a considerable role in deterring certain people from violent departure from this world. Throughout the world about three times as many men commit suicide as women. The motives have been studied as well as the method. The whole subject presents some interesting problems yet to be solved in the explanation of statistics.

Meanwhile, we have to face the problem of the prevention of suicide. We may approach the matter from the honor side and create an ethical sentiment throughout the community that suicide is not different from other kinds of murder. We may teach truthfully that suicide is a kind of cowardice that makes the man who adopts it as dishonored as he who runs away on the field of battle. These ethical sanctions, however, will not be nearly so powerful as the re-inforcement that comes from the great religious belief in immortality. It is a terrible thought to any man who holds this belief with any degree of reflection to think of being ushered into the presence of the Infinite in the midst of murderous thought. Immortality would teach us there is no suicide for the soul. No man settles the problem of life and destiny by transferring the scene of it from this world to the next.

Federal Commission on Industrial Relations

The leading social students of the country united last fall to present to the president and congress a petition with reference to the appointment of a commission to investigate labor conditions. This petition especially calls for investigation of the conditions under which the structural iron workers carry on their work. It suggests a study of the social cost of strikes. It would look toward some state machinery for the settlement of strikes.

It is to be regretted that such an important matter should have been delayed so long. The appointment of such a commission is one of the most important matters now before the country. Laboring men have come to a place where there is wide-spread suspicion of the integrity of the courts and the machinery of justice. Only by fair-minded study and just dealing with the subject can government machinery hope to hold the sympathy of the laboring classes. The McNamara case is only an incident in a struggle which involves millions of workers. If we are to convince the whole body of laboring men that the McNamara remedy is not the real remedy, then some such commission as this must be created and given time and money to bring in the facts.

—A training school for social workers has been organized at Indianapolis, with Harry Grannison Hill as its director. A bulletin announces that its first session of six weeks opens March 4. Associated with Mr. Hill as staff lecturers are some of the most authoritative leaders in social science and reform in Indiana.

Rome Has Her Own Troubles

A priest in France has produced a great sensation by publishing a book pleading for the marriage of priests. But there is no more likelihood today of the papacy's lending a friendly ear to the proposal than in centuries remote. Still, the problem is one that asserts itself periodically, and the unrest on the subject of a celibate priesthood shows that forces hostile to the institution are continually at work. In the following paragraph from the Living Church, the difficulty of finding suitable wives for priests in Catholic countries is pointed out:

No little sensation was caused a month or two ago in Roman Catholic circles here in France by the publication of a book pleading that priests should be allowed to marry. Its author was himself a priest. He was at once inhibited, his book condemned and forbidden to be read. It is, however, undeniable that there exists among certain classes of the people a feeling that a married priesthood is a good institution. The question is of course one of discipline and is beset with difficulties here in France and other Roman Catholic countries. One of these difficulties was strikingly put before me some time ago by a priest of the Old Catholic Church. In countries accustomed for centuries to a celibate priesthood the "material," so to say, for making fitting wives for the clergy does not exist, or exists but sparingly, he said. This is perfectly true. In England, in Russia, or other lands where priests marry, girls grow up and develop into womanhood with an inherited sense of the dignity of a priest's wife, an inherited comprehension of all such a position means and entails. Such women are ready for the vocation, ready and eager to renounce over-worldliness, ready to make strenuous efforts to become the serious, self-denying women a priest's wife must needs be, the help-meet for the man whose life is vowed to God's service. The girl who marries a priest is prepared to aid him in parish work, to take up her own special line in such work; she is prepared to rule her household with prudence and sobriety to bring up her children in the fear and love of God, to make her home a model Christian home, a home where the people to whom her husband ministers may see a living example of his preaching and his precepts. She is prepared to live sparingly, poorly, to be a hard-working wife and mother. This conception of what is required in the woman who marries a priest is so engrained in the minds of the population of the lands where a married priesthood exists, as to make an unworthy wife rare. Her very position shields her. But to be fit to occupy it she must have the inherited ideal of its dignity and the vocation.

The Princes of the Church

The papacy has never been at a loss to confound the historian with its paradoxes. While preaching the virtue of self-denial, binding her priests with vows of poverty, her princes have not been indifferent to the accumulation of wealth. While the begging friars were traveling in many lands on missions of benevolence, accepting only a pilgrim's hospitality, many of the authorities at Rome were enjoying the bounty of the rich, and wearing purple and fine linen.

It is said that the cost of creating a cardinal is somewhere between $25,000 and $30,000—remarkable indeed in view of the claims of Rome's love for the poor. And the Catholic church is a church of the poor. Her hospitals and charitable institutions are known and appreciated the world over. But there is something inconsistent in the creation of church princes when the Founder of the church lived and died a poor man. The only purple robe that he wore spoke humiliation; and the robe for which the soldiers cast lots stands out in the light of recent events in sharp contrast to the ecclesiastical millinery of which the dailies have made so much. And all the pomp and extravagance and the imitation of earthly potentates seem utterly foreign to the spirit of him who "had not where to lay his head."

When John Alexander Dowie was at the height of his power some of his officials remonstrated with him on what they deemed his extravagance, reminding him of the poverty of Jesus. That autocratic leader's reply was, "Well, what of it; it was his own fault!" Maybe, like him, Rome has a standard for the leaders and another for the followers. It is certain that there is a difference between them. The extravagance that has been publicly blazed abroad has drawn a few protests from some of the communicants of Rome; but it is likely that they are of socialistic tendencies, and therefore unworthy of notice! Thus, Romanism and many Protestant sects stifle all opposition by branding it with an unpopular label.

A Mission Society Departure

The meeting of the Episcopal General Board of Missions in Chicago during the week of February 11th, marks a departure that may be counted historic. Complaints of missionary societies that they are local to New York, and dominated by the East, go along with similar complaints in business and politics. Especially has the Episcopal bishop of Chicago been critical in his attitude toward the society in his own church, its alleged eastern domination, and its lack of interest in problems of the great cities of America. Largely because of his influence, and the influence of other leaders, including Bishop Gailor of Tennessee, Bishop Spaulding of Utah, and Bishop Edsall of Minnesota, the management of the society itself was wholly remade a year ago.

The Episcopal Board of Missions, doing both home and foreign work, handles a little more than $1,000,000 a year. It has four principal meetings a year, with monthly meetings of committees. For ninety years, or since its organization, all of its meetings have been held in New York. Now one of the four principal meetings of the year is to be held in Chicago. Practically the full membership plans to attend, and most of the principal members are to speak at meetings of men, preach on Sundays, and pay visits to Episcopal institutions. The event is to be made a great one in all cities near Chicago.

Congregationalists, Baptists, Disciples and Lutherans take their chief meetings to various cities. The Episcopal Church does the same with its general convention. Some others have long done so with their missionary meetings. Now the Episcopal Church gives way to that demand. Insurgency in religious bodies is held to be the cause, and a greater nationalization of missions to be one of the probable results.

Two Fellowships Open

The Presbyterian Board of Home Missions announces two fellowships of $1,000 each and expenses, the holders to go to Europe to study immigration at its cradle, and then to return to the United States to work at least three years for immigrants and their welfare at this end, under the direction of the board. One of the men selected will be sent to Poland and Russia for two years, and the other to Italy and the Balkans for a year and a half. There will not be competitive examinations, but consideration of the general fitness of all candidates. Such candidates need not be Presbyterian ministers, but must be men acceptable to Presbyterians, and to have had adequate training.

The plan is a part of a thorough policy adopted by this and other home mission boards, concerning immigration, country church, and similar lines of Christian effort. Two years ago three volunteers went to south eastern Europe at their own cost, studied races and languages and have since assisted in the conduct of Christian work for immigrants in America. Their experience leads to the placing of the training of immigrant workers upon this thorough policy. There are in Presbyterian seminaries about one hundred and fifty men of European parentage, some of them of immigrant arrival, and it is assumed that the fellowships will be secured from their number. Selection is not, however, restricted to them.

Y. M. C. A. and Money

Charles S. Ward, the Y. M C. A money raiser, who failed to get $500,000 in twelve days for the London Association, has returned home and entered upon money raising campaigns in Western Pennsylvania cities. He is to continue this work until June, when he returns to England to enter upon campaigns in principal English cities. He will not change his whirlwind methods either here or there. He has raised, by those methods, $15,000,000 in the past six years.

The reason for the technical failure of the London effort, Mr. Ward says, is the narrow conception of the London Association in the past, and its backwardness about meeting modern needs of young men. For example, he points out that the Y. M. C. A. in England has no educational department. He also points out that it limits its religious efforts, and is governed by a conservative policy that is at least fifty years behind the times.

Mr. Ward says his mission to England was by no means a failure. He succeeded in bringing broader gauged men into the London work; in getting resolutions passed to adopt more up-to-date methods; and in making a compact between American and British Associations by which he feels sure one will influence the other more than it has done. It was not the character of the people, nor the financial times, that caused the failure of the London $500,000 effort, but the reputation of the Association itself. Mr. Ward says London is so big that $5,000,000 will do no more there than the $1,000,000 which he recently helped to secure in Philadelphia.

Whence Came These Tares?

The origin of evil, that problem of universal and abiding interest, may seem to be the topic for discussion this week. There is one word of Scripture, however, that banishes this topic from a majority of our prayer meetings: "Let all things be done unto edifying." No man can solve the problem; very few can discuss it with profit. We have left to us, then, the fact that evil is in the world and that it creates a personal problem for every one of us. While it would be interesting to know how evil originated, it is vastly more important for us to know how we ought to act in a world where good and evil are mingled.

The church used to deal with the question of heredity in a thorough and courageous manner. It told men that they were born in sin and that they could not deliver themselves from sin. To-day the church does not speak the ancient word with the authority it once exercised. It has ceased to believe much that it once taught. It has yet to learn how to use effectively the modern form of its old doctrine. Physical heredity accounts for much of the evil of the world. The church therefore should be interested in eugenics. The right to be well born may not be written in the constitution of the United States, but it is embedded in every ethical code of enlightened men. The church must fight for the rights of the unborn.

The child that comes into the world well equipped physically is not thereby predetermined to a life of uprightness. How he will use his gifts depends upon the kind of world he sees and hears and feels. Social heredity becomes a factor, and not the least important, in his growth. In an atmosphere of impurity he does not learn what is clean and wholesome. From his cynical father and his busybody mother he learns that other persons are to be mistrusted and used as targets for ill-natured comment. From high-minded parents he is taught the love of truth and honor. The neighborhood gossip helps to dwarf the souls of the children that hear it. Conversation characterized by lofty sentiments and extensive knowledge awakens youth to its possibilities.

There is still room for emphasis on individual responsibility. While the wise men are debating the metes and bounds of this responsibility, the prophets of righteousness are helping the world forward by condemning us when we do wrong and by assuring us that we can do right. In the interest of truth it is necessary to show how our lives have been crippled by the sins of our parents and of our neighbors, but if we stop with the sins of others we have nothing more than an apology for being spiritual non-entities. The self-respecting man blames himself for some of his failures. The men who amount to anything in the moral realm hold themselves accountable for what they do. This is a fact at the command of all who are looking for spiritual guidance.

What shall we do with the evil man in the church and outside of it? Jesus told his disciples that it was not possible to separate the good from the bad until the final judgment was rendered. One reason for this is that no one is absolutely good and no one is absolutely bad. At one moment the bad in a life may be prominent and at another the good is dominant. Who of us is wise enough and good enough to judge his brother? There are certain practical things we have to do and when these are done we have reached the limit of our duty in disposing of evil-doers. The state is compelled to lay its restraining hand upon some of its citizens. This it does, when its laws are just and its judges are upright, for the good of the lawless and for the protection of all. The church, too, has the right to discipline its members. It stands for a definite view of men in their relation one to another and to God. Some persons who have their names on its list of members may be guilty of conduct that renders of no effect the word of the church. It must then take such steps as will remove this hindrance to its progress. But there it stops if it remembers the spirit of its Master. Its anathemas and excommunications have too often been blasphemous in that the church has undertaken to pass the judgment that belongs to God alone. Yes, we must judge people, otherwise we could not live in the world as a part of its working force. We commit to this man an important secret because we believe in him. We commit nothing to another, for his actions do not commend him to us as a man to be trusted. But we give both a chance to be men, if we are Christians. We do not cast out the bad man from the influences he needs for his reformation. [Midweek Service, Feb. 21. Matt. 13:25-27; 2 Tim. 3:1-14.] S. J.

Incidents from the Life of Andrew D. White

In his autobiography, Andrew D. White relates some interesting features regarding his religious development. His parents were staunch Episcopalians, and his training was in the midst of devotional influences. The ministry of Dr. Gregory, "who by some mistake, had escaped out of the thirteenth century into the nineteenth," made a lasting impression upon him. Speaking of the services in which he took only a boy's part, Mr. White says:

> At various times I have been present at most gorgeous services of the Anglican, Latin, Russian, and Oriental churches; have heard the pope, surrounded by his cardinals, sing mass at the high altar of St. Peter's; have seen the metropolitan archbishop of Moscow, surrounded by prelates of the Russian Empire, conduct the burial of a czar; have seen the highest Lutheran dignitaries solemnize the marriage of a German kaiser; have sat under the ministrations of sundry archbishops of Canterbury; have been present at high mass performed under the shadow of Mars Hill and the Parthenon; and, though I am singularly susceptible to the influence of such pageants, especially if they are accompanied by noble music, no one of these has ever made so great an impression upon me as that simple Anglo-American service performed by a surpliced clergyman with a country choir and devout assemblage in this little village church.

Dr. Gregory was an uncompromising Episcopalian, and believed in the doctrine of exclusive salvation. In an earlier age he would have welcomed the privilege of going to the stake, but that being denied him he sent others to perdition along the easy path of "the uncovenanted mercies," if their experience on the rack of his logic did not lead them to repentance. This is the kind of preaching well known to us all—flawless in logic, supported by numerous passages of Scripture, which men hear in silence and reflect upon with rebellion because they cannot believe that God would condemn millions of mankind for the reason that they did not unite with a particular church, or that they erred in questions of philology. Mankind still holds to God in spite of the ignorance of the many, and the terrific logic of the few. Their vaguest notions of God as Father are clearer than the contrary demonstrations of theology that have not even the fleck of a shadow in them. When any system of theology gets to be rigid, the faith of its adherents begins to weaken. Logic may reckon with texts and meet with no dissent, but the case is different when logic begins to reckon with life and love. So Andrew D. White learned in his early days, from a sermon on the subject, "The Church not a Sect," based on the text used from time immemorial by every champion of exclusive salvation: "As for this sect, we know that it is everywhere spoken against." The sermon was preached by "the gentle, fearless, narrow, uncompromising" disciple of Pusey, Newman, and Keble.

> We have all done the same thing, I presume, in the callow days of our ministry when, on some occasion that brought our neighbors of different creeds together to hear us, we improved an opportunity to expose their errors as well as our own ignorance of the minor moralities. But the obligation was forgotten, if, indeed, it was ever recognized, in the delight of the plaudits which were showered upon us by brethren whose zeal in the cause was as warm as our own, for the signal ability displayed in expounding the plea, and their assurance that, henceforth, wilful perversity could be the only reason for the postponement of its triumph in the community. While those of our household continued patting us on the back for several weeks thereafter because of our uncompromising stand, the visitors, as might be expected, indulged themselves in thoughts of violence which were a foe alike to their conversion and to their devotion. Improving such occasions in the interest of our zeal is only a painless way of cutting off the ears of those whom we desire to reach, but for effectivenss the use of the knife cannot surpass it. In vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird—a second time. Such was the following incident as related by Dr. White:

Another sermon showed Dr. Gregory's uncompromising spirit and took yet stronger hold upon me; it was given on an occasion when Presbyterians, Methodists, and Baptists were drawn in large numbers to his church; but disdaining all efforts to propitiate them, he took as his subject "The Sin of Korah," who set himself up against the regularly ordained priesthood, and was, with all his adherents, fearfully punished. The conclusion was easily drawn by all the "dissenters" present.

On another occasion of the same sort when his church was filled with people from other congregations, he took as his subject the story of Naaman the Syrian, his text being, "Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the rivers of Israel? May I not wash in them and be clean?" The good rector's answer was, in effect, "No, you may not." The Almighty designated the river Jordan as the means for securing health and safety; and so in these times he has designated for a similar purpose the Church—which is the Protestant Episcopal church; outside of that—as the one appointed by Him—you have no hope.

But the youthful love of the future ambassador saved him from the conclusions of a cruel creed. He saw in the saintly life of his grandmother, a member of the Congregational church, what any observing man is sure to see at some period of his life, that the fruits of the Spirit do not grow more abundantly on trees of any particular name; they are common to all. To the harsh Calvinism of her creed she seemed to pay no attention, and if hard pressed by him, used to say, "Well, sonny, there is, of course, some merciful way out of it all." And through the centuries the saintly life with its simple fireside theology has proved more than a match for the astute and legal theology of the divinity school.

In the latter pages of this voluminous autobiography, Dr. White treats his readers to the following observations on religion and one's duty to Christianity in our own day of sifting and uncertainty. He says:

It will, in my opinion, be a sad day for this or for any people when there shall have come in them an atrophy of the religious nature; when they shall have suppressed the need of communication, no matter how vague, with a supreme power in the universe; when the ties which bind men of similar modes of thought in the various religious organizations shall be dissolved; when men, instead of meeting their fellow-men in assemblages for public worship which give them a sense of brotherhood, shall lounge at home or in clubs; when men and women, instead of bringing themselves at stated periods into an atmosphere of prayer, praise, and aspiration, to hear the discussion of higher spiritual themes, to be stirred by appeals to their nobler nature in behalf of faith, hope, and charity, and to be moved by a closer realization of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, shall stay at home and give their thoughts to the Sunday papers or to the conduct of their business or to the languid search of some refuge from boredom.

Christianity, though far short of what it ought to be and will be, is today purer and better, in all its branches, than it has ever before been; and the same may be said of Judaism. Any man born into either of these forms of religion should, it seems to me, before breaking away from it, try as long as possible to promote its better evolution; aiding to increase breadth of view, toleration, indifference to unessentials, co-operation with good men and true of every faith. Melanchthon, St. Francis Xavier, Grotius, Thomasius, George Fox, Fenelon, the Wesleys, Moses Mendelssohn, Schleiermacher, Dr. Arnold, Channing, Phillips Brooks, and their like, may well be our exemplars, despite all their limitations and imperfections.

When the "greenback" heresy was at its height in 1878 Conkling and Garfield were chosen to expose it at Ithaca. The speeches of both men were masterly "and left in that region hardly a shred of the greenback theory." While driving to Dr. White's house at the close of his speech Garfield asked his host, "How did you like my speech?" Dr. White answered: "Garfield, I have known you too long and think too highly of you to flatter you; but I will simply say what I would say under oath: it was the best speech I ever heard." After the death of President Garfield, Mr. White said:

So closed a career which, in spite of some defects, was beautiful and noble. Great hopes had been formed regarding his Presidency, and yet, on looking back over his life, I have a strong feeling that his assassination was a service rendered to his reputation. I know from those who had full information that during his campaign for the Presidency he had been forced to make concessions and pledges which would have brought great trouble upon him had he lived through his official term. Gifted and good as he was, advantage had been taken of his kindly qualities, and he would have had to pay the penalty.

It costs me a pang to confess my opinion that the administration of Mr. Arthur, a man infinitely his inferior in nearly all the qualities which men most justly admire, was far better than the administration which Mr. Garfield would have been allowed to give the country.

Our interest in President Garfield's career will be my justification for digressing from my purpose to show the progress of Mr. White's religious development—a subject to me of great interest.

"Both Erroneous and Mischievous"

Editors Christian Century: I write my earnest protest against being named in your recent list of so-called endorsers of "the essential position" stated in your "six affirmations." To so classify me, and certain others who knew not that their names were in your enumeration until I told them, was a fundamental misrepresentation, however innocently committed.

I regard your position in the premises as both erroneous and mischievous. Your "affirmations" along with their fictitious bolstering may cause serious stumbling on the part of the weak. I pray that your mistake may be overruled for edification. Had I believed as you believe concerning the position of the Disciples of Christ—judging your views by your late editorials on the subject—I should never have identified myself with them as a distinct people nor have wrought for their plea.

My intense love for and sympathy with the pious unimmersed, my conception and adoration of Christ, "My Lord and my God," and my understanding of His will—all these—unite in repudiating your position, under consideration, as divisive of the churches and disloyal to our Lord. Yours in love mingled with grief,

Lexington, Ky. I. J. Spencer.

The foregoing communication lays upon The Christian Century a plain duty to apologize to Mr. Spencer. His name was appealed to without his knowledge in endorsement of six affirmations in which we undertook to state the position commonly held by Disciples with reference to the members of other churches. He now informs us that in doing so we committed a "fundamental misrepresentation." This we earnestly regret and assure Mr. Spencer that our intention was as innocent as he says the offense was grave.

We cited Mr. Spencer's name with those of some fifty others in the assurance that we were able to interpret the sentiments and aims of the Disciples, and because the Lexington pastor has stood for many years in our mind as a truly representative exponent of the Disciples' ideals. As pastor, writer and counsellor, he has made for himself a place not only as a reflector of the opinions of his brethren but as a maker of their opinions.

Our faith that in the important matters to which our six theses referred we would meet with his prompt endorsement was complete and sincere. In candor we must confess that upon reading his letter our disillusionment was so great as to almost swallow up our sense of having done him an injustice. Unlike certain other brethren whose names have appeared in our columns in recent weeks in disapproval of our use of their names, Mr. Spencer makes it plain that he has read the specific statements we made and repudiates them. His protest is not aimed at The Christian Century's views in general, nor does he lug into his disclaimer the question of receiving unimmersed Christians into Disciples' churches (a question that was not included in the six affirmations at all). He plainly says that to classify him in our recent list of endorsers of the essential position stated in our six affirmations was a "fundamental misrepresentation." He further characterizes our "position in the premises" as "both erroneous and mischievous."

This disclaimer of Mr. Spencer's starts a train of reflection in our mind. The Christian Century is not more competent to interpret the ideals of the Disciples than is our correspondent. We do not have access to any facts either through history or personal acquaintance that are denied him. But what we set down as among the basic and indisputable convictions of the Disciple mind he calls "both erroneous and mischievous." We do not now recall ever reading or hearing any one of our six affirmations disputed before, and we had come to assume that they belonged to that class of convictions which are not positively affirmed simply because no one thinks of calling them in question.

But now they are not only called in question but characterized as "mischievous," and that by a leader held in honor by his brethren and presumably as competent as any man to interpret the Disciples' ideals. Let us look at the theses which Mr. Spencer repudiates and the association of his name with which was a "fundamental misrepresentation."

1. The Christian Century affirmed that the Disciples believe that Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational churches are churches of Christ.

Mr. Spencer denies that they are churches of Christ and declares that our affirmation that they are is "both erroneous and mischievous."

Is Mr. Spencer right or is The Christian Century right?

2. The Christian Century affirmed that the members of these churches are members of the Church of Christ.

Mr. Spencer denies that they are members of the Church of Christ and declares that our affirmation is "both erroneous and mischievous."

Is Mr. Spencer right or is The Christian Century right?

3. The Christian Century affirmed that the Disciples know of no other way of admission into the Church of Christ except by being baptized into it.

Mr. Spencer's denial of our six affirmations would naturally mean that he knows of some other way of admission into the Church of Christ. We cannot gain our full consent to this inference, however, because this particular affirmation has been the explicit thesis of the Disciples' teaching from the beginning. Baptism as one of the terms of pardon has been plainly preached as the final act before forgiveness and the initiatory act into the church. This has been made so plain by our teachers that we hesitate to believe that Mr. Spencer means to call it "erroneous and mischievous."

4. The Christian Century affirmed that the Disciples believe that baptism as administered by these churches—irregular, defective and objectionable as they regard the manner of its administration to be—does actually induct men into the Church of Christ, and is therefore valid.

This affirmation Mr. Spencer denies. He conceives baptism as administered in the Presbyterian church, for example, as without meaning, and regards those who have been submitted to it as deluded in supposing that they were inducted into the Church of Christ.

Is Mr. Spencer right or is The Christian Century right?

5. The Christian Century affirmed that Disciples do not believe that baptism is a physical act.

Mr. Spencer's protest against our affirmations implies thus that the Disciples believe that baptism is a physical act, and that our statement to the contrary is "both erroneous and mischievous." There is some apparent justification for his denial here. The translation of the Greek word for "baptize" by the English word "immerse" upon which Disciples have insisted makes of baptism a specific physical act. But side by side with this false translation there has grown up in our best minds a spiritual conception of this ordinance until today our most representative book on the subject calls baptism a spiritual act, a "mental and physical act" with "the mental part as the very heart of it." Mr. Spencer's denial of our theses includes this as "both erroneous and mischievous."

Is Mr. Spencer right or is The Christian Century right?

6. The Christian Century affirmed that Disciples believe that immersion only should be practiced in the administration of baptism as a living testimonial to Christ and a means to Christian unity.

It would be pressing the logic of Mr. Spencer's protest to the breaking point to assume that he meant to deny either this or affirmation number 3. We cannot assume that either of them is meant to be included in his protest.

This leaves four of our six affirmations that Mr. Spencer repudiates. One of them refers to the character of the baptismal act and three of them refer to the membership in the Church of Christ of Presbyterians and the rest. Mr. Spencer has sent his protest for publication. His denials of our hearty acknowledgment of the Christian status of their churches, and of their membership, and of the validity of their induction into the body of Christ will be read by them with amazement. There is no pastor in our ranks who could be assumed to speak with more authority as to what Disciples of Christ believe. His words will carry far, and they will be remembered long by those to whom we will be constantly making our plea for Christian unity. Can we hope that they will hear our plea when we take a position that excludes them from the Church of Christ?

[After the above was in type the Christian Evangelist of Feb. 8 came to hand bearing a remarkable article by Mr. Spencer dealing seriatum with our six affirmations and specifically rejecting them all, including numbers 3 and 6.]

Editorial Table Talk

Wants a Stronger Word Used

A reader takes exception to our editorial comment on "insane evangelism" and says the word should be "immoral," not "insane." He gives a specific instance to illustrate his meaning. In a church in which a revival was in progress the evangelistic machinery was set going in the Sunday-school. "The classes were adjourned early and the evangelist made a chemical experiment, drawing lessons therefrom. Afterwards he extended the invitation, which continued for twenty minutes up to the time of my departure from the room, and at that time there seemed no apparent intention of stopping. After every verse of the hymn the evangelist exhorted at length, and kept up a continuous exhortation during the singing, walking from one side of the platform to the other with his arms out-stretched and his eyes intently fixed on the children. After the proceedings had continued for several minutes and responses were very meagre, the evangelist in a vexed voice called out: 'Why do you men and women stand there like tomb-stones when souls are being lost?' Following this, a number of men went out into the congregation, numbering perhaps one hundred ten, and button-holed the youngsters. Some boys at the age of eight or nine years were solicited by at least a half dozen men, the evangelist himself taking his turn when the others failed. Grasping each boy by the hand and looking him intently in the eye with an almost overpowering manner, he asked, 'Are you a Christian?' I am told that twenty-two children responded to the invitation, and a woman told me that she did not believe that many of them could have been more than seven or eight years old, though I could not myself vouch for this." Our correspondent found much to praise in this same evangelist's manner of conducting the services in the church, but believes this procedure in the Sunday-school was harmful. There can be no question of this. The principles of Christianity and the sacred laws of the human soul were violated by this evangelist. The church was led farther away from a true religious pedagogy, while discriminating and sensitive men and women were alienated from the church. We accept the criticism of our correspondent that the word "immoral" rightly belongs here, for in this particular case there is good reason to believe that the evangelist knows better.

Twenty-six New Sermons

Our good neighbor, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Head Resident of Lincoln Centre, is also pastor of All Souls Church. In making his annual report to his congregation Mr. Jones sets down very casually this modest item: "Twenty-six new sermons." That seems to be a variation from the usual order of pastoral report. We do not recall having seen such an item in any of the hundreds of reports we have read. It is candid certainly, refreshingly so, and significant, too. Mr. Jones does not credit himself with 104 sermons just because he preached that many times, but he thinks his congregation should know how many new sermons he has prepared.

And that is only fair, when one thinks of it. The minister's intellectual work is hidden. The number of sermons preached does not indicate the degree of his intellectual activity, but the number of sermons prepared. His congregation knows the character of his sermons, because they hear them and can judge for themselves, but when he tells his people how many of these sermons were brand new during the year they have at least one line on the way he spends his time. Intellectual activity, the minister's study life, is a pretty intangible thing to put into an annual report. But the number of new sermons, together with reports of other actually productive intellectual work, gives his people an insight which in fairness and confidence they have a right to.

Twenty-six new sermons—that is one every two weeks. And Mr. Jones' mind is ripe and rich and facile. If one were guessing, one would have said a larger number. But they were Jenkin Lloyd Jones' sermons! That makes the difference. Research went into them. New facts were brought to light. Social conditions were studied. Books were read. And then the sermons were actually prepared—written out, words weighed and paragraphs proportioned—so that when people heard them they carried authority. Be careful, therefore, brother preacher! Before you go complacently to your "barrel" for three sermons out of four, make sure that the fourth receives as much of your life blood as Jenkin Lloyd Jones puts into his, and then—why then you'll have a "barrel" that nobody will object to your dipping into as often as you like.

Laymen's Missionary Movement Plans

The Laymen's Missionary Movement, with its general staff and twenty salaried secretaries, issues its policy and program for 1912 and 1913 as follows: To keep world-wide missions in the minds of laymen; to co-operate with denominational movements to organize every church for missions; and to increase information concerning missions, and contributions from laymen to them. It announces again its supreme function to be leadership, and this leadership it will seek to apply both to the movements within various religious bodies and to the organized and official missionary societies.

As methods it proposes five metropolitan centres, and suggests New York, Boston, Chicago, Richmond and Toronto as such centres. At great conventions to be held at these centres it would secure as speakers men whose missionary message will command attention. Such men it thinks to include President Taft, former President Roosevelt, Justice Hughes of the Supreme Court, former Vice-President Fairbanks, Governor Woodrow Wilson, Ambassador Bryce, and Premier Borden of Canada.

As means to get larger sums of money from laymen actually into the treasuries of the missionary societies it urges those societies to draw up financial estimates covering five years in advance. It would seek individual gifts, after the manner of the Y. M. C. A. and others, and would push the every member canvass in local churches.

A New War for Peace

The peace propagandists have taken alarm at the delay of the United States in ratifying the treaties of arbitration between the United States, Great Britain and France. They have heard of some impatience obtaining in France, and they have also heard, it is said, of some untoward but powerful influence in the Senate which blocks every effort to set a day for final consideration of the treaties. They admit that the flood of letters and telegrams to senators has about ceased, and they fear senators may think public interest in President Taft's peace project to have waned.

To show senators that it has not waned there have just gone to five thousand foremost Christian ministers of the country, and to secretaries of about one thousand Christian organizations, expressions on the part of the peace people, indicating this alarm, and urging that agitation be started up again and kept up until the treaties are actually confirmed. Ministers from some centers have responded that they considered the treaties as good as passed, but that they will at once renew the fight and keep it renewed. Early spring conventions, now nearly due, will also act, they say, if the treaties be not ratified.

Men and Religion Congress

The Conservation Congress, winding up the series of conventions of the Men and Religion Movement, is to be held in New York instead of in Washington. The dates, April 19th to 24th, remain the same. Reason for the change was the belief that larger good would follow, both to a larger city and to the country. Practically the same program as had already been made out for Washington will be carried through in New York. President Taft will head the list of speakers, and the congress itself will terminate a three months' institute which has already started in New York. A feature of the congress will be a parade, big enough it is expected to impress even New York.

Conventions just held, or to begin at once, include Baltimore, Indianapolis, Pittsburgh, Newark, Birmingham, Toledo, Charleston and Washington. These are in the main division, with members of the general teams as speakers. Williamsport and some other cities of its size are drafting into service their own experts and, copying the general plan, are having conventions the equal of any in relative size and interest. In all of the cities success has attended the meetings and in many of them expectations have been far surpassed, especially in the permanent effect. Social service continues to lead in public interest at the conventions.

—A curious exhortation is that of a Disciple newspaper which prints for the heading of an editorial: "Preach First Principles!" and in the body of the article declares that the Disciples "are differentiated from all other great religious bodies by what is familiarly known among them as "first principles." That is an astounding utterance. Are the Disciples differentiated from others in preaching faith? In preaching repentance? In preaching confession of faith? In preaching baptism? Probably in the last item they bear a distinctive testimony, but certainly that is not sufficient ground for claiming that they are distinctive in preaching "first principles." Still, we are a good natured people and willing to overlook the first crude efforts of an editorial staff to find a line of policy that will be both orthodox and profitable.

—Just in what degree presidents and teachers of Disciple colleges have sacrificed for the cause of education will never be measured. No class of workers in our enterprise have rendered such unrewarded service as is credited to them. An illustration of the spirit that characterizes them all is afforded by the gift of his own home, worth $9,000, to the endowment fund of Drake University by President Hill M. Bell. Iowa business men and women and friends of Drake University the country over who are being asked for a half million dollars may be sure that the men and women of the faculty are leading all others in the self-sacrifice that is entering into the building of this great school.

—We are moved to remark that the program for the Disciples' Congress, appearing on another page, promises to make the Kansas City gathering historic.

Which is the More Serious Heresy?

Several good men have been protesting vigorously against the use of their names in connection with The Christian Century's recent affirmations concerning the Disciples' attitude toward other Christian people. Their protests are, in our judgment, wholly unwarranted. But there is something instructive in the fact, nevertheless. All the heresies of the Disciples may be divided into two classes: the progressive and the retrogressive. Toward the progressive we are fearful and hesitating; toward the reactionary we are indifferent—except in conversation and in private correspondence where our protests are as loud as the shouting of the devoted on the other side is violent.

For the leaders of one of these movements we speak with sorrow in our tones; for the others we use the language of fear. But when we dissent from the forward-going theology we speak out in magnificent fearlessness; when we dissent from the theology of the fallen idol, we hesitate, lest we should add fuel to the flames. And these fallen idols can never be set up in any of our temples again; but if they cannot, no praise for the failure will be due the men who in the one case viewed with alarm and maintained a frozen silence, and in the other when they thought the progressive theology was moving too fast, spoke loud enough to shake the timbers of the temple.

If a movement like ours ever reverts to obsolete types, the inglorious ending will soon appear. And that efforts are exerted to revert will not be denied by any one familiar with our recent history. It is better to follow the advancing gleam, even though the goal be uncertain, than to go back to the certainty of the graveyard, every step substantial, and the retreat secure.

On the same day that we read these protests against a frank acknowledgment that members of other churches are Christians like ourselves, we were reading in the Outline of Christian Theology, the notable work by the recently deceased scholar, William Newton Clarke. The concluding paragraph of this great book gives one a taste of the spirit and style of this great thinker who has done much to lead the Christian mind forward into the richer fields to which the Master himself ever beckons Dr. Clarke says:

> It is always the light of the present day that shines in through our windows; past suns have set, and the suns of the future have yet to rise. But all days are the Lord's, and we are as sure that God is with us in our work as that he was with our fathers, or that he will enlighten those who shall come after us. Indeed, his Spirit has often refreshed our hearts there while we talked together of him and gazed upon his glory in the face of Jesus Christ, and our quiet room has been to us the house of God. We do not find all questions that were present to our fathers pressing upon their children, nor do we feel ourselves required to settle all the questions that we see rising to engage the thoughts of future students. We are willing that our successors should leave our perplexities and their solutions, and answer their own questions in the clearer light of coming time.
> There are many blunders in the path of progress, but the race moves on in spite of them; there may be few or none in the progress of retreat, but the world prefers the forward path beset with danger to the backward track without an obstruction. Every soul of us must do his best to interpret the great ideals and to solve the perplexing problems in the light of our day. E. B. B.

The Mannerisms of the Pew

What a Widely Traveled Preacher Sees From the Pulpit

BY G. CAMPBELL MORGAN.

We have heard very much of the mannerisms of the pulpit. It is a very favorite theme of discussion among those who usually occupy the pews. We are all familiar with the fact that the pulpit has its mannerisms, and we plead guilty to them; but I would suggest that the pew also has its mannerisms. It hears of them less often than the pulpit does, and I have waited a good while before daring to speak in public of the mannerisms of the pew. It is now about thirty-five years since, as a lad, I first peeped at the pew from the platform. It is twenty-six years since I left the teacher's desk to spend my life largely in pulpits and on platforms; and during that period of twenty-six years I have traveled by train and by ship 381,116 miles, and have looked at the pew 12,107 times—that is, an average of 465 times a year. I have also looked at the pew over and over again when I have not myself been addressing audiences, and have been able to see the effect produced on the pew by other preachers. I have therefore some knowledge of my subject, and some right to speak on the mannerisms of the pew.

I speak first of typical congregations, confining myself in each case to those with which I have some close acquaintance.

American Audiences.

If I were asked to state quite briefly how a congregation impresses me in the Northern states of North America, I should say by two things—restlessness and disinclination to think. I believe that this is a reaction from the terrible rush of the busy days that have preceded the occasion—a reaction from intense and insistent thinking. No man will ever be successful in preaching to an audience in North America who does not remember this fact, and does not set himself to compel his congregation back again to the habit of the week from which they imagine they have escaped. Preaching in the Northern states must be characterized by rapid movement and clear thinking—rapid movement which arrests the attention and compels men to listen, and then that clear thinking which brings back into play the normal conditions of the week which they are trying to escape.

Southern Languor.

In the South there is something quite different. Congregations there always seem to me to be composed of people "lulled by the languor of the land of the locust." They impress you with the feeling that no bolt that was ever forged could have surprised them, and nothing you say can wake them up. Yet again, no man has preached often in the Southern states without discovering that beneath that apparent languor there is passion and there is power. The preacher who would preach in the Southern states must lure his congregation after him, leading them along the line that he would have them go until presently they will rise, shake themselves, march with him, and conquer anything. I prophesy that in another fifty years, we shall see the men of the Southern states of the United States of America marching to the most marvelous victories in every single department of human life.

British Audiences.

What of an English audience? One can dismiss it in a very few words—attention; they listen: attention without prejudice; they are prepared to hear you: and underlying their unprejudiced attention there is a great passion for justice. No man can long play tricks with an English audience. And side by side with this passion for justice, there is a consequent intolerance of humbug. An English audience is very slow to move, but absolutely sure when it moves.

The Scotch.

And what of the Scotch? In speaking to Scotch people, I have become conscious that I am addressing a mentality impregnated with Biblical theology, people who, by their very birth and upbringing, seem, almost unconsciously, to have breathed the air of the fundamental doctrines of religion. And the preacher who addresses himself to a Scotch audience, has always to take that into account. The Scotch audience is cautious and courageous, while there is always in a great Scotch audience a ground swell of emotion. I have never yet addressed an audience in Scotland, but I have discovered their humor and their pathos.

In Wales one is always conscious of an outlook cultivated by Biblical poetry. They have had their great theologians, but the Welsh, as a nation, are not theologians; they are poets. A Welsh audience comes to listen to you and waits for unveiling, for interpretation. It waits for you with imagination and with magnificent intrepidity. The only speaker that a Welsh audience will not tolerate is one who is tepid.

City Audiences.

I pass from these national distinctions to municipal characteristics. I will take half a dozen towns in which I have spoken, and will begin in the north with Glasgow. I do not think that a Glasgow audience is typically Scotch, but the things that impress one when standing in front of a Glasgow audience are these: it is reverent, teachable, wanting to be taught, and exceedingly responsive.

What of Bradford? To me it has been a great revelation, one of the surprises of my life. A Bradford audience is as hard as the granite of its buildings, delicate as the wool in which it works, logical as the weaving that results from its manipulations of its wool, yielding to those who seek her. A Bradford audience requires time, quietness, and persuasiveness, and when found, is one of the most responsive I know in Great Britain.

Manchester I will describe in four words —strenuous, sympathetic, sociable, straight. And what of Birmingham? I always feel that is worldly wise, self-centered, and cocksure; but the man who wins, holds it to the crack of doom. Bristol is full of faith and full of kindness, even to the suffering of fools, and consequently also to the making of great ministers. And what more can be said of a London audience, than that it is English to the backbone?

Communal Groups.

Then I think of communal groups of congregations, and first of all of an agricultural congregation. Is there anything more charming to the preacher than to face a really great company of men and women who live their life on the soil under God's sky? But one has to be very careful in dealing with them. A preacher must let their specialties alone. But it is equally necessary that he should treat his own subjects in their way. They live in a world of rhythmic regularity, and we need to bring out before them whole spaces of truth, whole areas of vision, leaving some part hidden, feeling quite sure that when they have done our work, they will walk at eventide and find the flowers that we were unable to show them.

In great manufacturing congregations, the habit of life is one of close attention; of rhythmic regularity. Once again, ministers must be urged to leave their specialties alone while dealing with his own in their way.

Varsity Audiences.

Then there is the audience of "varsity" students—men and women who are students of things as they are, sceptical with a scepticism that is always open-minded. The first thing that impresses me is that they are absolutely intolerant of the academic. No preacher fails so disastrously as the man who preaches to a university congregation and imagines that he must preach in the language of the university. Truth and experience are what the university audience will respond to.

Then there is the leisured class. They are tired and wistful, and demanding inspiration. I know of no audience over which my soul yearns with greater intensity.

Individuals.

I turn now to typical individuals I have seen in my congregations. In my own case a congregation is never a "mass." I have never yet addressed a "mass meeting." A congregation to me is always a company of individuals, and in my early days, before one evidence of declining years was upon me—that of the dimming of my sight—it was almost impossible for any personal friend of mine to hide himself away anywhere in the building without my discovering him. An audience is always a company of individuals, and as no two persons are alike, so also are no two hearers. Therein is the charm of public speaking; and I confess that there is nothing in this wide world so full of joy to me as to have an audience in front of me. I would rather preach than eat. When a man has once come to realize that he is talking, not before, but to individuals, multiplied into congregations, he will readily see how close the relationship becomes between pulpit and pew.

I will deal with types of individual hearers under two genera—co-operative and challenging.

Critics.

I look over my congregation and I find my first co-operative hearer—the critic—the person who comes and sits in front of you when you begin to speak, and from the first word you say his attitude is that of interrogation, asking for proofs, quite prepared to receive them, but declining to be humbugged. This is the kind of hearer that always proves a helper. His attitude is one of co-operation with the preacher, compelling him to carefulness, both in preparation and in delivery, demanding from him a statement which is fair and honest and conclusive.

There is another type, I am afraid a very common one.

Formal Hearers.

The person who has not really come to hear, who is merely conventional, quite indifferent sometimes, a person who sits in the front bored to death, who takes his watch out to see what the time is while you are preaching. That person challenges the pulpit and platform, and so helps the preacher. He challenges the alertness of the preacher and his resources.

I take another challenger—the pietistic—who always comes in when the preacher is in the pulpit, and he has the chance of seeing him come. He comes with a show of devotion; he lifts his eyes to heaven at times in the singing, and then looks round to see who saw him do it. He is a challenger to the preacher. He challenges us to anger, which is a most healthy thing.

Expectant Hearers.

There is another man, however, who is always in his place when I come into the pulpit. I have got to know where he sits. He is the expectant hearer, the man who gives the preacher some spiritual salutation, some psychic recognition that is in itself an inspiration. His mind is stretched out to take. He does not dream he is going to be disappointed, and he never is, no matter who preaches. That man co-operates with the preacher by his faith in him. The man who is expecting that I can help him, is the man that I am more or less able to help.

Perplexed Hearers.

I see another person—the perplexed and inquiring—as a rule, restless and responsive. Such souls are co-operative with the preacher, compelling patience, demanding that he take time, and destroying passion for mere dignity in the interest of saying it again that that soul may receive the truth.

The Sorrowful Hearer.

No man ever faces a congregation of any size without seeing him present. The tired, mentally and spiritually, who have escaped for a little from their suffering and ask for rest. Wistful, drifting in and sitting down, hoping no one will notice them. These men and women co-operate with preachers by compelling them to ever-renewed fellowship with Christ, lest they grow hard and callous.

There is the man, too, who sits down in the corner of the pew and doses, waking up now and again with a start. That man is very useful to the preacher. He demands that you keep awake in order to keep him awake.

Prepared Hearers.

The last type, I thank God, who is always to be found in our congregations, is the prepared. I remember a talk my mother had with me when I was a young man. "Always remember," she said, "that when you go to worship, you ought not to go merely to get a blessing, but to take one with you." The prepared man is the man who knows that his attitude will help to make or spoil the whole service.

We preachers owe very much to the pew; more than we often confess; more, perhaps, than we know. At any rate, after thirty-five years of preaching, I am convinced that far more depends upon the attitude of the pew than I have often imagined; and I am more and more impressed by the power which the pew is in itself and by its influence upon the preacher.

Dickens and America

Strong Sympathies and Frank Criticism for this Country

BY EDGAR WHITE

February 7 was the 100th anniversary of Charles Dickens' birthday. It is an occasion of significance to the people of Missouri this year, because of the recent visit of the great author's son, Alfred Tennyson Dickens, to this state, and his sudden death a few weeks later.

When Dickens died, he left one unfinished book, "The Mystery of Edwin Drood." In this work, on the last page of it, is a peculiar style of writing which has been followed somewhat by some authors of today:

"Comes Mr. Tope with his large keys and yawningly unlocks and sets open. Come Mrs. Tope and attendant sweeping sprites. Come, in due time, organist and bellows-boy peeping down from the red curtains in the loft, fearlessly flapping dust from books up at that remote elevation, and whisking it from stops and pedals."

Dickenesque to the very last! When those words were written with a quill, the death angel stood right at the threshold. Yet the natural humor of the man flowed on without a flaw to the very end.

Tried to Make a Lawyer.

They tried to make a lawyer out of Dickens, but he had a greater future in mind. At twenty-one he began reporting parliamentary debates for the Morning Chronicle. That was in 1833. Sir Isaac Pitman, who was a year younger than Dickens, was master of a British school in 1831, and had invented a system of shorthand writing. This system was generally employed in the British Isles later on, though at that time but few were able to use it at verbatim speed. Consequently a reporter who could "take down a speech" or report a case in court, was a man above price. It is said that Dickens studied the system so assiduously that he became competent to do it, and that he was the most valued reporter on the Morning Chronicle's staff because of his accomplishment.

After some years, Isaac Pitman's relative, Ben Pitman, introduced "hooks" on consonant outlines, which made verbatim reporting comparatively easy. This method became known as the American Pitmanic system, and it is the standard in use in this country today.

In the days of Dickens' reportorial activity, the stage-coach was still the main vehicle of travel. He would be sent out many miles from London to report the speech of some noted peer, and then rushed for the night stage, which would be held for him, and on the way back to the metropolis, sitting in a corner of the big coach, would work away by the flickering oil light, getting out his report of the speech for the morrow's paper. When he would reach the office, he would have a big handful of copy to start the printers, and then patiently finish the tedious task with quill or pencil in time for the morning issue.

Want a Speaker's Speech.

It was, and is yet, regarded a matter of the utmost importance by the London newspapers to print a speaker's remarks verbatim. Often the speech, with hardly any introductory except the head, is run. The editors wanted to know what the man said. They didn't care for a lot of fine writing about the occasion.

From newspaper reporting Dickens drifted into literature as the sparks fly up. His first work in book form was called "Tales and Sketches by Boz." The latter was his nom de plume. The tales and sketches were stories he had written for the Morning Chronicle, collated and published in book form. In both England and America, "The Tales" were well received. "Pickwick Papers" came next, and these stamped Dickens as a master of his art.

Said Sharp Things About America.

In "Martin Chuzzlewit," published in 1844, Dickens said some things about America which have long since been forgiven. He described an unsightly and unhealthy place on the banks of the Mississippi which he ironically termed, "Eden."

"Martin Chuzzlewit" invested every cent he had—$150—in Eden property, under representations that it was a city of splendor and magnificence, and that it would continue to grow and thrive. He felt proud to be a landed proprietor in such a wonderful country, according to the story.

Martin's "disillusion" came when he journeyed over to America to take possession of his lordly estate and to get rich quick. According to the book, he found nothing but swamps and wilderness, and came near dying of fever. The place was referred to as being the nearest station to lingering death, entirely unfit for human habitation.

Many writers have declared that "Eden" was actually "Marion City," a town north of Hannibal, established by Col. William Muldrow. Many columns have been printed about the destruction of Colonel Muldrow's dream city during a great flood that came down the river in the fore part of the last century.

If Mr. Dickens really had Marion City in mind when he drew such a dismal picture of the old and wretched place, he would see things vastly different today. The bottom land along the river has been made secure by a strong system of dikes and earthwork. A railroad runs through the heart of the lowlands, without danger. Within a quarter of a mile of the site of the wrecked city, a new town is springing up. It has a depot, store, church, and many dwellings. On the higher points are handsome, well built homes. All the fields are in cultivation. The land is wonderfully fertile, and if Martin Chuzzlewit had held on, his heirs would be beyond the reach of want for all time.

We Can Claim Him.

America, as well as England, can rightly claim Charles Dickens for her own. True, he said some caustic things about us, but nothing worse than he had about the mother country. If he made fun of our ways and manners, he dealt with greater harshness toward the ridiculous methods of British judicial procedure. We will always believe that Dickens had a tender spot in his heart for this great country. He knew that he was writing for Americans as well as for the British public. He knew that the people here accepted his teachings as readily as they did in the land of his nativity, and that our understanding of his work was equal to that of his own people.

Dickens' own words, in the preface to "American Notes," are the best explanation of his feelings toward this country.

"Prejudiced, I am not, and never have been, otherwise than in favor of the United States. I have many friends in America. I feel a grateful interest in the country. I hope and believe it will successfully work out a problem of the highest importance to the whole human race."

Cheered by the presence of God, I will do at each moment, without anxiety, according to the strength which He shall give me, the work that His providence assigns me. I will leave the rest without concern; it is not my affair.—Fenelon.

It is the abnegation of self which has brought out all that is noble, all that is good, all that is useful, nearly all that is ornamental in the world.—Whyte Melville.

Psyche and the Skyscraper

By O. Henry

If you are a philosopher you can do this thing: you can go to the top of a high building, look down upon your fellow-men 300 feet below, and despise them as insects. Like the irresponsible black waterbugs on summer ponds, they crawl and circle and hustle about idiotically without aim or purpose. They do not even move with the admirable intelligence of ants, for ants always know when they are going home. The ant is of a lowly station, but he will often reach home and get his slippers on while you are left at your elevated station.

Man, then, to the housetopped philosopher, appears to be but a creeping, contemptible beetle. Brokers, poets, millionaires, bootblacks, beauties, hod-carriers and politicians become little black specks dodging bigger black specks in streets no wider than your thumb.

From this high view the city itself becomes degraded to an unintelligible mass of distorted buildings and impossible perspectives; the revered ocean is a duck pond; the earth itself a lost golf ball. All the minutiae of life are gone. The philosopher gazes into the infinite heavens above him, and allows his soul to expand to the influence of his new view. He feels that he is the heir to Eternity and the child of Time. Space, too, should be his by the right of his immortal heritage, and he thrills at the thought that some day his kind shall traverse those mysterious aerial roads between planet and planet. The tiny world beneath his feet upon which this towering structure of steel rests as a speck of dust upon a Himalayan mountain—it is but one of a countless number of such whirling atoms. What are the ambitions, the achievements, the paltry conquests and loves of those restless black insects below compared with the serene and awful immensity of the universe that lies above and around their insignificant city?

It is guaranteed that the philosopher will have these thoughts. They have been expressly compiled from the philosophies of the world and set down with the proper interrogation point at the end of them to represent the invariable musings of deep thinkers on high places. And when the philosopher takes the elevator down his mind is broader, his heart is at peace, and his conception of the cosmogony of creation is as wide as the buckle of Orion's summer belt.

But if your name happened to be Daisy, and you worked in an Eighth Avenue candy store and lived in a little cold hall bedroom, five feet by eight, and earned $6 per week, and ate ten-cent lunches and were nineteen years old, and got up at 6:30 and worked till 9, and never had studied philosophy, maybe things wouldn't look that way to you from the top of a skyscraper.

Two sighed for the hand of Daisy, the unphilosophical. One was Joe, who kept the smallest store in New York. It was about the size of a tool-box of the D. P. W., and stuck like a sparrow's nest against a corner of a downtown skyscraper. Its stock consisted of fruit, candies, newspapers, song books, cigarettes, and lemonade in season. When stern winter shook his congealed locks and Joe had to move himself and the fruit stand inside, there was exactly room in the store for the proprietor, his wares, a stove the size of a vinegar cruet, and one customer.

Joe was not of the nation that keeps us forever in a furore with fugues and fruit. He was a capable American youth who was laying by money, and wanted Daisy to help him spend it. Three times he had asked her.

"I got money saved up, Daisy," was his love song; " and you know how bad I want you. That store of mine ain't very big, but——"

"Oh, ain't it?" would be the antiphony of the unphilosophical one. "Why, I heard Wanamaker's was trying to get you to sublet part of your floor space to them for next year."

Daisy passed Joe's corner every morning and evening.

"Hello, Two-by-Four!" was her usual greeting. "Seems to me your store looks emptier. You must have sold a package of chewing gum."

"Ain't much room in here, sure," Joe would answer, with his slow grin, "except for you, Daise. Me and the store are waitin' for you whenever you'll take us. Don't you think you might before long?"

"Store!"—a fine scorn was expressed by Daisy's uptilted nose—"sardine box! Waitin' for me, you say? You'd have to throw out about a hundred pounds of candy before I could get inside if it, Joe."

"I wouldn't mind an even swap like that," said Joe, complimentary.

Daisy's existence was limited in every way. She had to walk sideways between the counter and the shelves in the candy store. In her own hall bedroom coziness had been carried close to cohesiveness. The walls were so near to one another that the paper on them made a perfect Babel of noise. She could light the gas with one hand and close the door with the other without taking her eyes off the reflection of her brown pompadour in the mirror. She had Joe's picture in a gilt frame on the dresser, and sometimes—but her next thought would always be of Joe's funny little store tacked like a soap box to the corner of that great building, and away would go her sentiment in a breeze of laughter.

Daisy's other suitor followed Joe by several months. He came to board in the house where she lived. His name was Dabster, and he was a philosopher. Though young, attainments stood out upon him like continental labels on a Passaic (N.J.) suitcase. Knowledge he had kidnapped from cyclopedias and handbooks of useful information; but as for wisdom, when she passed he was left sniffing in the road without so much as the number of her motor car. He could and would tell you the proportion of water and muscle-making properties of peas and veal, the shortest verse in the Bible, the number of pounds of shingle nails required to fasten 256 shingles laid four inches to the weather, the population of Kankakee, Ill., the theories of Spinoza, the name of Mr. H. McKay Twombly's second hall footman, the length of the Hoosac Tunnel, the best time to set a hen, the salary of the railway post-office messenger between Driftwood and Red Bank Furnace, Pa., and the number of bones in the foreleg of a cat.

This weight of learning was no handicap to Dabster. His statistics were the sprigs of parsley with which he garnished the feast of a small talk that he would set before you if he conceived that to be your taste. And again he used them as breastworks in foraging at the boarding-house. Firing at you a volley of figures concerning the weight of a lineal foot of bar-iron 5x2¾ inches, and the average annual rainfall at Fort Snelling, Minn., he would transfix with his fork the best piece of chicken on the dish while you were trying to rally sufficiently to ask him weakly why does a hen cross the road.

Thus, brightly armed, and further equipped with a measure of good looks, of a hair-oily, shopping-district-at-three-in-the-afternoon kind, it seems that Joe, of the Lilliputian emporium, had a rival worthy of his steel. But Joe carried no steel. There wouldn't have been room in his store to draw it if he had.

One Saturday afternoon, about four o'clock, Daisy and Mr. Dabster stopped before Joe's booth. Dabster wore a silk hat, and—well, Daisy was a woman, and that hat had no chance to get back in its box until Joe had seen it. A stick of pineapple chewing gum was the ostensible object of the call. Joe supplied it through the open side of his store. He did not pale or falter at sight of the hat.

"Mr. Dabster's going to take me on top of the building to observe the view," said Daisy, after she had introduced her admirers. "I never was on a skyscraper. I guess it must be awfully nice and funny up there."

"H'm!" said Joe.

"The panorama," said Mr. Dabster, "exposed to the gaze from the top of a lofty building is not only sublime, but instructive. Miss Daisy has a decided pleasure in store for her."

"It's windy up there, too, as well as here," said Joe. "Are you dressed warm enough, Daise?"

"Sure thing! I'm all lined," said Daisy, smiling slyly at his clouded brow. "You look just like a mummy in a case, Joe. Ain't you just put in an invoice of a pint of peanuts or another apple? Your store looks awful overstocked."

Daisy giggled at her favorite joke; and Joe had to smile with her.

"Your quarters are somewhat limited, Mr. —er—er," remarked Dabster, "in comparison with the size of this building. I understand the area of its side to be about 340 by 100 feet. That would make you occupy a proportionate space as if half of Beloochistan were placed upon a territory as large as the United States east of the Rocky Mountains, with the Province of Ontario and Belgium added."

"Is that so, sport?" said Joe, genially. "You are Weisenheimer on figures, all right. How many square pounds of baled hay do you think a jackass could eat if he stopped brayin' long enough to keep still a minute and five-eighths?"

A few minutes later Daisy and Mr. Dabster stepped from an elevator to the top floor of the skyscraper. Then up a short, steep stairway and out upon the roof. Dabster led her to the parapet so she could look down at the black dots moving in the street below.

"What are they?" she asked, trembling. She had never before been on a height like this before.

And then Dabster must needs play the philosopher on the tower, and conduct her soul forth to meet the immensity of space.

"Bipeds," he said, solemnly. "See what they become even at the small elevation of 340 feet—mere crawling insects going to and fro at random."

"Oh, they ain't anything of the kind," exclaimed Daisy, suddenly—"they're folks! I saw an automobile. Oh, are we that high up?

"Walk over this way," said Dabster.

He showed her the great city lying like an orderly array of toys far below, starred here and there, early as it was, by the first beacon lights of the winter afternoon. And then the bay and sea to the south and east vanishing mysteriously into the sky.

"I don't like it," declared Daisy, with troubled blue eyes. "Say we go down."

But the philosopher was not to be denied his opportunity. He would let her behold the grandeur of his mind, the half-nelson he had on the infinite, and the memory he had of statistics. And then she would nevermore be content to buy chewing gum at the smallest store in New York. And so he began to prate of the smallness of human affairs, and how that even so slight a removal from earth made man and his work look like the tenth part of a dollar thrice computed. And that one should consider the sidereal system and the maxims of Epictetus and be comforted.

"You don't carry me with you," said Daisy. "Say I think it's awful to be up so high that folks look like fleas. One of them we saw might have been Joe. Why, we might as well be in New Jersey! Say, I'm afraid up here!"

The philosopher smiled fatuously.

"The earth," said he, "is itself only as a grain of wheat in space. Look up there."

Daisy gazed upward apprehensively. The short day was spent and the stars were coming out above.

"Yonder star," said Dabster. "is Venus, the evening star. She is 66,000,000 miles from the sun."

"Fudge!" said Daisy, with a brief dash of spirit, "where do you think I came from —Brooklyn? Susie Price, in our store—her brother sent her a ticket to go to San Francisco—that's only three thousand miles."

The philosopher smiled indulgently.

"Our world," he said, "is 91,000,000 miles from the sun. There are eighteen stars of the first magnitude that are 211,000 times further from us than the sun is. If one of them should be extinguished it would be three years before we would see its light go out. There are six thousand stars of the sixth magnitude. It takes thirty-six years for the light of one of them to reach the earth. With an eighteen-foot telescope we can see 43,000,000 stars including those of the thirteenth magnitude, whose light takes 2,700 years to reach us. Each of these stars——"

"You're lyin'," cried Daisy, angrily. "You're tryin' to scare me. And you have; I want to go down!"

She stamped her foot.

"Arcturus——" began the philosopher, soothingly, but he was interrupted by a demonstration out of the vastness of the nature that he was endeavoring to portray with his memory instead of his heart. For to the heart-expounder of nature the stars were set in the firmament expressly to give soft light to lovers wandering happily beneath them; and if you stand tiptoe some September night with your sweetheart on your arm you can almost touch them with your hand. Three years for their light to reach us, indeed!

Out of the west leaped a meteor, lighting the roof of the skyscraper almost to midday. Its fiery parabola was limned against the sky toward the east. It hissed as it went, and Daisy screamed.

"Take me down," she cried vehemently, "you—you mental arithmetic!"

Dabster got her to the elevator, and inside of it. She was wild-eyed, and she shuddered when the express made its debilitating drop.

Outside the revolving door of the skyscraper the philosopher lost her. She vanished; and he stood, bewildered, without figures or statistics to aid him.

Joe had a lull in trade, and by squirming among his stock succeeded in getting one cold foot against the attentuated stove.

The door was burst open, and Daisy, laughing, crying, scattering fruit and candies, tumbled into his arms.

"Oh, Joe, I've been up on the skyscraper, Ain't it cozy and warm and homelike in here! I'm ready for you, Joe, whenever you want me."

ELDER JONES' QUESTION BOX

Down at the Dusky Avenue Church, the good old pastor, Mose Jones, believes in modern methods and ways when they are consistent with Christian life. That is why he introduced the question box.

At first it didn't go very well, but it's doing better since a white man stuffed it one day to see what Uncle Mose would say to some of the questions. The result was more light than is sometimes given when the stereotyped questions are answered on Quality Street. We quote only a few.

Question.—"Where did Cain get his wife?" Anxious Inquirer.

Answer.—"Yessah, you is a anxious inquirer; ob course, you is, but you nee'n be so troubled 'bout ole Miss Cain. She haint a candidatin' foh a secondary man. She's daid; she done died morne fohty years ago. 'Whah'd Cain get her?" He marred her shore up in Nodd County, east of Eden. Dat's where Adam got his wife too, case he was an Noddin when she was made to order. But say, you all let sich questions 'lone. You tink the Lawd tole all he knowd in dis book. What foh he writes dis book? Dis aint jist foh a geenyology ob the Cain famly."

Question—"How can the church reach the masses, and how can the masses reach the church?"

"Heern de white folks 'scussin dat question. Dy said lots of words and never did get em togeder. W'ots wanted is a lot ot gettin' togeder, and on the Lawd's side. I'se a good mind to tell you how not to reach de masses; I knows a heap more about dat dan how to reach em. Ye can't reach em for no good wid a cake walk or a hick'ry limb. Ye can't reach em for no good by gwine in de ways deys a trabbelin'. If youse willin' to go half way to Hell wid em, neentu spec dem to turn roun' and march to Heaben wid you. Old Deacon Brose Swift tried dat. He went to the Debil wid de masses; said when he stahted he was gwine to bring em back to de church wid him. But dey didn't come, an Swift didn't come, an de last time he was seen dis side of de grabe yahd, he was still trabblein' de down hill paf on a lighten' 'spress train. Don' none of ye follow him.

"How can the masses reach the churches?" is anudder question. Dey reach it easy 'nuff if dey want to; if dey want to reach it to trabel to Heaben wid it, dey just come in and repent ob der sins, go to Heaben by de good ole way. If dey want to reach it to use hit jist 'foh 'lection, dey don't have to be tole. Dey crook der little finger and say, 'Bruvver Soneso, come,' an too many of you tote dere debelishness for em fur a passel of Satan's nickels. I'se done warned you dat hits just as wuss to go to de bad for money as to go for nuffin', and a heap more temptin.'"

Question—"How may we be sure our prayers are going to be answered?" Mourner.

Answer.—"You caint be sure till you're sartin.' You keep right on a mounin' and a sinnin' and a onbelievin' and fust thing you know you wont know no mo' dan you knowed fo' you did'nt know nuffin. How your little gal know your gwine to gib her someting she ax you foh? Tell me dat. She mounin' and a mounin' and crin' out 'mammy, gib me someting,' you say, 'What my leetle gal want?' and she say, 'I want a lookin' glass an a hammer.' What you do? You gib her a shingle. Aint dat gal's prayer answered better an if you done gib her what's she crin' foh? Or she's mounin' and cryin' and sayin': 'Mammy, I want something,' and you say, 'What you want, honey?' and she say, 'I want someting to eat.' You say, Here's fine breakfas' foh my lettle gal, bilin' in de coffee pot, sizzlin' in de fryin' pan and warmin' in de oben.' Caint dat little gal know her prayer's being answered as fas' as mammy can do de cookin'? Supposin' you say, 'honey, run git mammy some chips,' and she don't go. Who's stoppin' de breakfas' blessin' den? Mourner, you better quit a mounin' and go to believin' and a trustin,' and a helpin de Lawd a leetle, stidder a doubtin' an a mounin.'"

Question—"What is the sin that can never be forgiven?"—Old Sinner.

Answer——"What you all want to know fur? You want to keep a sinnin' an' a sinnin' till you git plum to de aidge ob de sin dat haint got no come back to it? If dat's de way de Ole Sinner's feelin', he wont need to ax any questions 'bout dat last sin. He'll fin' it a heap 'fore he tinks he's gwine to. De shorest way to git anywhar is to keep a trabblein' in de way ob de place youse seekin.' Mout as well, say 'Mister Preacher, which am de shorest way to Hell?' You jist keep on down Dis'bedience Street and follow Transgressor Abenue, same way yourse pintin' and you'll git dar too soon, but if Ole Sinner want to git away from dat sin dat's a difference. You turn right tudder side, front and staht up Prayer Street fo' de Kingdom. You wont reach dat bad sin by Repentance Road and Trust-de-Lawd Boolevahd. No, sah, if youse huntin' foh Heaben, turn right round and take up your cros and quit your pizen ways."

Question—"How can we know which church is the right one to join."

Answer—"De road to Heaben is the way to go. Hits a narrow way and straight as a telegraft wire. Dey haint much difference which church you jine, Baptist' is on dat road. Meffidis' trabblein' de same way. Christian, Presbygational and Benighted Brevern', all agoin' de same way. Taint different roads at al, hits different spectacles dey's a wearing. If you happen to git on dem great magnifyin' glasses, youse a Meffedis' and can't help it. If you git de water color glasses, youse a Baptis' or may be a Christian Church member. If youse got green or blue or brown or gold color, you belong to some uder Persuasion, but jist befoh you git to de gate ob Heaben, you 'frow away your spectacles, and say, 'Bress de Lawd, wese all brevern,' I knowed it all de time.' Jine the church whar you can do de most to help de Lawd's work on, an don't be standin' out dar on Beelzebub Abenue, as a seeker for light in de dark. You'll git light enough if you come whar de Sun ob Righteousness am a shinin.' Taint in no 'clipse, hits you dat's made your own 'clipse by turnin' your back to de light, shuttin' your eyes an swearin' hits midnight."

If a farmer must plow and keep on plowing, and a miner must dig and keep on digging, and a musician must play and keep on playing, and a scholar must study and keep on studying, why should not a man of prayer keep on praying, even though he does not immediately secure the free blessing which he seeks?—*C. The Book World

Dr. Ames' New Book

BY FRANK E. BOREN.

Phillips Brooks said: "No religion that does not think is strong," and "Value no feeling which is not the child of truth and the father of duty." Professor Munsterberg says: "Thinking that is too faint-hearted to act, and acting that is ashamed to think, are a miserable pair who cannot live together through a real life."

The religion of Dr. Edward Scribner Ames, as revealed in his delightful and stimulating little book, "The Divinity of Christ," is not ashamed to think. Nor has it any use for either thought or feeling that is not an incentive to act. The will is central. "Belief is conviction which controls action."

Every sentence reveals the thinker; and, withal, there is such a heart-to-heartness in it, that one is almost transported in imagination to the Hyde Park church, where, sitting in holy fellowship with more than "two or three and Christ," he listens face to face to the simple words of this faithful interpreter of the Master.

My first sermon, in my first pastorate, as a student preacher, was from the words, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." My subject was, "Christ the Revealer of God." One division of my sermon was devoted to the question, Is God as good as Christ? Christ first meant something real to me when I saw that he furnished the terms by which I could interpret God. Of course, then, I approve the author when he says that "the reasonable and satisfying thing is to believe, and to act upon in the belief, that God is as good and gracious as Jesus Christ;" and that "the significant thing finally is not so much whether Christ is divine, as whether God is Christlike!"

The author lays needed emphasis upon the practical, the empirical, the ethical, the real. He is not concerned with a metaphysical Christ; but with a Christ who has value for our daily lives. "Christ presents a problem not for the intellect alone but primarily for the will." "What man really thinks about Christ is therefore to be judged by his daily life, its tone and ideals, its degree of generous, whole-hearted devotion to the things which are true and pure and lovely and of good report."

The author has a healthy social consciousness also pervading the book. The supreme empirical test is, not only whether "other lives like Christ's are possible;" but whether "the social order is capable of incarnating his spirit."

The old method was to start with certain presuppositions about God, and interpret Christ by these speculations. God must have a certain nature; if Jesus is God's Son, he must have a like nature. But the author rightly, and with delightful freshness of expression, insists that it is God and not Christ that is the unknown factor. "In the Christian system, Christ and human experience are the given factors and God is the X."

The divinity of Christ is shown by the fact that he is a normal product of the universe, and not an exception. Unusual, unique, he may be, but not abnormal. The same spiritual forces that account for him are at our disposal. They await our test. "It is in this way that Jesus Christ is recognized as the Son of God, not by accident, nor by the contravention of law, but by the unfolding within him of a spirit sublime enough to be the revelation of the spiritual nature of the world." By making the same venture for holiness that Christ made we may prove in our own experience that "the heart of the world beats true to the heart of Christ, and God—the inmost Soul of all—is like the soul of Christ."

Dr. Ames disclaims being a Unitarian because it is "too negative, too much of a protest and therefore too individualistic and too critical." It partakes equally with Trinitarianism in holding to the old "dualism between the natural and the supernatural." It shares with Trinitarianism the fallacy of interpreting Christ through God. Dr. Ames is therefore "neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but simply a Christian."

One is tempted to multiply quotations from this exceedingly quotable book. The chapter on the "Friendship of Jesus" is especially good. The kind of authority that Jesus exercises is beautifully conceived. "Friendship excludes the very idea of authority based upon power or magic or secrets." "The authority of Jesus is the authority of a discoverer."

The psychologist crops out all through the book, but notably in the chapter on "Two or Three and Christ." It is a good introduction to Professor James; to Fairburn's "Place of Christ in Modern Theology;" to Sabatier's "Religions of Authority and the Region of the Spirit." It would be hard to find a clearer, fresher, more thought-provoking, heart-satisfying statement of the modern view of Christ.

The author is bold in his statements; but he never shocks us by his boldness; for it is just then that he is most convincing and satisfying. He impresses the reader as a deeply religious man, who is not ashamed to think about his religion. He leaves us with a larger outlook and a richer faith. His book warms the heart, quickens the life, satisfies and stimulates the intellect.

BY PETER AINSLIE.

In the volume of six sermons, under the title "The Divinity of Christ," by Dr. Edward Scribner Ames, I am impressed with his sincerity in striving to find a way "to create faith in the soul of the modern man," in the evidences of Christianity's creation of "a better moral order, a juster social system," and I freely confess my sympathy with his passion to that end and by that evidence. The thought and energy of our times are passing out of that crusty period of creeds and dogmas, written and unwritten, to a larger help for and sympathy with all mankind, for "what a man really thinks about Christ is therefore to be judged by his daily life, its tone and ideals, its degrees of generous, whole-hearted devotion to the things that are true and pure and lovely and of good report."

But it is too frequently true that "more concern is shown regarding the theological correctness of a man's ideas about Christ than about the actual influence of Christ in a man's life." This is wrong and Dr. Ames is seeking the more correct standard. And to all this I must likewise confess my hearty agreement, for I am often wearied at the claims of correct orthodoxy, while correct living is quite forgotten. However, in Dr. Ames' effort to get away from the old order of things, he has given some new phrases to thought regarding Christ, which are not always clear and consequently he makes himself liable to be misunderstood, which is one of the prices that men must pay if they touch the travail of the age as it passes out of one order into another. At times he approaches the Unitarian position and, being conscious of this, one of his chapters is, "Why I am not a Unitarian," in which he frankly argues against the Unitarian position and affirms in the language of some of the pioneers of the Disciples of Christ, "I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian."

However, Dr. Ames falls into an error, common to sociologists, and that is in his attempt to establish the sociological claims of Christ, he indirectly attacks the theological position of Christ as if the two were antagonistic. Whereas, they are two different points of the same personality. There is enough in the psychological and sociological view points—and from this position this book is written—to fill volumes of the richest thought without an attempt to undermine the principles of any other view point. The supernatural birth, the atoning death and the glorious resurrection belong to theology, but to see the whole Christ, one must include the theological, psychological and sociological view points. Christ is God and He is precious from any view point, but He becomes highest to us as we view Him from all view points—the Christ of the pardoned sinner and the Chirst of the resurrection, as well as the Christ "the chief figure in the forefront of our crusades against disease, bad tenements, heartless corporations, child labor and the rest." It is true that theology has dwarfed Christ and laid upon Him a cross heavier than that which He bore to Calvary, but now sociology must see that it does not repeat the sin of theology.

The blood of Lincoln was good and to us he was one of the best among mankind, but his blood cannot be named by the blood of Christ, neither does the fact that the heathen believed that the gods took the women of the human race for wives disprove the supernatural birth of Christ. Because all heathen people have had some kind of a broken faith in God and immortality, does that prove therefore that there is neither God nor immortality? Is it not rather evidence to the fact?

My chief criticism, however, is the discredit that Dr. Ames gives to the utterances of the Apostle Paul, and this is not a criticism alone against Dr. Ames, for it belongs to both the radical and conservative schools of Bible study. As for instance, on the coming of our Lord, to which reference is made. Because many will not accept Paul's statements on that subject is more a matter of unfaith in the believer than error in the utterances of the apostle. It is commonly explained by both radicals and conservatives that Paul did not clearly understand the second advent, but thought that Christ was coming in his life time. I am not arguing for the second advent, neither am I emphasizing either the premillennial or postmillennial positions, but simply naming the second advent of our Lord as an instance in which both radical and conservative schools discredit the scriptures. If it be so that Paul did not understand this subject, and it may be so, then we have little evidence that he clearly understood anything else upon which he wrote, for he appears to have written more upon that subject than upon any other. Whatever may be our views of the Bible, it is injurious to individual faith to discredit any part of those utterances that the concensus of critics affirm are the words of Christ and His apostle, whatever may be our opinions regarding the subjects treated. The deity of Christ—not the doctrine, but the fact—is the power of the world's uplift.

Our Readers' Opinions

A Letter from Z. T. Sweeney

Dear Bro. Morrison: The Century for January 18 has been forwarded, reaching me here a few days ago. Before pressing the main issue between us, I will pay attention to some of the accusations you bring against my article.

(1) You accuse me of evading the point of Bro. Hughes' article and even of not comprehending it. That is an old dodge, but it has been worked overtime. In future there will be no hiding behind the phrase, "you don't understand."

I did understand him, and I hit the "bull's-eye" in describing it. The article means exactly what I said it did, or it doesn't mean a thing under heaven. If Bro. Hughes thinks I have misrepresented him, let him take the matter up with me when I have located you and I will convince him.

(2) You accuse me of contradicting myself by saying in one place, "Baptism contains the self consecration of the candidate and his initiation," etc., and in another place that "Baptism is a physical act." I said both of those things and repeat them now. There is not the shadow of a contradiction. In the first statement I was speaking of the design or purpose of baptism; in the second I was speaking of the act of baptism. You seem, in all your writings, to utterly fail to comprehend that the act of baptism is one thing, and its purpose is another. You can't write half a dozen lines on the act of baptism without discussing its design; and you can't write three sentences on the purpose of baptism without lugging in its action. I think it is this mixing up of things that should be kept distinct that makes your writings read so much like Mrs. Eddy's.

(3) You accuse me of saying, "Baptism transforms the will from rebellion to subjection." I never said that. What I did say was, "Baptism transforms the will from an outward visible state of rebellion, to one of outward visible subjection." When you eliminated the words "outward visible state of" you robbed my statement of its meaning. That is not fair, Bro. Morrison. You have no right to edit my side of this discussion. If you have to go to the wall, go like a brave man. Don't "hit below the belt."

(4) You accuse me of saying, because the act of baptism is performed upon the candidate, "therefore the candidate's part in it is purely physical." Now I did not say that, nor anything that can be construed into it. I stated exactly the reverse. I distinctly said baptism is "not a mere physical act." "Tote fair," Bro. Morrison.

(5) You accuse me of puerility and boyish thinking because I say, "Only a physical act can be performed upon one by another." You then proceed to give three illustrations, every one of which sustains my position and contradicts yours. Illustration first: "We do bestow love upon another." But it is utterly impossible to do so without some visible act. You may cherish a psychic love for another, but you can't bestow it psychically. How long would your wife be satisfied with a psychic love? Illustration second: "We do give ideas to another." We never do so psychically. There must be such visible action as speaking, writing, mailing, etc., before we can give another an idea. Illustration third: "We do endow another with authority." But we don't and can't without it is by a physical act. If I had gone to Turkey (as you suggest) with only a psychic authority from Pres. Harrison, I never would have seen the inside of the Sublime Porte. But when he bestowed authority it was through a physical act, bearing his signature and the great seal of the U. S. government. In fact, you overthrow all your illustrations. When you say, "they involve tokens of love, signs of ideas, and symbols of authority." Precisely! "Tokens," "signs," "symbols" are the physical acts which represent the psychic ideas of love, ideas and authority, but they are necessary in order to the bestowal. We are then back to my original statement confirmed by your own illustrations. If you can't make a better showing of mature and mannish thinking, I guess I'll stick to my puerility and boyish thought.

Now for the real issue: The first accusation I made against you was assuming that baptism is a psychic act. You deny making that statement. You can't deny making the assumption and the argument. You have said that baptism is not a physical act, that neither immersion nor affusion is baptism. These are the only physical acts connected with baptism. In fact, your whole contention for months has been that immersion is the only regular way of solemnizing baptism, that sprinking and pouring are irregular but valid ways of solemnizing baptism. If there is any meaning to your contention, it is that baptism is a psychic act that may be solemnized regularly by immersion and irregularly, but validly, by sprinkling and pouring. Besides, you deny making the statement in one breath and make it in the next breath. Listen. "Our statement is, that baptism is essentially a psychical, social, spiritual act. We do not deny that there is a physical aspect to the baptismal act, some objective sign in which the will of the organized society, called the church, meets the will of the individual candidate." Organized fiddlesticks! Where in the literature of the Disciples of Christ or the New Testament do you read anything about the organized will of the church having anything to do with baptism? If the "organized will of the church" had kept its hands off the baptismal question there would have been no trouble over the question today. A child ten years old can see the "African in the fuel collection" of that definition. That is gotten up by you to permit the organized will of the church to express itself on baptism. Baptism is a matter between the sinner and Jesus Christ. But to return. I accept your modified statement that baptism is essentially a psychic act.

Assumption second: Infant baptism is valid where the subject having grown to an accountable age assumes the relations and duties of church membership. Now the above is your own statement. Concerning it you say, "The whole of this section is irrelevant to our position. Dr. Sweeney failed to follow our statements. He gives the impression here that we affirmed, that the assumption of the relations and duties of church membership by one who was baptized in infancy, validates the thing that was done in infancy." How can Dr. Sweeney fail to follow your statement when he simply quotes it word for word? How can I create an impression that you affirm a certain thing, when you have previously stated it yourself? Listen to your own words: "Without such personal assumption of relations and duties, the act of sprinkling water upon the child is utterly without meaning." Couple this quotation with assumption No. 2, and see if you don't validate infant baptism!

Assumption third: "A large portion of the unquestioned membership of the church of Christ is made up of those who have received no other baptism than infant baptism." You don't deny that I represent you correctly, but say that it is true "in this sense." Well, you can add those words if you wish. I deny its truth in any sense.

Assumption fourth: In all the above assumptions you pose as a true and real representative of the Disciples of Christ.

On this assumption you again state your representative character and my misrepresentative character and welcome my challenge. As the matter stands, I accuse you of four distinct assumptions, as follows:

(1) Baptism is essentially a psychic act.

(2) "Infant baptism is valid where the subject, having grown to an accountable age, assumes the relations and duties of church membership. . . . Without such personal assumption of relations and duties the act of sprinkling water upon the child is utterly without meaning."

(3) A large portion of the unquestionable membership of the church of Christ is made of those who have received no other baptism than infant baptism."

(4) In all the above assumptions you pose as a true and real representative of the Disciples of Christ.

I denied all the above assumptions and challenged you to find representative men that will endorse your assumptions. You accept the challenge but say, "Before doing so, we prefer to take the issue out of its controversial form by making a restatement in six affirmations," etc. But, Bro. Morrison, I am not willing to take "the issue out of its controversial form." That will kill the issue. You and I have a clear-cut issue, viz.: Whether in the above assumptions you represent the Disciples of Christ. If you represent them, I do not. If I represent them, you do not. There is no way to take it out of a controversial form. When we have settled the controversy between us I am perfectly willing to consider your six propositions.

Now I propose that I write to the gentlemen you have named, quoting the four assumptions as we have agreed upon, and ask them if they endorse you as representative of the Disciples of Christ in making the assumptions. If a majority of them do, I will issue a statement in the next number of The Century saying I do not represent the Disciples of Christ. If these men you have named do not endorse you and your assumptions, then you issue a statement that you do not represent the Disciples of Christ. We are both in the balances. Come up to the work like a man and say I can write the parties named. Yours for the truth,

New York City. Z. T. SWEENEY.

[It hardly seems necessary to take further space in restating the points made in our issue of January 18. Our readers will probably look up for themselves the argument that was there presented. We gladly give Dr. Sweeney the last word in the discussion.

The Christian Century would find much satisfaction in such a questionnaire as Dr. Sweeney proposes to make. There are two considerations, however, which he will bear in mind. (1) That the names of missionary society officers and college men have been withdrawn; and (2) that this list of names was used not as endorsing our "assumptions" or any controversially worded issue. These names were cited as endorsing six definite propositions. The difficulty we have experienced in getting two or three of these good brethren to really read the theses for the endorsement of which we took the liberty of appealing to them, confirms us in the wisdom of our refusal to ask them to see through the dust of Dr. Sweeney's discussion just what the issue is. We will take pleasure in opening our pages to publish the replies of the brethren if Dr. Sweeney will communicate with them. THE EDITORS.]

Men and Religion in Pittsburgh

A Virile Report of a Virile Event

JOHN RAY EWERS.

As a member of the Committee of One Hundred I have been able to see from the inside the Men and Religion Movement in our city. For months we have been having luncheons, with speakers and reports. The luncheon method is the fashion nowadays. Every religious and social organization to which one belongs meets at a conference-luncheon, at some down town hotel. Some thrilling speaker takes the floor, while the rest of us eat our dessert, plans are made, committees appointed, we pay about four times what the food is worth, as we pass smilingly out, and so the world's work is done. If eating and talking can reform the world the millenium is at hand. But out of it all great things come to pass.

The Team of Experts.

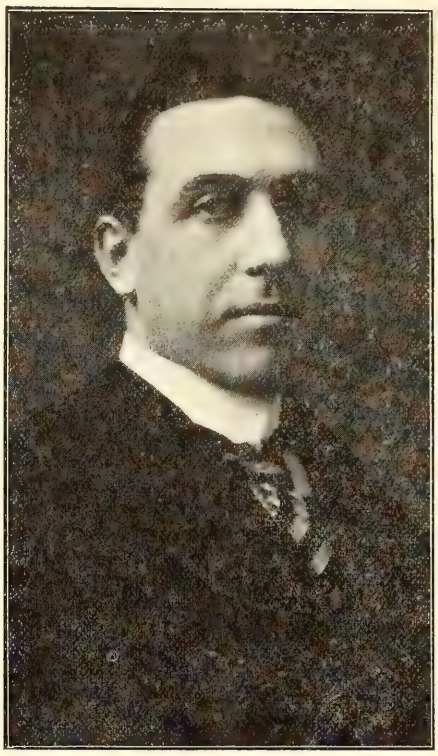
Ten days ago the team of experts came to town. Fine, clean, clear-cut fellows, masters of the situation. Mr. Raymond Robins opened the campaign with a ringing social message to 4,500 men in Exposition Hall. This was on Sunday afternoon. The rest of the week was given over to institutes, conferences, luncheons, platform meetings, in five centers, and last, but by no means least, to shop meetings, where from twenty-five to seven hundred men listened to out-of-town and local men. 185 preachers were present on Monday. This was not unusual, for we had about 300 present the day we endorsed Church Federation. But in many regards Pittsburgh broke all records. With all our sins ours is a good city. Our enormous churches are crowded on Sundays. In many of them you cannot buy a sitting, and they have waiting lists. Sunday, or Sabbath, as these Presbyterians insist upon calling it, is observed as in no other city upon this western hemisphere, save Toronto.

Why Pittsburgh is Backward.

But I discovered last evening, at Dr. Ross' lecture, why Pittsburgh is backward socially and in a civic way, although, with our city council of nine good men and true, we are setting a pace for many other big towns. Dr. Ross of Wisconsin said that he was opposed to unrestricted immigration because we had to spend our energies in bringing up to American standards these foreigners, when, if we were a homogeneous people, like the Germans, we could spend all our energies in working out our own problems. There is no doubt but that the large foreign population in Pittsburgh holds us down and back. We have to spend the most of our time and talents in Americanizing them, while the politicians play the Poles against the Germans, the Irish against the English, the Italians against the Slavs and the Protestants against the Catholics.

Boys' Work.

On Saturday afternoon in the old Brimstone Corner M. E. Church, a thousand men met to hear the recommendations of the five committees. These reports were received with loud cheering. A wise program was laid down for boys' work. One point that impressed me was the statement that the very best way to handle boys is in the organized Sunday-school class. The reason given was that thus the church maintains authority over the boys and holds them within its own ranks. While the Boys' Brigade, the Boy Scouts and all those movements put the authority outside the church. After considerable experience with such movements I heartily endorse that idea. It is correct. All the good ideas of those movements may be incorporated in a Boys' Department in the Sunday-school.



Rev. John R. Ewers.

Proud of Japanese Representative.

We Disciples were immensely proud of Mr. Minakuchi, the Japanese leader of the missionary forces. We had a denominational luncheon for him and he told us why he became a Disciple. The credit goes to Miss Lavinia Oldham, and if she never did anything else in her whole life except convert Minakuchi, she has a large star in her crown. He is a brilliant and polished gentleman, a Yale graduate. He was with the Laymen's Movement and his speeches aroused the greatest enthusiasm. "Christianity," he told us, "is Christ, and the Disciples have only to open the book and let a man read for himself." Missionary institutes, the every-member-canvass, and weekly contributions were advised.

Personal Evangelism and Bible Study.

Not so much enthusiasm was shown for evangelism. The idea of work by men for men was emphasized. A plea was made for spirit-filled men to go out after men in the offices, mills and places of business. It was significant that no new machinery was advised, but great stress was placed upon more fire under the boilers. Each man must realize God for himself and then take Him to others.

The feeling was deep when the Extension Committee reported. The response of the men in the mills was wonderful. The shop meetings were most encouraging, and it was freely predicted that Pittsburgh would lead the country in the number and size of shop-meetings. The men are anxious to hear the gospel story from real men.

Social Service and Fred B. Smith.

Social-service, and this is significant, secured the greatest attention. On Friday I attended a Social-service luncheon where all the social workers in the city made suggestions. It was one of the most intense meetings I was ever in. The recommendations, therefore, which came in on Saturday were white-hot. Thunderous applause greeted many local features. Let me say to you that Social-service is uppermost.

But the great meeting came on Sunday afternoon, when Fred B. Smith addressed nearly 5,000 men. Sitting upon the platform I looked out over a sea of faces. Those smooth faces of the men looked like so many eggs in a crate. Personality was lost in the distance. The men sang, and what a soul stirring wave of praise it was. Then the International quartet sang. Someone prayed. It was a heartful prayer, and then Smith took charge. He is a big man. You do not need to call him Mister, Doctor, Brother, or anything except Smith. He is the biggest thing, when it comes to talking to men, I ever heard. He strikes with the hammer of Thor. He persuades like a lover. He moans like Jeremiah. He makes you laugh uproariously. He stirs your manly emotions until the hot tears dash out of your eyes and burn down your cheeks. And when it is all over you feel that it was all sane, true, brave and divine. You go away better. You feel that you always will be better and want to be better. You see some situations as you never saw them before.

What Smith Said.

Smith told us that America is in danger of losing religion. First, because the story of Jesus is too common. We could not appreciate it like the heathen. Second, because of our craze for fun. He said that history nowhere told of such cheap fun as America runs after. "Five and Ten-cent fun! God pity the minister who talks to that kind of cattle," he cried. "We cannot sit down at home and read a book, but run the streets for silly amusement." He hit the bull's eye there. Third, because we are too prosperous. "Money makes fools of men. Not more than ten men in the whole audience could receive riches and not become fools," he said. Prosperity makes us forget God. His illustrations were masterpieces. Each one gripped the men.

Drawing the Net.

Then he drew the net. He asked every man who could say truthfully that he was a Christian and was living a Christian life to close his eyes and stand. About five-sixths of the crowd arose. Then while these bowed their heads in prayer, he asked those who wanted to become Christians to stand. This was the climax of the meeting. The men arose in large numbers all over the house. They meant business, too. It was serious. The whole thing was natural and healthy. Cards were passed to these men. Then he asked all those who would enter into a solemn vow with him to go out to live a more Godly life to raise the right arm. What a forest of arms! The quartet sang, "I Am Coming Home," and men continued to rise. Then a great prayer and the men silently went out into the zero weather.

Profound and Permanent Results.

We feel in Pittsburgh that the movement was so solidly planned, so splendidly conducted, that the results are assured. We feel that our great city is entering into a reign of righteousness, justice and mercy. We feel that God is coming to His own in this workshop of the world. The mighty arms of Vulcan will uplift the world. The iron endurance and the steel strength of Pittsburgh are dedicated to the King of Heaven.

Books of Especial Interest

TO MOTHER, by Marjorie Benton Cooke. This is another tribute from a daughter to her mother, and is issued in charming, artistic style. It is a sequence of twenty-five sonnets—not the usual octette and sextette form of the Italian sonnet, but the freer Shakesperean form of three quatrains and a couplet. While of varying excellence, they are full of warmth and feeling, and have the touch of the true poet. This one, on "Mother's Hands," is a fair example:

"I see them sometimes upraised, as in prayer,
Or loosely clasped, a-weary with much toil;
I watch them as they deftly twist and coil
The smooth bands of her silken, soft, grey hair;
I mark them as they fold and stitch and sew—
What days and weeks, aye, years, those hands have seamed
Since first above her baby's clothes she leaned,
And wove her mother dreams so long ago!
I feel them smooth my childish woes to rest;
They bind a laurel wreath to guerdon youth;
But always bearing gifts they came, in truth,
Nor will they tire till crossed upon her breast!
When I shall come where gentle Jesus stands,
He'll welcome me with mother's loving hands!

(Chicago, Forbes & Company, Fifty cents.)

THE ELEVENTH HOUR IN THE LIFE OF JULIA WARD HOWE, by her daughter, Maud Howe. This little book is a daughter's tribute to her mother, and gives faithful and intimate recollections of the last five years in the life of one of the most interesting women that America has produced. At the recent convention of the National Woman Suffrage Association in Louisville, frequent and honorable mention was made of Kentucky's oldest suffragist, Mrs. Susan Cook Avery, then in her ninety-fourth year. Miss Jane Addams said she once asked Mrs. Avery the secret of her remarkable mental and physical vigor, and the reply was, "Always be on the unpopular side."

Our book says of Mrs. Howe, "She had met with so much opposition all her life, through serving the unpopular causes of anti-slavery, woman suffrage, and religious freedom, that she had learned that the real joy of life lies in battle, not in victory." This may have been one of the secrets of her full and useful ninety-one years, but she always claimed that work was an essential to longevity. Her life's philosophy might be summed up in her own lines,

"In the house of labor best
Can I build the house of rest."

She was a student all her life, and knew six languages beside her own—learning Greek after she was fifty years old. She delighted in the classics and knew thirty of the Odes of Horace by heart; she was learning one, line by line, when the summons came. She was especially fond of German philosophy, and for years Kant was an intimate companion of her thought. She not only kept her mind alert and well stored by daily study, but was constantly giving out. She was pre-eminently a poet, and wrote and re-wrote her manuscripts. Only her most famous poem, "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," came without care and toil—that, she often said, "wrote itself." For that great poem, by the way, the Atlantic Monthly only paid her five dollars, the only money she ever received for it. She did nearly all her writing with her own hand, claiming that the presence of another interrupted the flow of thought. She was orator as well as poet, and to the last was in demand for platform work. She charged nothing for her services, but accepted what was given her. She spoke and wrote oftenest for love, and next often for a fee of five dollars. Her first need was to give—so much had been bestowed on her, that she was always trying to pay her debt by sharing with others. She was a living exponent of Rabbi Ben Ezra's philosophy:

"Grow old along with me;
The best is yet to be,
The last of life, for which the first was planned."

One of her saying was, "Life is like a cup of tea; the sugar is all at the bottom."

Once when her daughter asked her for the ideal aim of life, her answer was in a sentence, clear and cosmic as a single rain drop, "To learn, to teach, to serve, and to enjoy."

Women of Note

—Mrs. Charles Netcher, head of the Boston store, Chicago, has just taken out a $500,000 policy, raising the total insurance on her life to $1,200,000. She now holds the world's record for women and tops all Chicago men in the amount of life insurance.

—Col. Edward Green, of Texas, a son of Hetty Green, who has escaped matrimony in spite of his money, has not the best opinion of the society woman of New York. The colonel says: "If a fashionable New York woman went up 5th avenue with a ring in her nose, the jewelers could not make nose rings fast enough to supply the demand."

—The Russian emperor has granted a pension to the widow of Tolstoi, who hereafter will receive 10,000 roubles ($5,000) annually.

—The Pope is said to be decidedly against woman suffrage, and he does not approve the struggle for woman's rights.

—A leading Chicago paper recently published the names of ten women, considered by a prominent artist, the ten most beautiful women in Chicago society. A glance at the faces as they appeared, easily convinced the observer that the only trouble with the "prominent" artist was her blindness.

—President Taft's aunt, Miss Delia Torrey, of Millbury, Mass., will visit several weeks at the white house. Aunt Delia is nearly 90 years old, and has done little traveling this winter on account of the extreme weather. She ventures on so long a trip as the Washington journey only in response to the earnest invitation of President and Mrs. Taft. The president himself has promised to escort her back in March.

—The will of Mrs. Caroline Neustadter, who died at the Hotel Netherlands, New York, on January 19, leaves charitable bequests of more than $2,000,000, chief of which is a trust fund of $1,000,000 to establish a vacation home for the poor and needy and for convalescents or persons in delicate health. It is to be called the Neustadter home.

To Nervous Women

Avoid haste and hurry; these are the things that confuse the brain and make clear judgment impossible. The besetting temptation of the nervous woman is to hurry from one duty to another in breathless haste, attempting many tasks, yet achieving none of them with dignity or freedom. When such a temptation arises, call a halt. Remain quiet for a few minutes; summon back your self-possession, and refuse to do in one hour work that should be spread over two.

Habituate yourself to the control of the emotions. Nothing makes such havoc of the nervous system, nothing disorganizes the inner life like anger, fear, worry. These forces must be quelled if the soul is to maintain its supremacy and nervous peace is to be enjoyed; and this is done, not, indeed, by a feat of the will, but by substituting for these destructive emotions such constructive ones as love, aspiration after some ideal, faith in God and reverence for the divine order of life.—Dr. S. S. McComb, in Harper's Bazaar.

The Prayer of the Christ Child

O great, wide world, I've come to cleanse and save,
O world of sorrow, world of sin and night,
I gladly lay upon thine altar high
This life of mine, and may it usher in
A dawn of love to flood the universe,
And shed its life adown all time.
Let me atone, O God, for all men's sins;
O, let me free the earth from all its pain;
O, let me take the sea's moan and the wind's
Wild wail from them and make them mine!
O, let me take the cry from human souls;
O, let me bear the weight of human shame;
O, let me suffer all, that in the end
I may, through love, lead back mankind to Thee!
O great, white world, kneel thou a penitent—
Make me thy prayer, and send me back to God!

—A Toronto dispatch to the Canadian press says that church union, which appeared scarcely more than a possibility five years ago, is now a very near probability with respect to the Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational churches.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

Princeton Church, of which Cecil C. Carpenter is minister, gained in membership last year forty-seven, with the financial report of the church showing a larger contribution than in previous years.

Evangelists Hill and Knowles have begun a meeting at Indianola, in which there are already four additions. The first Sunday of the meeting the other congregations of the city dismissed their services to assist in the revival.

A fire in the church at Havana did considerable damage to the tower of the structure. The main part of the church was not damaged. The pastor of this church, Ralph V. Callaway, is carrying forward a work which is being reported most favorably.

The revival meeting at Flora, where Evangelist H. M. Barnett assisted the pastor, C. W. Marlow, resulted in twenty-six additions, all but five being by baptism. The services of the evangelist are highly commended by the pastor and congregation.

Oden Church is having a great in-gathering under the evangelistic labors of J. E Stout. The total of additions so far is sixty-three, forty-seven of whom are by baptism. It is reported that the evangelist is to hold a debate on baptism with the Methodist pastor of the town.

Charles D. Hougham, district evangelist, had numbered twenty-one additions in his meeting at Exeter at last report. All of these were on profession of faith. Mr. Hougham is being assisted in this, his first meeting in the district, by Miss Alice Taylor, of the West Side Church, Springfield.

Second Church, Bloomington, of which S. H. Zendt is pastor, will hold joint services with the First Baptist Church on February 18. In the morning the service will be held at the Baptist Church, and in the evening at the Christian church. Mr. Zendt will preach at both services.

The church at Greenville has concluded a short meeting conducted by its pastor, Ivan W. Agee, with seven additions resulting. This was the fourth revival meeting in consecutive years, which Mr. Agee has held for this congregation, of which he has been pastor for five years.

Lincoln Church, which has been pastorless since the retirement of E. A. Gilliland the first of the year, to enter the evangelistic field, has extended a call to W. H. Wise, of DeLand, and the call has been accepted. Mr. Wise was for four years pastor of DuQuoin Church before locating at DeLand.

The F. F. Walters meeting at Shelbyville at last report had added twenty persons to the membership of the church, all but three of these being by baptism. The revival was to continue yet for several days. The pastor, R. H. Robertson, and the congregation are most cordial in their words of praise for the evangelist.

State Secretary J. Fred Jones assisted in a "Forward Movement" campaign at Central Church, Rockford, at the close of which $5,000 was pledged toward the construction of a new church edifice. The building will not be started until twice this amount is pledged, at which time only a part of the structure will be builded.

Sidell Church is holding a revival meeting conducted by its pastor, H. H. Williams, which began last Sunday. Mr. Williams is assisted by Walter Scott of Danville. This pastor was recently subjected to the compliment of a pound party, administered by a large number of the congregation.

At Mattoon, where F. B. Thomas ministers, a new building enterprise will soon be undertaken. It is said the structure will cost in the neighborhood of forty or fifty thousand dollars, and will have an auditorium capable of seating five hundred people. It is expected to equip the building for some institutional work. This congregation numbers nine hundred, and enjoys a large influence throughout the community.

W. W. Sniff, the pastor at Paris, had the coöperation of Evangelists Lockhart and Lintt in a great revival meeting, which closed the latter part of January with one hundred thirty additions. The meeting lasted only three and one-half weeks, and was greatly impeded by the unusual weather and failure of the heating plant. These obstacles were, however, overcome, and results beyond expectations were achieved.

The country congregation at Ash Grove, where H. B. Easterling of Decatur is pastor, probably has a record for average attendance at services for the past twelve months well up to the front for country churches. It is reported that 200 is the average attendance—a fine congregation not only for the country, but for even many of our large city churches. During the last year, there were thirty-four additions to the church.

At Beardstown, there were five additions on a recent Sunday evening, one of whom was formerly a Baptist minister, who, while employed otherwise through the week, would be glad to entertain a call for pulpit ministrations on Sunday. The minister's name is M. C. Hidden. The church at Beardstown is doing a progressive work, under the ministry of G. W. Morton, who is having a large hearing outside the membership of the congregation.

Illinois Secretarys' Letter

The field secretary dedicated the new house at Oakwood Feb. 4, and raised $300 over the amount needed. They are happy, and Geo. J. Huff is the minister. They have a very good house, up-to-date, and it will be a great help to their work.

A. F. Norman has been supplying New Boston for some weeks, and on Jan. 28 the church called him to be their minister full time. They are lined up for the Front Rank, and hope to attain all the points.

Sorry to note that R. H. Robertson of Shelbyville is to close his work there soon and locate at North Salem, Ind. Mr. Robertson is a true man in every sense, and will do a creditable work wherever he goes.

The Beardstown mission is growing steadily under the leadership of G. W. Morton. He reports a number of splendid accessions recently.

Word has just reached the office that Andrew Scott, evangelist for the Sixth district, is to locate with the Hoopeston church.

O. McNemar, of El Paso, has just closed a meeting with Robert W. Moore and the White Hall church with a number of additions. Mr. Moore will assist Mr. McNemar in a meeting soon.

E. A. Gilliland and singer have begun a meeting with Pastor Reed and the Washington church. His meeting at Le Roy was quite a success.

J. P. Darst, of Peoria, member of our state board, and treasurer of the permanent fund, is spending a few months in Los Angeles, Cal.

W. G. McColley of Paxton has time for a meeting. Write him for a date, and he will do a good service.

I. G. Williams, of Allendale, writes that he is much pleased with his work in "Egypt," and he finds them a splendid people, and his work is encouraging along all lines.

N. S. Haynes of Decatur is spending the winter in Panama City, Fla. Nevertheless he is pushing his work on the "History of the Disciples of Illinois." If he writes you a letter for some facts and data, please be kind enough to answer at your earliest convenience, and give him all the information you possibly can, even at considerable trouble and effort.

DeForrest Mullins of Springfield, R. D. No. 4, has recovered from his recent illness, and is ready for active work again. Call him.

We help a good many churches to secure preachers, and preachers to secure employment, but you would be surprised how few will even drop us a card and give us the information. "Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine?"

We can soon publish a list of dates and places of the district conventions. The district committees are already working on the programs.

Announcements will soon be made concerning the Ministerial Institute which is to be held this spring at Gibson City—in April. Be sure to attend. Pastor Lehman and his splendid church (with fine new building) are preparing to entertain a large gathering. And the program will be worth going a hundred miles to enjoy.

La Harpe, E. A. Jordan minister, reports all the ten points attained to make them a Front Rank church. The following churches report that they are striving for the goal: Heyworth, Rantoul, Mt. Sterling, Griggsville, Chapin, and Bement.

If you are making an effort to be a Front Rank church, please report to us how many points you have attained, and get in the list of those who are trying. Put up the Front Rank poster in the church, and call attention to it frequently. Boost it.

The church at Havana, Ralph V. Callaway, minister, caught fire Sunday morning, the 4th inst., but it was extinguished before a great amount of damage was done.

Prof. W. H. Keen, of Fairfield, is available for half time preaching.

W. T. McConnell, of Arcola, has accepted the position of cashier of the First National Bank of De Land. Sorry to lose him from the ministry.

Eureka College

Founders' Day Celebration.

February 6 is Founders' Day at Eureka College. It is one of the great days in the calendar of the College, and this year it was exceptional. The service was held in the College Chapel at three o'clock in the afternoon. Rev. D. H. Shields, pastor of the Christian Church, Eureka, lead the congregation in prayer. Music for the program was in charge of the School of Music, conducted by Miss Tuller, pianist, and Miss Stretch, vocalist.

In a few happy words, Acting President Gray introduced President-elect, Chas E. Underwood. President Underwood responded briefly, introducing his remarks with the oft repeated expression of Senator La-Follette, uttered during the darkest period of his political career in Wisconsin, "I thank God for my unconquerable spirit." This he said had been the spirit of Eureka College.

The address of the day was delivered by Mrs. Ella S. Stewart, an alumna of the College, and at present President of the Equal Suffrage League of Illinois and of the Illinois Christian Education Association. It was one of the best addresses heard in Eureka for some time. In the evening a reception was given by the College and the I. C. E. A. to the new President and wife. The students attended in a body, and many citizens of Eureka availed themselves of the opportunity of forming the acquaintance of President Underwood. It was one of the really great days of our College.

In part Mrs. Stewart said: "The problems which confront us today in our social, educational, religious or political life are the problems of today and not of yesterday. More advancement has been made in science since this college was founded than during previous centuries.

"Not only would we be unable to duplicate the work of the founders in starting such a college as this, but we could not fit ourselves to their lives in any way except in the general attitude of loyalty to one's highest vision. And it is with no sense of disrespect, that I make that statement. We cannot allow the spirit of shintoism or ancestor worship to enter even into an occasion like this.

"Our world today is a different world from fifty years ago. Our light is greater, our experience richer. Otherwise, this institution and all of its kind would have existed in vain. If the founders of our college were the type of men I believe them to have been, they made no claim to knowing all truth. They simply opened an institution where, up to the limit of its capacity truth might be sought.

"They provided liberally for every soul to follow the gleam, and be true to himself. They realized that the only value in education is to change and modify, never to solidify. They are no dogmatists with rules of thumb—even though one phase of education here was to seek religious truth. They knew that even interpretation of doctrine as interpretation of literature or science may alter with varying perspective, as an object when one is ascending a height. So I choose to believe that their attitude toward us whom they were endowing (which we trust will pass on to our successors) might be summed up in these words of the Puritan to his son:

"'I was a radical in my day; be thou the same in thine. I turned my back upon old tyrannies and heresies and struck out for new liberties and beliefs. My liberty and my belief are doubtless already tyranny and heresy to thine age. Strike thou for the new.'

"So with gratitude to our forerunners for blazing the trail with the example of their fidelity to their tasks, we turn with inspiration to our own tasks—not trying to duplicate their work but carrying it farther toward accomplishment."

Eureka is entering upon its fifty-seventh year. The charter was granted in 1855 to twenty-four men and their successors, under the title, "The Trustees of Eureka College." This was not, however, the beginning of educational work in this section. As early as 1847 Elder John T. Jones started a school for girls in his home in what was known then as Walnut Grove. In 1848 A. S. Fisher from Bethany College, opened a school in Walnut Grove, in a room 16x16. The next year an addition of 16x24 was added to this. In 1850 a two-story brick building, costing $2,500 was erected. The institution was known then as "Walnut Grove Academy." This grew into Eureka College. Progress in the college has not been great, but it has been substantial. It has property now valued at at least $130,000 and has $170,000 endowment. The outlook is encouraging.

H. H. PETERS.

The Breeden Meeting at Champaign

S. E. Fisher writes as follows: The Breeden-Rockwell evangelistic campaign at University Place Church, Champaign-Urbana, closed Thursday evening, February 1, with the lecture recital by Dr. Breeden on the subject, "The Dialect Poets." The meeting will be a memorable one in the history of University Place for many reasons, chiefly that in the presentation of the Gospel message in sermon and in song the whole atmosphere of the meeting was characterized by simplicity and dignity whose effect was wholesome and enduring. During the four weeks of the meeting, ninety-three men, women and young people were won to Christ. A very large proportion of these were men and women and most of them of the sort that will greatly aid the church in building for the future development of the Kingdom in the twin cities. The preaching by Dr. Breeden drew men and women from all walks to hear the message. He readily found entrance to all circles of the university community life. Faculty men and women and young people from the university seemed to respond to his quiet, dignified appeal as readily as did the young people from the Sunday-school. With Mr. Rockwell's masterly leadership of the chorus and congregational singing and the superb duet work of Mr. and Mrs. Rockwell, there was little left to be desired in the music of the meeting. The work at University Place has a splendid outlook in the new year not only because the Lord has given us many new found helpers during the meeting, but because we have emerged with many problems solved, and with the people inspired with the common purpose of entering upon an aggressive campaign for extension in the whole circle of the church activities.

Church Life

J. B. Hunley has begun work for Ivanhoe Park Church, Kansas City.

D. A. Wickizer is now in a meeting at Collinsville, Okla.

Scott Anderson recently closed a meeting at Ringwood, Okla., with 70 additions.

J. A. McKenzie held a meeting and organized a congregation at Worth, Mo.

G. W Morgan is in a meeting with home forces in East Eugene, Ore. Large crowds, deep interest.

Twenty-seven were received in one day into the fellowship of the church at Salem, Ohio, on Jan. 28, by M. J. Grable.

G. W. Burch delivered the address dedicating the $70,000 Y. M. C. A. building in Charles City, Iowa.

The church at Niles, Ohio, recently held a meeting with home forces with 56 additions. Allen T. Gordon is minister.

A new congregation has been organized at Houston Heights, Tex., by O. M. Pennock, city evangelist.

I. Clark is filling the pulpit at Roseberry, Ida., since the departure of H. F. Barstow, who is now located at Coeur d'Alene, Ida.

G. E. Williams and wife, state evangelists for Oregon, just closed a short meeting with his old college mate E. E. Francis at Selah. Fourteen were added.

J. E. Denton, city evangelist in Seattle, Wash., has two new congregations reported organized during the past year and also about 100 additions.

There were 58 additions to the meeting at Bowling Green, Ohio, where Z. E. Bates is pastor. H. W. Cole led the music and the pastor did the preaching.

Carey E. Morgan, pastor at Vine Street, Nashville, Tenn., has been given an automobile by the officers of his church to facilitate the matter of pastoral calls.

H. James Crockett of El Dorado, Kan., writes that they are at the beginning of a meeting with James Small doing the preaching and fine prospects for a successful time.

A. C. Parker has, we understand, accepted the pastorate of the Waxahachie, Texas, Church where A. F. Bradford was recently pastor. The church at Waxahachie has just completed a new building.

The Pacific Grove Church, Cal., was dedicated anew on Feb. 4 the debt having been entirely raised. $4.538 has been raised during the year, of which $600 has gone to missions and the membership only numbers 139.

R. C. Sargent just closed a good meeting at Lincoln Park, Tacoma, with 32 additions. Most of these were adults and will greatly strengthen this new but promising congregation.

Harvey Hazel of Los Angeles recently officiated at a deaf-mute wedding at which sixty people could neither hear nor speak. Prof. Kennedy of the state school at Jacksonville, Ill., was interpreter.

The Franklin Circle Church of Cleveland, Ohio, has just closed a very profitable meeting of two weeks with about 40 additions. L. G. Batman, of Youngstown, was the evangelist.

Knoxville, Ill., is having the assistance of C. G. Kindred of Englewood Church, Chicago, in a revival meeting. The church is sanguine of great results under the leadership of the Chicago pastor.

W. B. Parks, dean of Texas Christian University, will occupy the pulpit during the absence of four months of the pastor, E. M. Waits of Magnolia Avenue, Ft. Worth. Mr. Waits left for the Holy Land the first of the month on a well-earned rest.

In a recent sermon, Dr. G. H. Combs, of Kansas city declared that he had read an average of one book a day for the past thirty years. He does not, however, recommend such a strenuous course as necessary or even advisable for others.

T. S. Handsaker, who recently closed his work at Hood River, Ore., and who will do evangelistic work with Walla Walla as headquarters, began his first meeting at Enterprise, Ore., last Lordsday. Bro. Handsaker is a strong evangelist and should be kept busy.

J. L. Garvin of the First Church, Seattle received 139 into the membership of the church during the past year, but lost 88 by removals. He preaches to a down-town congregation and the transient character of such work is one of the most trying features of it.

J. L. Thompson, pastor at Greeley, Colo., writes that his Sunday-school is "out for the record this year," but says rather pitifully that the cold weather cut them down so that they "only had 426 present last Lord's Day!" They are the largest school in the state.

During 1911 there were 35 added at Perrydale, Ore., where J. R. Kellems ministers. They now have 106 members. During the year they raised $1.700 for all purposes. They now have money in the treasury and are out of debt. They also put in a new furnace, three Sunday-school rooms and a cement baptistery.

M. R. Ely, city evangelist in Tacoma, Wash., just closed a meeting at McKinley Park with 34 added, largely confessions. This brings the membership of this promising mission up to 81. This was a good meeting and has greatly strengthened the cause at McKinley Hill. He will begin at Roosevelt Heights next Sunday.

The meeting that Bruce Brown is holding at Orange, Cal., continues with increasing interest. They had expected to hold but three weeks but the interest is so great that they have been compelled to continue. There have been 55 additions. Mr. C. C. Bentley, the pastor's wife, is very sick.

Abram E. Cory writes: "Mother Cory, wife of N. E. Cory, went into the great beyond at home at Keokuk, Iowa, on Feb. 2. Her life has been a real inspiration to thousands as well as to her own family." The Christian Century wishes to express sympathy in the hour of sorrow and congratulation as well for the blessed memories of a sainted life.

Frank E. Jaynes reports a meeting at his home church, Sullivan, Indiana, with 60 additions. H. S. Saxton of Troy, O., led the music and Mr. Jaynes speaks in the highest terms of him. He is not only a musician but a man who is willing to do any work that will win men and he is a man of spiritual power and insight.

G. N. Grisham, principal of the Lincoln High School for negroes in Kansas City, Mo., spoke at the Wednesday night meeting in Linwood Church were Burris A. Jenkins is pastor. The house was crowded to hear the story of the work that is being done for the colored race in Kansas City. Mr. Jenkins is a southern man and therefore is anxious to do all he can for the advancement of the black race.

It was an error that Mrs. Martha Trimble had accepted a call to the church at Fulton, Mo., as stated in The Christian Century of last week. T. E. Winter is the successful and beloved porter there, and the church is just approaching the completion of its beautiful new house of worship. They will dedicate March 10, with H. O. Breeden in charge, who will follow the dedication immediately with an evangelistic campaign. They will have a splendid meeting, without doubt.

E. N. Duty of Minerva, O., writes: Fifty-four added, 43 by baptism. Raised for all purposes, including missions and benevolences, more than $6,000, the largest amount raised in the history of the church. Built a commodious Sunday-school addition, put in a large steam heating plant, and refrescoed and recarpeted the church auditorium. The church has now a well equipped plant for Bible school work and has a capacity of 700. All departments of the church are working. Closed my work here Dec. 31 and began at Charleroi, Pa., Jan. 1.

L. N. Pennock of Plainview, Texas, writes: "I wish you would announce in The Christian Century that the Christian Church of Plainview is in need of a pastor. A good town of about 5,000, a $12,000.00 church building, and a loyal congregation. We want a good progressive and up-to-date man. Write Judge H. C. Randolph or E. T. Coleman, or J. M. Adams, editor of the Plainview News." We think this ought to interest some active young minister who would like to go South. Plainviews is the church where John C. Welch was pastor. They sent him to the University of Chicago during his vacation and are, altogether, a splendid band of people.

Alva M. Kerr, of Pleasant Hill, Ohio, is assisting the pastor W. H. Denison of Huntington, Ind., in a meeting.

Sir Robert Perks is authority for the statement, that laymen in various churches in London go out and preach an average of 32,000 sermons every Sunday. Peter Ainslie of Baltimore has made a practical application of the plan and there is no doubt that many acceptable speakers in our churches would do good to themselves and others by taking up this form of activity.

The widow of Jacob Kenoly, the negro who was drowned in Liberia, is still on the field trying to carry on his work. The earnestness and high purpose of the good soul cannot be questioned, but some adequate direction should be given to the work. She has still fourteen boys and three girls ranging in age, from six to twenty-one years.

Lee Ferguson of Prosser, Washington, is pastor of the church there and manager of an apple orchard during the week. In four years the membership has increased 600 per cent and the debt reduced from $2,600 to $600. The Sunday-school has achieved Front Rank. The present membership of the church is 101.

Robert M. Hopkins, American Sunday-school superintendent, reports that the receipts for the first ten days after the offering for the Moninger Memorial Fund amount to $1,932.25. The smaller schools are reporting first, but the larger ones will be forth-coming. Fully one-third of the fund is already definitely in sight. Every offering sent should be plainly marked "for the Moninger Memorial Fund."

W. S. Priest, pastor at Wichita, Kan., has received into the church 226 persons as a result of the Billy Sunday meetings. At a recent evening service there were 18 additions and the audience commenced to applaud just as they were accustomed to do in the Sunday meetings. There are yet about 200 cards out that were signed by the converts at the meetings who are due to come into the Christian church.

The report of J. C. Mason, corresponding secretary of Texas Missions, shows that 40 men were employed for whole or part time for the year and that 642 were added by the missionaries by baptism and a total number of additions of 2,601. The total receipts were $16,866, about $1,000 less than last year. But this loss is offset by the fact that other organizations are doing the work indirectly.

The church at La Junta, Calif., where J. F. Findley ministers, had an annual meeting and roll-call at the end of the year. The officers for the church, Sunday-school, and Endeavor Society were installed for the coming year and reports of the condition of the work showed the fact that 146 additions had been received into the church during the year and that the whole outlook was most encouraging.

Chas. H. Lewis, who has for more than two years served as General Secretary for the State Sunday School Association, of Nebraska, severed his connection with the Association the first of the year. The high standard of Sunday-school work in Nebraska, which is conceded by national workers, is due in great measure to the discernment and faithfulness of Mr. Lewis. Other states are asking for his services, but he will do pastoral work. Miss Brown, the Elementary Supernitendent is temporarily taking his place. Miss Anna Lesher, the office secretary, also retired Dec. 1.

A religious census which was held during the first of the month of January in Bloomington, Indiana, showed that there were 600 families in the community who were related to the Christian church or expressed a preference for it. This is 200 more than those of any other church and about one-third the entire community. The pastor of Kirkwood Ave., church urged his members to think on the fact as a call for humility and prayer, instead of an occasion of pride and boasting. Mr. Todd is pushing the Bible chair work and every enterprise looking to the more effective evangelisation of that community.

An event of more than usual significance is the merging of Transylvania University and the College of the Bible into one institution and the placing at the head of the combined institutions of President R. H. Crossfield. This action is a deserved recognition of the work President Crossfield has done and the ability he has shown as an executive and a manager. The announcement at the same time was made of the completion of the campaign of the $250,000 endowment, which has been waged for the past two years. The money has come from many sources and the achievement will give encouragement to our other colleges and deserved honor to all who had a part in it. The Christian Century prophesies greater achievements for the University than have been seen in the past and felicitates the College of the Bible on the consumation of this new arrangement.

The members of the Linwood Boulevard Christian Church assembled recently to hear an address on the subject of keeping the Board of Public Welfare as a non-partisan organization, and they pledged themselves to support such a policy at the polls. The Board of Public Welfare works to drive out the loan sharks, supervise the dance halls, provide free employment agencies and support the parole system. It is one of the heartening signs of the times that the churches are recognizing that the preaching of the gospel is not enough for the situation in the cities. There must be, at the same time, an interest in the surroundings of the people whom it is desired to reach.

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America have addressed an appeal to the churches in behalf of the family.

New York Mission Notes

During December, eight were added to our mission churches. Three by baptism and five by letter.

An interesting meeting is being held at the Humboldt St., Church, Brooklyn, Bro. M. M. Amunson, pastor of the Sterling Place Church is ably assisting in this work. Four have thus far been added to the church. A splendid interest is being aroused.

C. A. Donaldson at the Ridgwood Heights Church has passed the 100 mark in attendance at the Sunday-school. Bro. Donaldson begins a special evangelistic meeting Feb. 5.

Our Russian mission, conducted by Bro. Johnson, is increasing in interest and definite good is being accomplished. The following letter sent to Bro. Johnson, written in Russian and mailed in New York City, Jan. 26, 1912, may furnish an interesting bit of reading and also evidence of the work being done.

"Honored Friend, John Johnson:

"If you want to live and train your children, then we advise you to leave the Russian Missionary Work. If you will not leave the Russian Missionary work then to you is left little, very little time to walk on this wide world. Now it is for you to do one or the other,—if you will go from New York you will be lucky, but if you will not go from New York then we win. Our company is large and question is decided long ago, that we should destroy you from this work."

This letter indicates some of the bitter spirit and opposition to this work. This city with its 250,000 Russians, many just arriving, with their Russian ideas, customs and methods of life offers a field as truly missionary as Russia itself.

Such letters will not in any way affect or change the program of Bro. Johnson, he will push on with even greater zeal and faithfulness in the work.

The Central Church is completing the most efficient and strongest church organization the Disciples of Christ have ever had in this city. They are meeting at present in the church building, 142 W. 81st St.

Bro. Z. T. Sweeney followed Dr. Bayard Craig as pastor of the Lenox Ave. Church. The church is optimistic and is forging ahead with a faith and zeal that is inspiring. Bro. Sweeney is drawing splendid audiences and the outlook is bright for building up a strong church.

Under the leadership of M. M. Amunson, Sterling Place Church is enjoying splendid growth. They also have one of the best Christian Endeavor Societies in this city. This may be explained by the fact, their pastor is our State Supt. of C. E., and is a wide awake endeavor man who believes in doing things.

The Annual dinner of the Disciples Missionary Union will be given on Tuesday evening Feb. 27 at the Hotel Marseilles, Manhattan. This is the important social event of the season and this year promises to be the greatest of all.

I have received a number of requests for location of our churches from those coming to our city. To all I have cheerfully responded. Let me again urge any coming to our city to send for a list of our churches so you can co-operate with us while in the city. Any pastors having members of their churches moving to the city, send me their names and addresses and I will ask the pastor of the church nearest to them to look them up. JOS. KEEVIL.

Notes From the Foreign Society

Last week a friend in Iowa sent the Foreign Society $1,000 on the annuity plan. Those fifty years of age and older will find this a splendid method of permanent investment and of doing good with their money.

A friend in West Virginia also sent a gift last week on the annuity plan. We are hoping great numbers of friends will keep this method in mind and remember us and the great work.

Philip H. Gray and wife of Michigan have assumed the support of D. E. Dannenberg at Nanking, China. This is the making of another important Living-link. In this case it is not a church, but a good man and his wife.

Miss Emma Lyon, who conducts the large girls' school in Nanking, China, says that her head Chinese teacher who had been with her some fifteen years was killed during the war. He was always a great help to her. She does not know where she can find another person to take his place.

The new hospital at Nantungchow, China, is about completed. It will be painted in the spring. Dr. Poland has done excellent work in its construction. He enjoys good health. The war has in no way retarded the work at Nantungchow, for which we are profoundly thankful.

W. R. Hunt, Chuchow, China, says, "The experience I had in the Red Cross work gave me an insight into a new field of service. We were able to help the wounded on the field and aid in the alleviation of suffering among the soldiers in the camp hospitals. We pointed the men to Christ. Some of the scenes were most pitiful. It seemed terrible to see the Chinese killing Chinese with the most terrific engines of destruction. I met many Christians among the revolutionary army with whom I served in the attack on and in the final capture of Nanking. I was a Red Cross worker in the first aid corps. My medical knowledge served me well in this, thanks to the many-sided experience and training of the pioneer missionary work. The Red Cross did a great service."

A host of churches are making active preparation for a great March offering. A number expect to enter the Living-link rank. The prospects are as bright as the promises of God. There is yet time to order March offering supplies.

Remember the Foreign Missionary Rallies in every church Sunday night, February 25. A program for the rallies has been sent to each church. Do not fail to make it a great occasion.

Merritt Owens, Falmouth, Ky., is working hard to make that county, Pendleton, a Living-link in the Foreign Society. There are a number of small churches throughout the county and this will prove a unifying and quickening influence among them.

E. R. Moon, of Bolenge, who went out from Oregon, will be home on his furlough in time to take part in the Oregon State Convention. The brethren in that state will give him a most hearty reception and they are looking forward to his coming in a spirit of high expectancy.

T. W. Pinerton, pastor at Kenton, Ohio, speaks in most commendatory terms of the addresses of H. P. Shaw. Brother Pinkerton proclaims him a prince.

You will be glad to know that we had during the Christmas season 24 baptisms in Shanghai and four of these were from our day schools. To us this is very encouraging. —Miss R. L. Tompkin, Shanghai.

In our annual report we reported Cameron and the churches in Marshall County, W. Va., as constituting a Living-link. This was a mistake. The church at Cameron, W. Va., alone gave enough to constitute it a Living-link without the other churches in the county. Cameron is to be congratulated upon her splendid liberality. The other churches in the county also do well.

Feb. 7, 1912. F. M. RAINS.

Christian University, Canton, Ohio.

We have written two annuity bonds in the first month of 1912, one for $500.00, and the other for $5,000.00. We pay six per cent to all annuitants fifty years of age and over. These bonds make a profitable and safe investment. The interest is paid semi-annually, during the life of the donor. The bonds are non-taxable, so the income from them is net. Each bond is backed by our board of trustees and by $200.00 worth of unincumbered assets. If interested, write me for a sample bond.

The Hon. Thos. W. Phillips, of New Castle, Pennsylvania, has just sent his check for another $1,000.00 for our loan fund for ministerial students. This makes $3,000.00 which this great-hearted friend of the young preachers has contributed to this fund in our school. He has made large gifts to other colleges for this same purpose. We are prepared to assist any worthy young preacher who needs help in securing his education. Prospective students should write Pres. Carl Johann, Canton, Mo.

The Kansas City Ministerial Association will have charge of all the local arrangements and certainly we could assemble in no better or more convenient place. More detailed announcements will be made in the very near future.

Diamond Importations.

The passion of the American public for diamonds and other precious stones shows no signs of yielding to the high cost of living, if the customs figures are to be taken as an indication. The value of the January gem imports was $3,115,000, a fair sized increase over the same month a year ago. During 1911 the value of the gems imported reached $40,000,000, exceeding all other years with the exception of 1906. Maiden Lane dealers say more diamonds are being purchased by people in moderate circumstances as an investment than ever before.

Dead Books.

Looking over the published catalogue of a large library about to be sold, we were struck by the number of volumes in it which were offered "uncut." Some of the lots were said to be still "in their original wrappers." And this library had belonged to a genuine book-lover, one little vexed by the bibliophile's passion for rarities and novelties or even first-editions. There were thousands upon thousands of volumes in the collection, and after a pretty close study of titles, we should say there was little in it which had not had some original value. Nevertheless that auctioneer had lumped them in "lots," two, five, twenty and frequently fifty, tied in a bunch, in order to get a price worth calling out. Most of them, we take it, will go to the already overloaded shelves of the second-hand dealers, still "uncut." All of which reminds us of the late dictum of the librarian of the British Museum, that there are only 60,000 "live" books in the millions under his care. We forget the proportion, but we believe he said that of each hundred books catalogued and shelved today, only one would ever be taken off the shelf. Yet it is the "dead" books which hold up the living, intellectual world. These books, "uncut" and "unwrapped," have kept people thinking, and the schools and presses of today flourish upon a mental soil which the dead books have secured amid the waves, as past generations of polyps have built up the beautiful islands where fruits and nuts and sugar-cane grow for today's consumption. Our school-books of "yester-year" are "dead," but the harvests that have sprung from them enrich all our lives.

Winter Rain

Quiet rain, so softly falling,
Pleasant dreams art thou recalling
To my winter-weary eyes.
Dreams of days so fair, that truly,
Seem them to have fallen newly
From the smiling summer skies.

Quiet rain, thou'rt gently creeping
Where the rugged roots are sleeping—
Dreaming of the days gone by;
At thy touch they wake and shiver,
Then with sudden hope they quiver,
Hope that summer may be nigh!

How the bare brown earth is drinking
In thy light warm drops, and thinking
That the cruel winter's o'er!
How it dreams of grasses covering
It with green—of soft airs hovering
O'er it as in days of yore.

Quiet rain, thou workest humbly,
Never boastingly, but dumbly
Doing well thy modest part.
May I have a mind as lowly,
Making common duties holy,
By a patient, willing heart!

A Chinese Custom.

The Chinese have lots or vaults in certain of our Chicago cemeteries where they lay away the bodies of their dead, until such time arrives as will permit their shipping of the unfleshed bones back to the old home. How seriously the imminent changes in the Flowery Kingdom may affect this custom, it is at present impossible to say. But we were riding out with a friend in the direction of a western burying ground when we overtook a Chinese funeral procession. Next the driver of the hearse sat the nearest of kin, who was doing his duty by his old-time companion. For we noticed that every hundred yards or so he would scatter a handful of paper leaflets, about the size, shape and character of cigarette papers, on the roadway. This having excited the curiosity of our seat-mate, we asked him to let us get out and pick up one of these slips. Gathering a small handful, we showed him, on resuming our place in the carriage, that every slip was punctured with innumerable tiny circles. It is the belief of the Chinaman that every dead body is accompanied to the grave by its own soul, and that the devil follows, eager to get possession of the disembodied spirit. But the Chinaman knows that the devil is, above everything else, most "curious to know," and so he throws out upon the street hundreds of these perforated papers, hopeful that before the devil satisfies his curiosity as to the whys and wherefores of all these holes—through every one of which he must slip out and in—the imperiled spirit will have time to make its escape. And when we began to speculate whether the people who make these slips to cheat the devil could make ballots to constitute and establish a government "of the people, by the people, for the people"—we had to give it up.

A Higher Watchword

IT HAS BECOME THE CUSTOM FOR Christian people in speaking of the progress of missionary work to describe it as the "conquest" of heathenism by the gospel. We have become so accustomed to this military term that we do not always stop to weigh its significance as an interpretation of the Christian attitude, nor to reflect on the impression which it must create in the non-Christian mind.

* * *

To be sure, we come honestly by the military phraseology. The New Testament speaks freely of the follower of Jesus as a soldier. The weapons of his warfare are enumerated and described. More than this, our traditions in the church come in large measure from crusading days, when the suggestions of early Christian times were taken up and given emphatic expression in actual conflicts between Christian Europe and Moslem Syria.

But it must be remembered that the military terms of the gospel were never applied to what we are accustomed to call the conquest of lands or nations. The contests of which the apostles spoke, were not against flesh and blood, but against the forces of unrighteousness organized in human institutions. Moreover, the apostles never went forth as soldiers, but always as teachers and friends of those whose conversion they sought. They won their way not by force, but by love. Their ministry was one of gentleness and persuasion.

It was only when Christianity lost its apostolic spirit and became a world power that it resorted to force and employed the vocabulary of armies. Nothing more brutal or unwarranted ever occurred in the story of the church than the crusades. Perhaps they were inevitable as an outburst of crude and unreflective enthusiasm in behalf of the faith. But the admixture of baser motives, the acts of cruelty, treachery, and injustice with which they were characterized, together with their total futility as a means of securing the advance of Christianity in the East render the centuries in which they were the dominant feature among the most regrettable in Christian history.

And yet it is from the crusading era that we have derived in large measure the vocabulary which is now applied so freely to missionary work. We hear constantly of the "invasion" of heathen lands, the "conquest" of China, the "victories" won by missionaries in India, the "overthrow" of false religions, and the "triumph" of the gospel. Probably these figures of speech are quite harmless provided they are understood as such, and used in circles possessed of a discriminating mind. But what must be their impression upon people who are really uninformed as to the attitude intelligent missionaries hold toward the non-Christian faiths? And what must be the effect of such language upon the minds of intelligent non-Christians?

Recently, the German emperor, who in most regards has shown himself to be a wise and tactful ruler, caused his statue to be erected as the central ornament of the new German hospice on the Mount of Olives, just outside of Jerusalem. The statue is an equestrian figure of the emperor in the full armor of a crusader. It would be difficult to conceive of any device more insulting to the natives of Palestine, many of whom are the Moslem descendants of those very Saracens who suffered such unspeakable atrocities at the hands of the crusading knights of Germany, France, and England. Certainly a figure that evokes such unhappy memories, cannot promote the sentiment of good-will toward Christianity, which its interpreters should seek to strengthen in every land.

The church should drop as soon as possible its militant and irritating vocabulary. Its attitude toward the non-Christian world must be that of tactful, sympathetic approach, of winsomeness and love. It would be fully as appropriate to describe the education of a child as his "conquest" by his various teachers as to talk of the "victory" of Christianity over the confessors of the oriental faiths. For both processes, when successful, are marked by gentle and tactful disclosure of new truth, in which process full credit is given for the intelligence, sincerity, and concern of the student. As well might the process of courtship, by which a young man gains the confidence and affection of his sweetheart, be described as a "conquest," as the successful prosecution of missionary work. The very survival of such phrases in connection with courtship and marriage marks the distance which the wedded estate has advanced under Christian inspiration from the old days of capture and subjection.

Perhaps in too much of our evangelism the militant spirit of attack and capture still remains, and this renders it the easier for us to employ the same terms in regard to missionary work. But the error is not less patent and inexcusable, and its justification disappears at once upon consideration.

* * *

The church should discard unchristian terms, even in its thinking regarding the non-Christian peoples, and thus the sooner make good its testimony in the waiting lands.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

The Golden Rule as a Social Remedy

Of social panaceas there are plenty. It is possible, however, to diagnose most of our social evils as due to selfishness and if that be true, it is possible to prescribe a specific for our social diseases, the Golden Rule of Jesus. When it becomes impossible for a man to be happy like Dives was with the beggar starving at the gate, whenever it is necessary for us as it was with the Good Samaritan, to stop and help the man fallen among robbers, social reform will proceed apace. We shall then go to the rescue of the poor foreigner whose ignorance makes him willing to work for a corporation for half wages. We shall not have poodle dogs running around with diamonds in their ears and children going to school without any breakfast.

The Golden Rule demands of us that we should esteem the human above all things else. The Golden Rule establishes such a relation of perfect sympathy with our fellows that we will actually suffer with them when they suffer. Jesus had nothing to say about statistics or social theories as such, but no reformer ever placed such a valuation upon humanity, and none ever demonstrated the power of sympathy more than he. When capital and labor, employer and employee, radical and conservative, shall enter into the spirit of Jesus and forsake the pagan spirit of a selfish world, then we may hope to usher in the Golden Age, the Millennium of the Christian hope.

The Vacation Bible School

The problem of the moral training of the young is a serious one. The public school teacher is prevented from using the Bible in many states, and the increase of juvenile delinquency is an indication that we are not succeeding with the moral training of the young as we should. The vacation period is especially trying. In the summer months public oversight is withdrawn from seventeen million boys and girls. This summer period is one fraught with great moral danger. Is not this the very opportunity the church has been waiting for to supplement its Bible training by the organization of the Vacation Bible School?

The Daily Vacation Bible School Association of which Robert G. Boville is National Director, has been conducting these schools for six years. Last year there were over 75,000 children enrolled in these schools, only 25 per cent of whom were in any Sunday-school, and 57 per cent of them of foreign parentage. The entire cost was one dollar for every child enrolled. The teaching was done by the young people from our colleges who were not otherwise employed in the summer. The methods are thus described: "Each school was equipped with four teachers, one man as principal and three women as assistants, with, where possible, a few volunteer helpers. The schools opened on the Monday after the Fourth of July, continued for six weeks, and were in session every day except Saturday and Sunday. The afternoons of each day were devoted to direction of outside games for the children or taking groups on excursions. The Bible lessons were preceded by singing and calisthenics and were illustrated by sand-table work and stereopticon pictures. Hammock-making, basketry, and sewing or other manual work, were taught." The benefits discovered from this kind of work are large. It is a decidedly advanced kind of mission work in foreign populations and the good-will begotten in the neighborhood helps the church the entire year through.

The Disciples and Social Service

Of the five great evangelical denominations, only the Disciples are as yet without any organized expression of the social interest. As some of the other religious bodies have organized their Social Service Commissions in very recent times, this statement is not the disgrace to us that it will be in another five years. The fact that we have not organized is not due to any sociological conservatism among us. In times past we have been the first to furnish adherents to new social movements. We have been continually told that our ministry has stood foremost in open hostility to the saloon. We have a number of able ministers that are socialists. Some of our most conservative journals have opened their columns to the writings of men with social sympathies.

We have never heard until the other day in any of our journals any antithesis between the "gospel" and social service. Of course when the "gospel" gets separated and set over against any cause, we may look ere long for a new heresy to be recognized in our ranks. It seems to us that of all the great evangelical denominations, we are the freest to take advanced ground upon the social question. We hope that the cohorts of our reformers shall soon gather. We have just been reading some of the really great books put out by the Methodist Federation for Social Service written by men like Earp and Hall. The strong sense of the practical makes the Methodists efficient in this field. We are most of us familiar with those great Presbyterians, Josiah Strong and Chas. Stelzle. The latter is the Superintendent of the Presbyterian Bureau of Social Service. No denomination has greater speakers in this field than do the Presbyterians. The Baptists have their Social Service Commission with Prof. Batten of Des Moines as the head. He addresses our Congress this spring. In the Baptist ranks of reform there are such great names as Rauschenbusch and Shailer Mathews. Even the Unitarians have an organization and have put out the most pronounced manifesto yet issued in behalf of these new ideas. It would be difficult for many of us to go as far as they have gone.

The Federation of Churches has likewise a committee working in this field and they have put forth a manifesto which while more conservative than the Unitarian statement, is yet therefore the more ready for universal adoption in the churches. The Presbyterians relate their department quite properly to their Home Missions Society. What are the Disciples to do about the social movement?

A Corporation with Good Working Conditions

It is so often our duty to complain of the conditions surrounding the working women of the land that it is a real pleasure to find a situation where we may speak of the labor conditions in commendatory terms. We visited the other day the central exchange of the Chicago Telephone Company. We were told here that the company employed ten thousand women in the city of Chicago. This corporation is therefore one of the largest employers of female labor in our city. About a hundred and fifty girls quit every month, either to enter matrimony or for other reasons. On this account the company is compelled to maintain a school for the training of new recruits, since the work of the telephone operator is a skilled occupation.

About half of the girls applying for positions are accepted. These are put into the company school for a month or six weeks and draw wages from the very beginning, getting five dollars a week while in school. It is estimated that the company spends fifty dollars getting a girl ready for work before any service has been rendered at all. The new employe is put on a graduated wage scale according to experience running from six to eleven dollars a week. There are comparatively few of the employes that are working for a lower wage than the minimum that would be approved by those who have studied the wage question for women working in the city.

Each employe works six days out of the seven though not all can rest on Sunday of course. They work eight hours out of each day and never as much as three hours consecutively without a recess. The company provides rest rooms and a free lunch each day for the girls. This lunch is not elaborate but there is plenty of such food as the girls need for good work. The company finds it economy to see that the employes are properly fed. In addition to these benefits, there is a voluntary association of the employes managed by the company to provide sick benefits. A girl paying fifty cents a month is allowed a dollar a day when laid off for five days consecutively on account of illness.

We were not able to find very many things that even the most alert walking delegate could have demanded to make the telephone girls more comfortable than they are. We think we see how the organization of a union in such a group would only feed a walking delegate at the expense of the girls without any corresponding benefit. Every corporation which thus anticipates the public's demands for proper labor conditions is entitled to credit. We fancy the company finds it pays to treat labor thus but it is to their credit that they have discovered this so far in advance of the department stores.

—Notwithstanding the famines and deaths by plague in India, the recent census shows an increase in the population of from 294 to 315 millions. The increase in the Christian population has been very large, ranging from 16 per cent in the Madras presidency, to 446 per cent in the Punjab. Larger increase is sometimes due to the newer work.

—Promoters of fraudulent schemes, who had obtained $77,000,000 from the public, were put out of business in the past fiscal year, according to the report of the chief inspector of the Post Office Department, issued January 21.

Baptist College Assured

Rev. J. H. Shakespere, secretary of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland, sends the following from London, ahead of Dr. Robert S. MacArthur, president of the Baptist Alliance, who is returning from his visit to Russia:

"There now seems every prospect of the proposed European Baptist College being established in Russia and in St. Petersburg, which has always been the desire of the Baptist World Alliance committee. A vice-president of the European section, Sir George McAlpine, L.L. D. of Accrington, England, has recently visited St. Petersburg, and his work has been followed up by the visit of the president of the Alliance, Rev. Dr. R. S. MacArthur. They have had interviews with high ministers of state with the result that, under conditions that are not really onerous, it is now practically certain that the Czar's government will give its consent."

Baptists of England gave $30,000 toward the founding of this Baptist college, and American Baptists gave $70,000. It is chiefly to educate ministers for Baptist missions in Russia, and in Russian dependencies in south eastern Europe, but it is not expected that its candidates for the ministry will go to St. Petersburg. The new venture is Eastern Europe, and from it missionary advance upon Asia—all the way to India and China.

Methodist College of Rome

American Methodists have just heard, through Bishop Burt, of the success this winter of the Methodist educational work in Rome. The Home School for Girls, on Via Garibaldi, is utilizing its last foot of space, and Crandon Hall, built by American Methodist women, is daily enrolling new pupils. It is a school for young women, and is attended by students from some of the best Italian families, not in Rome merely, but throughout Italy.

The College for Boys and Young Men is the latest Methodist venture in Rome, and exists solely to educate and bring out leaders of the new Italy. It occupies the upper floors of the Methodist central building on the Quirinal Hill, and its enrolment this winter exceeds that of any previous year. Recently additional rooms were fitted up. Now the government has forbidden the college to receive more pupils in present quarters. Efforts are making to secure funds with which to erect, in a new locality, adequate buildings in size and equipment. It is to be known as the Methodist College of Rome.

The Passing of Two Notable Men

Pere Hyacinthe who died on February 9, at the age of eighty-five, at Neuilly, a suburb of Paris, was a Carmelite monk who attracted attention in this country and Europe in 1870 when in an address at the International League of Peace he attempted to rank Protestanism with Catholicism as one of the great religions of civilized peoples. He was one of the most eloquent pulpit orators of his day. His aggressive utterances raised a storm of protest when he later addressed an open letter to the General of the Carmelites at Rome, expressing his deep conviction that "if France in particular, and the Latin races in general, are given up to social, moral and religious anarchy, the principal cause is not Catholicism itself, but the manner in which Catholicism has for a long time been understood and practiced." He was expelled from the order; and the breach between him and the church widened when the vatican council proclaimed the dogma of papal infallibility. Thereafter he became a leader in the little band of Old Catholics first in France, and then, soon after his marriage to an American in 1872, at Geneva. He later founded a "Christian Catholic" church, which he resigned to the care of the Jansenist Archbishop Gul. He visited America first in 1872, and later in 1883 and 1884. His last days were spent at Neuilly where he often officiated in the Anglican church. Pastor Wagner, with Greek and Armenian priests, were at his bedside in his latest moments, by his request. His dying words were: "I can appear before God. I am at peace with my conscience and my reason."

Dr. Andrew M. Fairbairn, the eminent Congregational theologian, known the world over through his great books, died February 9, at the age of seventy-eight. He has been regarded by many as the ablest thinker and defender of the faith in this generation. His best known works are "The Place of Christ in Modern Theology," and "The Philosophy of the Christian Religion." The latter is said to be "his profoundest work and is a masterly discussion of the deepest principles and difficulties of our Christian faith." He held many positions, but his most distinguished office was that of Principal of Mansfield College at Oxford from its organization in 1886 to his retirement in 1909.

In passing it is interesting to note that while many are troubled in many churches because of upheavals in theology, men of Principal Fairbairn's type, often denounced as heretical, as was Dr. Marcus Dods in his day, are doing valiant service for the faith of multitudes all over the world. The loss of such men to our common faith is simply incalculable. To read their writings is to feel the greatness of that faith; the wideness of its scope; the depth of its problems; the greatness of its endeavors; and the vastness of its hopes. These are the universal men who enable us to see the littleness of the sectary and the partisan, and the greatness of the thinker and the saint.

The Divided Household of Faith

While some of our denominational brethren are poking fun at the Disciples because of their internal contentions, though pleaders for union, we still have a right to be heard on that subject if religious statistics count for anything. There are 186 different kinds of churches in the United States, according to Dr. Carroll's report, besides many small bodies which are not included in the statistical tables. Many of the larger bodies are divided and subdivided. There are six branches of Adventists; fifteen different groups of Baptists; eleven groups of "Brethren"; twelve kinds of Catholics; twenty-three associations of Lutherans, and twelve of Mennonites. There are seventeen varieties of Methodists; twelve of Presbyterians.

No greater triumph of Christianity would be possible than the readjustment of these unhappy conditions. It is a real tragedy, that against Christ's prayer for the unity of His people, there has been the constant tendency to divide. This fact has given rise to the question whether with liberty of opinion, union is ever possible. We believe that it is.

Man Before the Ice Age in England

The age of man has ever been a subject of interest to mankind. The recent discovery in England of a human skeleton says the Churchman, "has forced the geologists to the conclusion that it must have belonged to a man who lived before the severest displacements of the glacial period." So interesting is the discovery among the scientists that we give the account in full:

"That the skeleton should have belonged to an age antedating the glacial period in itself would be remarkable enough, for it would carry the presence of man in Europe far back of the age indicated by the skeletons unearthed at Neanderthal, La Naulette and Spy, and probably beyond the period indicated by the more recent excavations at Mauer near Heidelberg and at La Chapelle aux Saintes, which seemed to belong to a later part of the glacial age. But, more remarkable, this skeleton is not of the Neanderthal type, though much older, it is farther advanced, much more like the modern man. The Neanderthal type seems rather a degenerate survival of some older stock than a progenitor of our race. Professor Keith, anthropologist of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, is quoted as saying: 'The finding of this skeleton strengthens the belief that the evolution of man was an infinitely longer process than we originally thought. At one time believers in the evolutionary theory thought that man's development to his present state might have taken something like 10,000 years. Later they put the period at something around 20,000 years. The difference, if any, between this man's bodily frame-work and modern man's are so minute as to prove that the evolution must have taken hundreds of thousands of years.'

"Mr. Lucas, Curator-in-chief of the Brooklyn Institute, says these recent discoveries show that man 'found his way into Great Britain while the British Isles were still a peninsula and the Thames a tributary of the Rhine, and in the ancient valley of the Thames pursued the deer or fled from the cave bear and the tiger.' That, according to the calculations of the anthropologists, may well have been from 400,000 to 750,000 years ago."

—At every town in the Canal Zone there is a Y. M. C. A. building. There are Protestant churches and a Protestant Sunday-school at every center. There are four Catholic priests. Most of the Spanish and other European laborers are, of course, Catholic.

The Christian Hope

The Christian has hope for the life that now is and for that which is to come. He does not postpone all his happiness till after death neither does he believe that experience of things that are seen exhausts the meaning of life.

The Christian people view themselves as sons of God. For them God is not power alone but wisdom and love. The world in which he has placed them is friendly to them. Its seeming hardness has often been shown to be the grace of God in disguise. They believe, therefore, that nature, when understood, does not, "red in tooth and claw with ravine," shriek against the creed of love.

As sons of God Christians rejoice that they are allied

> "To that which doth provide
> And not partake, effect and not receive!"

Their hope is that of builders. Not as idle dreamers do they look forward to the coming of the day when men shall recognize the obligations of universal brotherhood and the privileges belonging to them as the children of the Father in heaven. They have a vision of a city of God to be constructed by the coöperation of human and divine agencies. They set a high value on human achievement.

The Christian hope takes up into itself all the generous visions of youth. There is nothing more hostile to sound Christian sentiment than the theory that the enthusiasms of youth should be sternly repressed. In maturity our selfishness leads us to speak lightly of youth for attempting to do what we have failed to do. The heavenly vision of youth may have its basis in abounding physical life; it is none the worse for that. That motives need to be purified is no reason for eradicating them by unsympathetic criticism. We need hope in God to make this life worth while. If we act well our part here and now, we shall be ready for a larger life when God calls us to it.

The Christian view of life gives to the individual soul an exalted place in the world. It accords to all men the right to exercise the temper of free persons. We have much to learn about the liberty of the sons of God. Boastful egotism is common. The fear of the slave is often exhibited. Who of us has an adequate appreciation of himself as a part of the spiritual realm? Do we refuse to be satisfied with a partially unified life? Have we the proper respect for our own experience and judgment? Is our sense of honor that of the duelist or that of the disciple whose Master bore the sins of the world? The self-assertion which kills is not worthy to be named in connection with that which saves life.

We hear not a little said about the transformation of values. That is what Christianity has been doing from the beginning. Its treatment of suffering illustrates this. The way of the cross leads to victory and the cross itself becomes a glorious symbol of God's love for man. "All the suffering, all the imperfection, all the unsatisfied aspiration and longing of which the traces are so abundant in external nature as well as in man, do but point forward to a time when the suffering shall cease, the imperfection be removed and the frustrated aspirations at last crowned and satisfied; and this coincides with the glorious consummation which awaits the Christian."

Our knowledge of the future is limited. Richard Baxter wrote:

> "My knowledge of that life is small,
> The eye of faith is dim;
> But 'tis enough that Christ knows all,
> And I shall be with him."

The unspiritual man has an unspiritual hope. He projects the life he now lives into the future. If he thinks of his sins, he hopes to escape in some way from the penalty due him. The spiritual man hopes to escape from his sins. He longs to be at peace with God, to know the depths of divine mercy. He abhors his ingratitude and lack of sympathy, not the difficulties into which they have brought him. Pain he often regards as God's messenger to remind him of his high destiny. [Midweek Service, March 6. Rom. 8:14-25.] S. J.

Among the Hills

A LENTEN STUDY.

From the Jordan where his baptism had occurred and he had felt within him the arousal of that holy purpose which answered to the divine call, Jesus hurried away into the wilderness. It would have seemed natural that he should go back to his home in Nazareth, either to resume his work or to begin the new ministry. Or he might have gone up to Jerusalem, the intellectual and religious center of the nation's life, to inaugurate his plans. But he did neither. He went away into the silence of the hills from which John had come. He wished only to be alone with himself and the Father, to think out the new meaning of life and the plans that were now necessary.

Tradition and imagination have loved to picture those waste spaces to which Jesus retired. The Hill Country of Judea, as it was called, was the southern division of that great mountain chain which formed the rocky ridge of Palestine, and extended with almost unbroken continuity from the Lebanons on the north to the southward slopes of the great Tih desert south of Beersheba. In the northern portion this rocky region was called the Hills of Galilee. In its central part it was known in Old Testament times as Mount Ephraim, and in the south people spoke of it as the Hill Country of Judea. This latter region included all the mountainous section south and east of Jerusalem, and on its eastern flank it formed the rocky barrier which faced the deep trench of the Jordan. This rough district was not well adapted to cultivation. Rather it was the range of wandering shepherds and of the wild beasts who lived in the hills or roamed up from the thickets of the Jordan to hunt their prey in the rocky uplands.

No certainty of knowledge remains as to the whereabouts of Jesus during the forty days' stay in this rough region. Tradition, quick to localize important events in the vicinity of monastic retreats, placed the scene of the temptation at the top of the loftiest peak of the rock wall west of the Jordan. It is a hill of several hundred feet, half way up whose steep eastern face the Monastry of St. John clings to the side of the cliff. From the heights above a panorama of the entire region is spread before the eye. Across the tumbled mountains to the west rises the tower on the Mount of Olives. North and south runs the mountain range, with here and there a peak more conspicuous than the rest, like the Frank Mountain, Herod's resting place, to the south, and the uplifted Ebal standing almost at the farthest northern horizon, though on clear days the snowy dome of Hermon is visible far beyond. To the east and almost at the feet of the beholder lies the splendid valley of the Jordan, and southward only a few miles away the mysterious and solemn turquoise beauty of the Dead Sea. Immediately at the foot of this mountain the Fountain of Elisha gushes forth from the soil, and waters the whole district of Jericho, whose gardens look like a paradise as compared with the stretches of drifting sand further south toward the Dead Sea.

This mountain the monks of the middle ages called the Quarantana, the "Mountain of the Forty Days," and here they insisted took place those searching experiences through which Jesus passed preparatory to his entrance upon the redemptive work of his life. But the only significant reason why this spot should be chosen rather than another for the scene of these spiritual struggles of our Lord is the fact that the lofty elevation of the spot seemed to make it appropriate as the stage for that great drama of the "lofty mountain" from which Jesus looked on "all the kingdoms of the world and their glory." But such a construction of the narrative puts too much stress upon the figurative words employed. It is far more likely that Jesus remained in the obscurer regions among the hills, seeking the solitude which now became to him the vital atmosphere of his great preparation.

For it was solitude which he sought. He was not unaccustomed to hours of quiet; among the hills of Galilee in the vicinity of Nazareth he had long since learned the art of solitary prayer. Those long night watches of which we read in the Gospels were not the incidents of his later years alone. The prayerfulness of Jesus was an art early learned and a necessity of his spiritual existence.

* * *

But now in the face of the great announcement at the Jordan it was imperative that he should have his time of leisure and solitude to think through the great problem of his life. He knew the character of Israel's Messianic hope. He knew that John's message had included frequent reference to One who should come after him. Was he then that expected One? If so, how was he prepared to meet the popular expectation of the Messiah? It was clear that the nation waited eagerly for a military leader who could deliver it from the thraldom of Roman subjection. That Messianic warrior was in the thought of every patriotic mind, and all the Messianic utterances of the Old Testament were eagerly construed to imply the same sort of hope.

Jesus knew full well, from his study of the Scriptures in his home, in the school at Nazareth, and in the solitude of his private devotions, that the real Messianic hopes of the Old Testament moved on levels vastly higher than this. He saw that it was morally impossible to reconcile the actual movement of the kingdom of God with the crass popular messianism of his day. Already several would-be Messiahs had appeared, and each one had found an eager though local and temporary response. Was he to take that lower political attitude of leadership and attempt to satisfy the people, or was he to follow out his own higher conviction as to the meaning of the divine program and the need of the hour? Undoubtedly the latter was his only course. And could he doubt that success was possible to him on this higher level? Could he not take his place with the great company of moral leaders who had given their lives for Israel's uplift and spiritual redemption in the hope of complete success? Surely the nation was ready for a true prophetic word. Its response to John's message had shown the possibilities of the occasion. And beyond Israel lay the world waiting for the same great urgent call to the new life.

This Jesus, in the solitude of the hills, saw clearly the choice which he must make between a popular and lesser purpose and the supreme vocation to which he had been summoned. But he could not doubt what his choice would be. It only remained to consider the methods by which he should bring his purposes to pass. And so the days passed onward in these exalted thoughts. Time and space were as nothing to him, the rapture of the divine presence and the exaltation of a majestic purpose thrilled him and gave him a consciousness of the fullness of life. Strong in body and burning with a mighty idea he gave no thought to food. It was no conventional fast to which he gave himself, but a period of spiritual exaltation so absorbing that the needs of the body were forgotten.

But the temptation was yet to come.

Christians Only, Not the Only Christians

If others protest against the use of their names in connection with the "six affirmations" of The Christian Century, I wish to protest against any declarations, any theology, any interpretations of our plea that would unchurch or unchristianize, or exclude from the good hope of heaven, our brethren of different names who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. God knows there are already among us factors sufficiently numerous, operating to sectarianize and ruin our plea, and to reduce a growing household of faith to a dreary cave of Adullam, without the help of any of our representative men. The denial of The Century's affirmations by some of our ablest men has thrown our long established convictions into chaos; and I am bold to declare that if these denials and their implications are to be accepted as authoritative, our mission will not end—it has already ended. But I shall not so believe; I insist that our position has been misrepresented by some of our representative men. If there are no Christians to be united, how can we plead for Christian union? If there are no churches of Christ save those of our faith, wherein lies the meaning of the advocacy of Christian union? Others may choose the attitude of Ishmael toward the vast majority of Christ's followers if they will; I shall continue in the faith wherein I was born, and the faith wherein I have stood for the twenty years of my ministry, and the faith wherein I stand to-day, that there are churches of Christ of every name and creed, and Christians, whatever name or sign they bear, apart from our particular circuit of congregations. If I believed what the disavowal of Mr. Spencer asserts and implies, that the Brainerds and the Martyns are not members of the Church of Christ, and not even Christians—perish the thought!—because they stumbled over the translation of a Greek verb, I should postpone the Christian union propaganda for the present at least and inaugurate another in the interests of exact philology. In the light of recent declarations from our representative men, our humanity and not our orthodoxy is on trial. It is a strange love for our brethren of other folds that would deny them membership in the Church of Christ, and that would refuse to acknowledge them as brethren in the Lord. I think they would appreciate our love if it were less ardent while our logic is so relentless.

Let us return once more to the affirmation of Alexander Campbell which through all the years has been rock to our feet and sky to our sight in the discussion of this terrific and humiliating problem; terrific, because of its implications, and humiliating because we allow it to continue to vex us in the noon of our manhood's faith when we should have forgotten it with other childish things which belong to the earliest hours of faith's awakening. Hear him:

"Who is a Christian? I answer, Every one who believes in his heart that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, the Son of God, repents of his sins, and obeys him in all things according to his measure of the knowledge of his will. A perfect man in Christ, or a perfect Christian, is one thing; a babe in Christ, a stripling in the faith, or an imperfect Christian, is another. The New Testament recognizes both the perfect and the imperfect man in Christ. I cannot, therefore, make any one duty the standard of Christian faith or character, not even immersion into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and in my heart regard all that have been sprinkled in infancy without their own knowledge and consent as aliens from Christ and the well-grounded hope of heaven."

This is Mr. Campbell's definition of a Christian. I accept it; and that acceptance lifts for me the question of the relationship we owe to those of other communions out of the realm of controversy, and places it in the realm of things incontrovertible. To accept Mr. Campbell's definition at its face value, and then in this age of enlightenment to revive an ancient controversy as to the standing of pedobaptist churches in the sight of God, is to convict oneself of a lack of intellectual seriousness. Mr. Campbell is representative enough for me, all other influential names to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Campbell would not make any one duty the standard of Christian faith or character; the dissenters from The Century's affirmations would. He would not regard as aliens from Christ and the well-grounded hope of heaven those who had been sprinkled in infancy; the dissenters would. They deny that such are members of the Church of Christ; they deny that such are Christians, no matter how noble and spotless their lives as they grow in years and in grace; they are bound logically to deny them the hope of heaven. He would not make even immersion into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, the standard of Christian faith or character; the dissenters would. They think they are establishing their orthodoxy by quarrelling with The Christian Century; their quarrel is with Mr. Campbell and everything we know of God's Fatherhood on the pages of the New Testament. The real heresy in this latest controversy is on the side of the orthodox.

I never thought to see the day when men of I. J. Spencer's type would state in print what he has concerning the faith of the Disciples. He is a much braver man than I, for I could never bring myself to the task of unchurching and unchristianizing millions of the most devoted souls who ever lived in order to preserve a correct form of baptism. I look upon such efforts as sacrilegious. Mr. Campbell never did such a thing, nor should any man who has any reverence for his memory. If it be urged that loyalty to the Scriptures compels us so to do, let us remember that martyr-fires and chains and dungeons have their apologists; and that every mischief carries its plausibility as every man carries his shadow. It is a curious interpretation of Scripture that would compel us to disfellowship the vast majority of Christendom in order to maintain our loyalty to the text of Scripture. And those who believe that such is their duty must be made to see that they cannot close the doors of the church with one hand in this world against the pious souls with whom we do not agree on the subject of baptism, and with the other hand open for them the gates of heaven. This is a good time to expose that hocus-pocus which holds saints and heroes up for the emulation of the congregation on Sunday and remands them to chains of darkness at the close of the sermon.

Not the least of my regrets that these good brethren should have repudiated what thousands of our preachers have held regarding our relation to those of other churches, as affirmed by The Century, has been the satisfaction they afforded that wolf-like ignorance that preys upon all the dissensions of the brotherhood, champions every sectarianizing influence that appears, turns hatreds into benedictions, and encourages benevolent enterprises in the interest of personal revenge. Had there been a few protests in this direction by the Spencers, the Richardsons, the Medburys, the Combs', the cause of Christ would have been better served.

But to show that the representative men have misrepresented us, and that the Disciples do not cherish a harsh and unfeeling creed, I quote from the Christian Evangelist of February 15, containing an essay entitled "The Meaning of Membership," by Dr. R. P. Shepherd in which he says:

"Surely no intelligent Disciple ever denied that there were Christians in all churches, and that whatever would constitute a Christian in any church would make him a Christian if he dropped all denominational and party distinctions."

So we have always seemed to believe; so The Christian Century affirmed; and so denied I. J. Spencer, and apparently some others whose names we will not use because we cannot trust our own eyes. We know what they said, but we cannot believe that they meant what they said. What Dr. Shepherd says has been the faith of the Disciples on that particular issue, until denied by Mr. Spencer and others. But we believe they are wrong and that Dr. Shepherd is correct. Still, if he would be regular and representative he must revise that utterance so as to exclude from church fellowship thousands of the church universal. And it is in order for an editor some where to open the columns of his paper to record the avalanche of protests against such heresy as Dr. Shepherd's. This is the time to line up; let the brethren speak out; to morrow may be everlastingly too late.

It is a sorry spectacle that now when Christendom is losing the asperity of former days, and becoming more tolerant toward different beliefs, practicing the great lessons of human brotherhood, we should have started a discussion that must fill every tolerant man among us with humiliation; while the people who say little of Christian union are opening doors to let their brethren in to their fellowships and their hearts, we who talk of that as a paramount issue, should now be trying to close doors to keep our brethren out!

The Fatherhood of God is to me a sufficient reason for including in the church militant, and according to them the good hope of heaven, all who have named the name of the Lord Jesus. They have erred on many subjects, it is true; so have we, but their reward like our own is sure, despite our errors. I shall never believe that a God whose name is love has ever made the salvation of the race depend upon intellectual exactness, or upon the correct rendering of Greek verbs, when millions in many lands can never know when such verbs are correctly rendered. If immersion is the royal road to heaven, if Methodists and Presbyterians are not Christians without immersion; if their churches are not churches of Christ because of an error on the subject of baptism, then we should cry aloud and spare not; baptism should be the absorbing theme of all our pulpits, and our tears and our clothing should never be dry. Certainly with no Christians to be united, Christian union must be a farce.

Once we make it clear that we are pleading for union with those whose identity with Christ and his church we deny; reading pious souls out of the church when we ought to rejoice that their names are written in heaven; breaking fellowship with the great souls in the church universal when we ought to count it an honor to be in that fellowship ourselves; closing the doors of heaven against those into whose hearts Christ has entered; raising our hands in the pride of exclusive opinion against those whose names are graven on the hands of God—then let us know that our sincerest overtures on behalf of Christian union will be a bombardment of the skies, and the best of pleas will fall to the ground as unheeded as rains that disappear in the abyss of the sea.

I have watched with interest the different phases through which our brethren have passed for twenty-five years; I have viewed a crisis or two with alarm; I never allowed myself to doubt the success of our mission, no matter how many perilous influences beset it. But I am free to say that never in my acquaintance with the Disciples have we faced an issue as grave as that forced upon us by Z. T. Sweeney and I. J. Spencer. If their views are correct, we shall live on as a denomination, as a narrow, hide-bound sect; but the charity, the outlook, the fraternity of a Restoration movement have gone. The history of the past month will force us back to ante-bellum days, unless those who believe that these good men are in error will resist their dangerous aggressions with all their power. I do not despair, for I believe that when the confusion of the hour has passed, these and other good men like them will rise with us, and save us from the fate of the intolerant and the exclusive.

In the light of the new representative teaching, there will be no longer doubt concerning the question, Are there few that be saved? Our Year Book settles the number and status of the elect!

Finally, while I cannot agree with some of the positions of The Christian Century, I congratulate it upon the noble work it is doing in counteracting the belittling and reactionary influences that are at work among us; upon the brilliant and scholarly editorials that appear in its pages week after week; upon its wide outlook and optimism; upon the introduction of its readers to fields of Christian service at home and abroad; upon its insistence on sane and reasonable views of Christianity; the presence of the catholic spirit in its columns, and the absence of the sectarian spirit therefrom; and I cheerfully express my conviction and my gratitude, in the light of retrograde movements, and particularly of the recent retreat to the almost forgotten period of cast-iron exclusiveness, that it has come to the Kingdom for such a time as this. The Shadow of the Gallows

A few weeks since we had occasion to remark that the sentiment in favor of the abolition of the death penalty is rapidly gaining way. Recent events have emphasized both the reality and the very great need of such a sentiment.

Within the past few days five men were executed in this city, by hanging. Of course every expedient was attempted in the effort to save their lives by legal means. It is one of the guarantees offered by our institutions that every man shall have the benefit of every device which his counsel can suggest for his liberation. In the present instance all these devices failed. The cases were perfectly clear. Four of the men were condemned for a crime so clearly proved and so revolting in its character as to leave no doubt in the mind of any person as to their guilt and the propriety of inflicting upon them the fullest penalty prescribed by law. This penalty in the State of Illinois is hanging.

Yet the most determined and invincible advocate of capital punishment could hardly fail to reconsider his attitude in the light of the facts attending these executions. For days preceding the event the newspapers were filled with long and minute accounts of the doings and sayings of these men, and of the efforts which were being made in their behalf. It was inevitable, in spite of the terrible character of the crimes with which they were charged, that a superficial public sentiment should invest them with some of the qualities of heroes in the circumstances. In how many shallow minds must not the thought have arisen, whether it were not worth while to gain such publicity and interest even at the expense of the death that would presently befall.

The execution was conducted with entire propriety and in the presence of the very limited number of persons prescribed by law. Yet the streets about the county jail were packed with a dense crowd of the morbidly curious, who stood for hours with no other motive than to be as near as possible to the scene of the tragedy that was being enacted behind the stone walls of the jail. Of course the one topic of conversation for this crowd of men and boys was the crime and the penalty. Probably no school for the instruction of the impressionable in depravity could have been more effective than the atmosphere created by newspaper and conversational publicity centered about this episode.

The bodies of the criminals when taken from the jail were the objects of such eager curiosity that the wagons enroute to the undertaker's establishment where the remains were kept, and the church from which the funeral was held were almost literally mobbed by a multitude of people seemingly half insane with the desire to gratify their curiosity.

If these men had been sentenced to life imprisonment at hard labor they would have dropped out of notice without a particle of publicity, and no one would have thought it worth while to parade their crime and their punishment before the public. As it is, this entire community, and in a measure the whole country, has been flooded with the details of the whole unspeakable business. Whatever incitements to crime result from such publicity are already doing their work. Perhaps never in the history of the city has there been a more open reign of violence than during the period since it became practically certain that the men would be hanged. As a deterrent to crime the death penalty is a pathetic failure.

The shadow of the gallows is over the commonwealth that still persists in afflicting this mediæval and barbarous punishment. Nor is it revolting merely because it is the least justifiable of the methods employed to put men to death by the process of law. From the moral point of view electrocution is no better. It is inconsistent with civilization and Christianity to take human life. It is ineffective as a preventive of crime. It brutalizes the moral sense of the community. It makes heroes of the criminals who become its victims.

For these reasons those states which have not already abolished this relic of darkness ought to do so. It would be impossible to persuade those commonwealths that had once abandoned the practice to return to it. A great number of the most intelligent and public-spirited citizens condemn it. The experience of a community like this, when it passes through an episode of this character, converts tens of thousands more to an attitude of opposition. It was a notable fact that in a number of murder trials immediately following the executions not a single juror could be secured who did not confess that he had conscientious scruples against the death penalty. It is hard to have to teach morals by such shocking and disquieting methods, but if the lesson can be effective it may be worth while.

A law abolishing the death penalty, but providing that no man convicted of a crime for which a life sentence is imposed shall be released by executive clemency or at least rendering pardon impossible until a measurable amount of the penalty had been suffered, would vindicate the honor of those states which still linger under the shadow of the gallows, and would provide adequate, and we should hope redemptive, punishment for the worst class of criminals.

Editorial Table Talk

—Readers of The Christian Century who know how generously its columns are opened to expressions of dissent from its editorial opinions and policies, will take no stock in the attempt of a contemporary to make it appear that this paper declines to publish protests against certain affirmations with regard to the Christian status of the members of evangelical denominations which recently appeared in our columns. The editors regard it as a plain duty humbly to make what reparation is in their power to any man whose convictions were misrepresented by our appeal to him for endorsement of these affirmations. Up to date we have received two such disclaimers—those of Rev. I. J. Spencer and Rev. Wallace Tharp. Both have been published. If others are received they will promptly appear. We decline, however, to publish a protest against the mere use of the names of missionary and college officials for the very plain reason that their names were editorally withdrawn from the statement immediately after its publication. There is nothing for them to protest against. However, if such persons wish to disavow the theses as made by us, or to affirm them, our columns are open to them as to all our readers whether their names were included in the original list or not. The statements of the officers of the Church Extension Society and the American Society appearing recently in other newspapers were declined by us on the ground that our absolute withdrawal of their names made any such statement superfluous. The most primary sense of justice should have prompted the authors of those statements to include in them the reason of our declination before they sent them to the press. The whole episode has an interesting background of which we may or may not speak at a later time, depending upon the curve the present movement takes.

—And now begins the annual joy of preparation for the national conventions. Louisville, Ky., Oct. 15-22, are place and date. The program for the opening session, Tuesday evening, Oct. 15, has been announced. Dr. E. L. Powell and the governor of Kentucky will deliver welcome addresses. Mr. R. A. Long of Kansas City will respond, and President A. McLean will deliver the convention sermon. From this it is safe to predict that most people who go at all will be there on time. Louisville Disciples are at work with zeal and system to make a great convention second only in attendance to the centennial at Pittsburg. Ten thousand delegates are expected from Kentucky alone. Everybody who ever lived in Kentucky will want to go back home, and those who were never there will take this opportunity to go and see just why her sons and daughters love her so tenderly.

—The statistical report of church membership annually prepared by Dr. H. K. Carroll states that the Disciples did not submit any figures for the past year as there were none dependable at hand. Last year's figure showing a membership of 1,307,000, was too large, he says, as it included the world membership, not simply that of the United States. It is better that the figures were withheld this year while the basis of a new year book was being laid. On this basis we may reasonably expect more accurate statistics next year than we have ever possessed. The new year book is a great satisfaction, and while necessarily incomplete, it marks a very important step in the direction of gathering and dealing with the significant data of the brotherhood.

—Every student of social problems should have the new Encyclopedia of Social Reform, edited by W. D. Bliss, Price $7.50. It is a treasury of social facts and methods. No reference volume in your library will be used more frequently. It is the most complete and authoritative thing of its kind in print. You may have it absolutely free. Consult the advertisement elsewhere in this issue.

—All differences are hushed in the genuine sympathy felt by The Christian Century for the household of Russell Errett, publisher of the Christian Standard. Within six months two sons have died, the death of the second having taken place last week at Bethany College, where the young man was a student. Mr. Errett himself is just now convalescing from a long and serious illness.

—Dr. Washington Gladden has refused to join other Columbus, O., ministers in inviting Rev. "Billy" Sunday to conduct a revival meeting in that city. Dr. Gladden says his church will not be closed during the meeting, and he will do what he can to keep the other churches open. He speaks strong words against what he calls Mr. Sunday's love of money and profanity.

—The presidency of the board of directors of the Winona assembly and Bible conference has been accepted by William J. Bryan, according to officers of the association. Mr. Bryan will be elected formally at the next meeting of the directors. Mr. Bryan and the Rev. Sol. S. Dickey are attempting to raise $1,000,000 for the institution.

—Liquor interests won a far-reaching victory in the United States Supreme Court by a decision that railroads must carry beer when offered for transportation into "dry counties" of another state. The decision affected particular shipments from Indiana into Kentucky. The court held that beer and intoxicating liquors were legitimate commodities of commerce under the interstate law.

—Edward Hines, the Chicago millionaire lumberman who boasted that he "put Lorimer over" at a cost of $100,000, and who was defended at the Portland convention of the Disciples last July, was expelled from the Union League Club of Chicago last week by an executive committee vote of 11 to 2.

—It would be no surprise just now if this news note should be found running through the religious press: The Disciples have progressed so far in their advocacy of Christian union as to be now debating whether or not Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Methodists are Christians.

—There is a bit of apprehension in the editorial offices over the Disciples' Congress to be held in Kansas City in April. The editors fear that there will not be any more problems worth writing about when that program has been carried out.

—Christianity claims about 3,000,000 adherents in India. This is only about one per cent of the population. About seventy-one per cent of the people are Hindus; twenty-one per cent Mohammedans, and three per cent Buddhists.

The Convict

By H. R. Van Auken.

The chaplain's text was, "Quit you like men." When he finished, the verses he was surprised to see No. 9462 looking at him intently and listening hard. No. 9462 seldom listened, and never intently. He was known as a bad man. Twice he had slugged a guard; once he had raised a rumpus that came near to being a riot; and once he had escaped, and for three weeks had lived in a swamp before he was captured. In less than a week he would walk out in his new prison suit with six dollars in money, an evil reputation even for a convict, and not a friend.

All this went through the chaplain's mind as he continued: "Men, you can make of this place either of two things—a pool that simply stands, stagnates, and fills with poisons, or a lake into which flows the river of your lives, which, passing through, leaves all the dirt behind and runs beautifully on to the sea. Its border is a garden of verdure. It gives health and wealth to its surroundings. Either you can stagnate here, fill your lives with poisons, and when you leave, be a menace to the community where you go; or you can, by God's help, filter out the evil of your lives and go out into the world purified men. It will not be an easy task; but 'Quit you like men.'"

No. 9462 kept right on listening. Unconsciously he squared his shoulders as he rose to march out to the dining-room. The chaplain saw, and made a mental note of it.

The chaplain startled himself out of several reveries during the next day in his office. What would—nay, what could No. 9462 do with his freedom? Not a friend; not even a relative who cared enough to write. Not a place for steady, honest employment. The legislature had talked of making employment for discharged convicts, but it had ended in talk.

The chaplain had delivered multitudes of lectures on the "prison question." He had been cheered to the echo by the assembled congregations. But when he had made an appeal that they personally should give employment to the discharged convicts, and had offered to become the employment bureau, there had, in all his experience, been but one offer.

A farmer had waited for him after a lecture, and after introducing himself, had said: "Just send one up to me some day. I ain't got nothing to tempt anyone, and we'll do our best, me and Marthy. We been thinking about 'In as much as ye done it unto one of the least of these, ye done it unto me.' We ain't got much, but we'll share what we got."

The chaplain was thinking about this farmer. Could he send No. 9462 out to this farm? No. 9462 didn't have a good record. Would it be safe to send him to the farm? But there was that intent look in his eyes, that unconscious squaring of the shoulders. If he meant to quit himself like a man, he would make a hard fight to do it. Well, he'd see.

Friday morning a blue coated guard went to the cell of No. 9462. "Pete, your time's out; but before you go, the chaplain wants to see you in his office."

No. 9462 shuffled out and followed the guard toward the chaplain's office. He was pondering over what he would do with his freedom. No friends of the right sort, no home, no relatives. His bold heart shrank from meeting the world. No wonder old man Parks committed theft so he would get sent up again. He would feel like it, too, only for his new resolve. And then he was only thirty-five, a young man in his prime.

What if his mother could see him now? She'd been dead twenty years. Since then, there had been no hand to guide, no love to follow. Just one shift after another—one evil companion to another, until crime, arrest, and imprisonment had come. That had been life for twenty years. Now, what was before him?

"Mr. Nevins," began the chaplain, "I have news for you. Good news! Take this note to Robert Harkness at this address. He'll meet you at the depot tonight. He knows all about you, and wants to employ you on the farm. Go out there and be the man I expect you to be. Yes, be a man. Write me. I'm your friend every day. Be a man."

Tears stole into the eyes of No. 9462. Could it be possible? For twenty years he had known naught of kindness. No memory of kindness lingered in his heart at all, save with the memory of his mother.

He somehow found himself shaking hands good-bye. He didn't remember what he said or whether he said anything at all. He hardly saw the steps as he went down them out into the sunlight and freedom.

A bird caroled in a big maple near by; a boy ran past rolling a hoop; a nurse trundled a baby cab; the grass was soft and green. "God, there is joy and peace and kindness in the world. I will be a man. And he called me Mister."

Nevins took the train for a little country station that afternoon and was met by the farmer promptly on alighting.

"Howdy do," said Robert Harkness, "I'm real glad to see you. Come right on and we'll git fer home quick or Marthy'll give us fits for being late for supper."

He pointed out the various places of interest to Pete as they drove along. "The berryin' ground" where a little one slept, the church where they "tended meetin'," the school house where little Bob went, the lake where they "went fishin'," and at last the big white house with the mossy old stone out in front, which was "home fer 'em all." There was not a word about Pete's previous condition, not a hint that he had not always been an honest man.

Martha met them as they came in, with a hand of welcome for Nevins and, "I'm glad you could come. We need you and you are so big and strong, you'll be just the man for us."

Little Bob and Nevins became fast friends at once after Pete had caught him in his arms, tossed him skyward and then caught him again.

That night, when the ex-yegg man retired to the clean, fresh room which was given him, it was with a heart that was full of something; but he couldn't tell what it was. "Lord," he said, "I'd like to pray to you, but I don't know how. Mother taught me 'Now I lay me,' but that's a kid's prayer. I reckon you'll have to just take it for granted." Then a thoughtful smile crossed his face. He had thought of the Lord's prayer learned in prison. Kneeling by his bedside he repeated it, then rolled into bed and, for the first time in years, slept with a smile on his face.

The weeks lengthened into months, and Pete Nevins had become a fixture. One day some sheep strayed, and Pete went to the big woods to look for them. A wisp of smoke curling through the bushes caught his eye. Thinking it might be some tramps who, perhaps, had killed one of the sheep,

The Goodness of God

A Talk at the Communion Table

BY PRINCIPAL P. T. FORSYTH.

"The goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance."—Romans 2:4.

The goodness of God is the old way of saying the love of God. Against the shorter catechism it is sometimes charged that we hear nothing of love in the definition of God. That is a hasty error. He is "Holiness, Justice, Goodness (that is, Love), and Truth." You will find it borne in on you as you come into real pastoral contact with the sin of the world, and borne in with the more force as your work searches you with revelations about yourself, that repentance is a ground tone of the Christian life. And you will further find that repentance is produced by God's love far more than by his severity. You will, still further, be driven, I trust, to find the supreme expression of God's love to be the cross of Christ; and you will come to rest in the experience that the cross of Christ is much more than a refuge from the repentance produced by God's holy law—it is the great and constant source of the truest repentance we can know. As the cross retires from religion, it becomes a religion more and more emptied of repentance.

Repeal of Law.

All that law makes is the sorrow of the world, which works death. The age which is now closing is the age which has seen the reign of law established for the natural world as it never was before; and concurrently, the favorite type of religion is divested of the sense of sin, or guilt, in an unprecedented way; and this even though the action of law has been traced and pressed deep into the windings of the moral world, and the automatic action of Nemesis in character. Culture, even moral culture, ousts theology, and its retreat goes with the abeyance of repentance. A humanist Christianity brings no repentance, or but a sentimental at most. There is a great phrase of Luther's which says, "Theology makes sinners." It makes—not pedants (it is too near life), and not saints (it is too near the burning bush)—but it makes sinners (for God's love there makes repentance).

No Repentance.

False culture says, "No repentance. Sin is a superstition, a nightmare, the fancy of moral neurotics, the fiction of moral rigorists." False religion says, "No more repentance. With your conversion, and your forgiveness, and your new sense that God is love, repentance has done its part. It is a frost to the blossom of Christian trust if it come again. Beware, for the sake of your healthy Christian growth, beware of a habit of repentance. Because some need grace, you may not. Or you may not need it all your life."

The Prodigal.

But you do not think that the prodigal settled in at home to a life of enjoyable religious interests; that he became a cheery and delightful optimist, of the sympathetic kind, which can be so devoid of any moral insight or measure of guilt. You do not think that he settled into his new spiritual place as dully as he found his brother settled in his social place. You do not think he was prepared to love everybody who was interesting enough to be loved, or important enough for him to wish to love, even if they laughed at the moral regulations of the old man's home or the costly passion of his grace. You do not think that he would settle down to hold his brother's view of their father to be as right in its way as his own and as deserving of publication to the world.

When was his repentance deepest—on the way back, or in the new home? Was it while he expected his father's word of rebuke, or when he was overwhelmed by having no word of rebuke? Was it under the fear of condemnation, or under the experience of "no condemnation?" Was it in bracing himself for the penalty, or in his shock and bewilderment to find that there was none? Was it not, then, when he was taken aback by the absence of all censure, that he knew what guilt really was—when love was given him liberally, without upbraiding, without parade, or even indication, of its cost?

That is the word of the cross. "I have seen to the judgment. I can provide for my own holiness. Let us not dwell on that now. That has been seen to. Thy sins are forgiven thee. Abide in my peace."

The Cost.

God says little of what his mercy cost him—what it cost him not to make it mercy, but because it was mercy. And in our wicked hours we say that if it had cost him so much as some believe, he would not have been silent about it. How ignoble! If you did a fine thing which you paid for heavily, how would you regard the person who rasped out that if it had cost you so much, we should soon all have heard of it? God is too great and royal to parade what it cost him to save, and thrust his outlay in our face with his gift. But we cannot let it alone—the full mercy, the dreadful cost. His confessors, apostles, martyrs, say it for him. The immeasurable love becomes the measure of our guilt. The prayer in an agony means the cost. The love which could find no utterance but the healing heartbreak of the cross becomes an awful mercy. It is the goodness of God, his holy love, as it sinks in, that brings home to us what Schiller teaches, that "the greatest bane of life is guilt;" because it makes us first know and feel that the greatest boon of life is grace.

Only the Good Know.

Only the good know how bad they were. There are no pessimists like those who read the old ruin in the regenerating light. "Repent, for the kingdom of God is here." "Be confounded, for your holy one is your redeemer." Our greatest hope is our greatest humiliation. And where grace abounds, there does sin abound. The Christian life is repentant praise; if much praise, much grief; if much good labor, also much deep sorrow; if much confidence, much amazement. And sin is always the more deeply confessed for ourselves and our world, because we confess much more than sin—a Saviour to our worst depths and to the wide ends of the earth.

I found a verse of a foreign poetess once, just one verse quoted, and it set me thinking how the rest could have gone. I have translated the verse, and then gone on to continue the note:

"I was able to laugh, my heart was light,
When I stiffened to thy displeasure;
But it broke me down to be forgiven
Without rebuke or measure."

I had set my face for a grudging grace,
My rags I was half parading;
But I never did look for the crushing rebuke—
To be taken without upbraiding.
To be stopped with a kiss in upbraiding myself,
To be stript of the rags I clung to;
To be treated as more than servant or son,
To be feted and fed, and sung to.

And of cost to thee, as of wrath for me,
Thou wert dumb, in thy lordly way;
Of thyself unspared while thou sparedst me,
Of the ransom thyself didst pay.
But can I sit mute in my father's house?
Or remember without amaze?
Can I ever live but to bless thee and serve,
And the deeper to grieve in praise.

As I Go 'Round

By William E. Barton

Once upon a time there was a lady who went to the country for the summer, and there met a dear young girl who brought her eggs and butter, and to whom, in the course of the summer she became very much attached. The girl loved the good lady, and very much desired to return to the city with her, and to work in her kitchen.

The lady accepted the arrangement. She would kill many birds with one stone. She would secure a good and faithful and lovable domestic, would teach her her own methods of cooking and housekeeping, and would take a girl out of a home that had very meager advantages and give her wider opportunities. So in due time the new girl arrived, and the lovely arrangement began.

A Serious Domestic Problem.

Now, there was one point which had not been mentioned or so much as hinted at, and the good lady did not quite know how to explain it easily. In the part of the country from which this girl came, the hired girl, and the "hand," as the hired man was called, ate at the table with the family, the former in her apron and the latter in his shirt-sleeves. The mistress knew it would be a little difficult to explain to the maiden from the tall grass that a very different state of affairs existed in town.

However, she made the best of it, and explained it to the young lady from the rural region. She said that as the meals were brought on in courses, it was necessary that the maid should have her headquarters in the kitchen during the meal time. She pointed out that in the kitchen was a nice little table with a clean white cloth, and she said that the girl might either eat her soup while the family was eating, and the subsequent courses in order, or if she preferred, she could wait till all were done, and have her meal uninterrupted; but that in either event it would be found more convenient for her to eat at the nice little table in the kitchen.

Solved by the Domestic.

She realized as she was talking that she was not making a complete success of it. The girl's visions of life in the home in the city had enthroned herself in the parlor, taking lessons on the grand piano, and participating in feasts in the midst of which she might be something of a belle. She made no spoken protest, but heard the new arrangement somewhat moodily, and after a moment of rather awkward silence rejected both suggestions.

In so doing the sweet young lips of the maiden from where the daisies blossom gave utterance to this classic sentence,—

"I'll chaw as I go 'round."

It lies outside the scope and purpose of the present dissertation to relate how the plan worked; nor do I undertake here and now to pass judgment on this method of solving the servant-girl problem on its social or gastronomic side. This is no lecture on domestic science.

The Domesticated Dominie.

But I have thought very often of this sweet young girl from the tall grass, and have applied her laconic resolution to the work in which I have had more experience than in cookery. Every now and then a church does what that good woman did. It finds a fine young minister out in the country, and it brings him to town, and sometimes does not explain the matter as tactfully as the good woman explained it to the damsel from down the state. He has to learn that he cannot bring everything onto the table in a single course as he did in the country, and sit down and eat it with his congregation after having cooked it undisturbed. He has to bring on his work in courses, and space out his time amid innumerable distractions, and as for sitting down to write a sermon undisturbed with the whole week to look forward to in preparation, he can seldom know an unbroken morning, and the afternoons are smashed to flinders, and there are no evenings. He will sit in the disarray of his pots and kettles and wonder how in the world he is to get anything on the table for next Sunday, to say nothing of feeding his own soul.

Brother, acquire the art of peripatetic mastication. Bite off something in your study, and chaw as you go 'round.

An Interrupted Meal.

There are times of extreme difficulty in the matter of consistent application to the work of the study. You seat yourself at your own little white table, feeding your own soul with the edible and palatable products of your own library shelves,—strong meat of philosophy, spice of anecdote, sweet cream of pedagogy—and just then rings the bell, and you must serve some course you had forgotten was on the bill of fare. It may be a funeral, or a call or any one of forty interruptions. Whatever it is, it is a summons from the dining room, and it forbids you to sit longer among your pans and kettles. You must hasten to feed the already stuffed and satiated congregation, and maybe they will grumble because you did not furnish appetite as well as food. No matter. Though you rise with a mouthful bitten from your last book, go at your duty and chaw as you go 'round.

"Chaucer."

"Chaw" is a homely word, and lacks something of good and regular standing among the pedants who make dictionaries. Yet it is one of those strong, rough-hewn variations of classic pronunciation that proclaims the absence of the effete. And do you not remember the conundrum concerning the rough man who in admonishing his son to eat properly, cast the admonition into fine though unconscious literary form? He said, "Chaucer!" Suppose he had said, "chew, sir," or "I advise you to fletcherize?" The sentence would have lost not only its rugged strength, but also its literary beauty. Therefore, despise not the declaration of the maiden of the meadows, but chaw as you go 'round.

Roundabout Renunciation.

I must not be understood as encouraging inattention to work in one's study. Much of it then must be; more of it then ought to be. I merely advise my brethren to make their inevitable and numerous interruptions as incidentally profitable as possible by circumambulatory fletcherization. As you walk about your parish, turn over in your mind the cud of the good thought you were biting off when you had to leave.

Mesmerized by Mastication.

And you, dear brethren, who see your pastor on the street and are not seen by him, be patient if he passes you with unseeing eye. Could you but behold the articulation of his mental molars, you would behold them slowly resolving to digestible pulp a tough and stringy bite from the neck of some mighty problem of divine providence or of human conduct, the muscle of which he will expand upon a great sermon. Come and hear it next Sunday, and chide him not for his present pre-occupation. He is hastening to answer some parishioner's summoning ring, but is chawing as he goes 'round.

Church Workers in State Universities

BY RICHARD H. EDWARDS.

At last the churches are waking up to the religious significance of the state universities. This grows more apparent every month. In January the home mission secretaries meeting at Madison, Wisconsin, passed urgent resolutions calling for immediate action by our National Education Society, and this month, on the sixth and seventh, the fifth annual conference of church workers in state universities met at Iowa City, Iowa, some sixty men being present from the middle west and western states. Among these men were university professors, pastors of churches in university towns, and still more important a small group of specialists—"university pastors" to whom in many centers, where there are students enough to warrant it, this important and difficult work is being delegated.

The Key Men.

These "university pastors" are the real keys to the situation. Each of them officially represents his state church body at the university. His salary is paid by the churches of the state, sometimes with help from national funds. He is the servant of the churches and responsible to them through their state organization. The Presbyterians have seventeen such specialists already at work, all appointed in the last six years. The churches of our order have but one such pastorate in the country, that at Madison where the pastor has during the year a thousand students and faculty members upon his pastoral lists. This conference of church workers has set its seal upon the church approach to the religious problem at these great institutions. It denies with equal earnestness however that this means a sectarian emphasis—in fact the five years of solid, steady, and effective co-operation at the University of Wisconsin, for example, is one of the brightest spots we have seen in the relations of the denominations anywhere. It is worth a dozen union churches in small towns. This spirit of frankness and friendliness characterized the conference throughout and all the leading denominations were represented. Co-operation has now been demonstrated to be absolutely necessary in this field.

The Keynote.

The keynote of the university pastor's work as it has shaped itself in these early years of its establishment is personal counsel. This man must be an expert in student problems, a specialist in confidential relationships with young people. He seeks out the individual student and by whatever grace may be given to him he communicates the realities of the Christian faith. The striking results of such work in the lives of students were made clear. The importance of holding university men and women to the church of their choice was dwelt upon and there developed the decided conviction that if the local church in the university center is to be made increasingly the focus of student religious life, it must, in turn, enlarge its fundamental power and hospitality. Emphasis was also laid upon the securing and training of strong men for the ministry. This emphasis is an integral element of this movement as a church movement.

Religious Teaching.

Religious teaching next came to the front. Dean Sharpe of the Bible College of Missouri, the president of the conference presented the importance of religious courses of university grade. Professor Starbuck of Iowa City gave the results of questionnaire replies from state university presidents indicating a high degree of willingness on their part to grant credits for religious courses provided the church agencies offering them will maintain a high standard. There are indeed five state universities now giving credits for such courses and twelve which would welcome an arrangement for credits properly safeguarded. The significance of courses more inspirational and directly religious in character was not lost sight of in this discussion. Such voluntary courses are already well developed by university pastors, Christian Association leaders and others. As the amount of required work in these courses is not great the student attendance is large and when the leadership is able the attendance is well maintained.

Outstanding Features.

Three outstanding features of the university pastor's work now seem to be nationally standardized. They are these three—the personal pastoral function, the teaching function, and the co-operative function. Other features are added in accordance with individual gifts and the needs of particular situations. It is the conviction of those who see the full national significance of this work that some of the strongest men in the leadership of the church will come increasingly to devote their lives to it.

As to "Heathen at Home"

BY ROBERT E. SPEER.

You ask what I "say to the man who always replies to an appeal for foreign missions that there are enough heathen at home." I ask him, first of all, how much he is doing to reduce their number—whether the amount which he is withholding from foreign missions is really being applied to the conversion of home heathen. If not, whether he is entirely honest in alleging the existence of the heathen at home as his reason for neglecting the heathen abroad.

I ask him, in the second place, what would have become of him and his ancestors if the objection which he makes had been deemed adequate by Christians of the earlier ages. If the gospel had not been carried to Europe until there were no heathen left where it originated, what would his ancestors have done in Europe and what would be his condition today?

I ask him, in the third place, to come and meet the men who know most about the home heathen and who are doing most to reach them. He will find that they are the most ardent advocates of world-wide missions, and that the force of foreign missionaries has no richer recruiting ground than the families of home and city missionaries.

In the fourth place, I ask him to read the histories of home and foreign missionary enterprises, and see how the whole modern home missionary movement sprang out of the foreign missionary spirit. If he doubt this paradox, "The Life of Samuel J. Mills" will answer his doubt.

I ask him, in the fifth place, where is the scriptural justification of such a division of obedience? We were bidden to preach the gospel to every creature, both at home and abroad. There is not a word of justification of our confining our interests either to Asiatic or to American heathen.

In the sixth place, I would tell him that the only gospel that will ever reach the home heathen is the gospel meant for all heathen; that our problems here are merely the American expression of universal problems, and that the only solution must be the universal solution. We shall never stand omnipotent before the problems in each land until we face them with a world purpose, a world spirit and a world obedience.

There is as much more to say to such a man as there is content to the gospel of Christ, but if what I have said hasn't answered him, it would not be worth saying anything more except to ask him what Jesus said when Simon and they that were with him followed him into the desert and asked him to return and settle in Capernaum. Perhaps it would be necessary to tell him that the incident is found in the fourth chapter of Luke, 42nd and 43rd verses.

Dreaming

I hate to read of millionaires
  Because such reading seems
To hypnotize me utterly
  And start me dreaming dreams.
How many times I've figured out
  What I'd be apt to do
If I were in that fellow's place
  And had a million too.
Of course I'd use my fortune well,
  More sensibly than he,
For I'd give ten per cent at least
  To worthy charity.
Another ten per cent would go
  To help along a few
Of my deserving relatives
  Whose bills are overdue.
And then my duty to the church;
  Of course a goodly share—
Say twenty-five per cent or so,
  Would be devoted there.
I'd give this latter quietly,
  Insisting that my name
Must be withheld, that none might know
  Whence this donation came.
I'd only let the pastor know;
  He'd have to know, you see,
Because my name upon the check
  Would show it was from me.
Another twenty-five per cent
  Would do myself and wife;
The income we'd derive from that
  Would keep us both for life.
Then after that—well, after that
  I dream away and plan
To spend still other ten per cent
  To help my fellow man.
And finally my dreaming gets
  A bit confused, and then
I take a tumble, and my feet
  Touch solid earth again;
And common sense assures me, as
  It stops me with a jerk,
I've wasted time enough to do
  A dollar's worth of work.

Our Readers' Opinions

A Communication from W. T. Moore

I regret that I am compelled to find fault with your journalistic courtesy. You kept my former article from your readers for many weeks after it was received. And when it did appear, it was so disfigured by injected editorial comments and the omission of the most important paragraph in it, that I felt as if it was really not worth while to make any response whatever, since I might have to wait a long time for my reply to appear, and then have some of it left out. But having received a number of letters from some of the most prominent Disciples thanking me for what I wrote, and intimating that in due time I would attend to your strictures on my article, I finally decided to offer you a few more "last words" on the important question under consideration.

1. I do not care to notice more than two or three of the paragraphs wherein you attempt a reply to my communication. You are still affirming the curious statement that "the immersion of a believer is not baptism. Believers are many times in their lives immersed without being baptized. The essential thing in baptism is the religious significance imputed to the physical act, and this significance is psychical, social." I have quoted the whole of this remarkable statement because I want the reader to have the full benefit of its meaning. But where is the man who ever said that either immersion or baptism, when used as a religious ordinance, is anything less than its spiritual significance? When this spiritual significance is understood, then immersion has precisely the same meaning as baptism; or in other words, they are convertible terms. When you immersed many pedo-baptists, as you say you have done, did you simply perform this service as a physical act without its spiritual significance? Did you omit the proper conditions which constitute a religious ordinance? Surely you know that the meaning of the act itself is one thing, and the use of it is altogether another thing.

2. Can it be possible that the accomplished editors of The Christian Century do not know that when immersion is used as the proper translation of baptism, nothing short of what baptism really means goes with the translation? In all my reading I have never come across such an argument as you have been making. Do not the editors of The Century know that the question with regard to whether the word baptism or immersion shall be used, is simply a question of translation? It is true that the word baptisma, the Greek for baptism, had been frequently used without any spiritual significance whatever, and so with the word immersion. But this does not prove that these words are not convertible terms. As you well know, one is simply the Latin translation of the other, and you ought to know, furthermore, that the spiritual significance of either one or the other of these words comes from the use that is made of it.

3. Let me make my meaning plain to the general reader. I hope you do not need this primer teaching. Suppose I were translating a Greek book into the Latin, for instance the New Testament. I come to the word baptisma, anglicized "baptism." Now, what word will I use to translate literally the Greek word baptisma? Undoubtedly I must use immersio, or its equivalent, if I want to make an exact translation of the Greek word.

4. You say that baptism is an "academic controversy," while the practice of Christian unity rests upon the plain will of Christ. You struggled hard to successfully reply to what I said about that matter. Let us look at this a little further. How do I know what you mean by "Christian unity?" The phrase "spiritual unity" is used in Ephesians 4:3. Now the Greek word which is translated "unity" is henotees, and all the Greek lexicons give its meaning as "unity," or an equivalent word. But how do I know that this is its meaning? Simply in the same way that I know that baptidzo means "to immerse," or baptisma means immersion; I consult the lexicons. But the kind of "unity" must be determined by other facts just as what baptism connotes or immersion connotes must be determined by the use that Christ and his apostles made of the ordinance.

5. Now, this is the whole case so far as the meaning of either word is concerned. The spiritual significance of the act must be determined by other things than the simple meaning of the word. The act of baptism was in use among the Greeks before it was adopted by Christ to express the ordinance he commanded, and he doubtless selected the term used by the Greeks because He wished to express just what we understand by immersion. But if the editors of The Christian Century think this is not the case, will they kindly say just what they think He did mean to express, if not what He really said? They have already told us that He did not mean to sprinkle or pour, and they strongly intimated that He did not mean to immerse. Will they, therefore, kindly tell us just what the Lord did mean by the use of this word? Our good friends, the Presbyterians, will not thank the editors of The Christian Century for correcting one of the champion defenders of sprinkling for baptism. In the Campbell and Rice debate, Dr. Rice says that baptism means the thing done. Personally, I accept this definition. But if it does have this meaning, then clearly, if the thing done in baptism connotes to immerse, sprinkle and pour, then it seems to me that one must submit to all three of these things done or else we must have three separate baptisms, if these are done singly; for evidently the act of immersion is a different act from the act of sprinkling, and the act of sprinkling is different from the act of pouring. So it follows that we must submit to all three of these, or else we have three distinct baptisms.

But when you come to speak of Christian unity, you declare: "We would say that immersion is the only mode of baptism upon which others than the Disciples can unite, and that is one of the many reasons why we can practice nothing else." So, then, after all, it results that The Christian Century's plea for Christian union practice includes immersion as the only mode of baptism. Well, some of us at least expect better things of the scholarly editors of The Century than they are now giving us in their discussion of the baptismal question. It is certainly a pity that a paper, so excellent in many respects, should virtually ignore all the rules of scholarly discussion by utterly disregarding the plainest facts of translation, and this, apparently, for the purpose of bolstering up a pet theory that has no foundation in any of the facts involved in the baptismal controversy. But it is precisely this method of reasoning that has contributed largely to the divisions which now separate the professed followers of Christ.

6. I have already intimated that the only points made against my contention by The Century editors, that seem to me to have even the appearance of arguments, are based upon a mis-statement of the meaning of what I said. This fact is shown in several instances. I need only mention one. You mis-state entirely my meaning when I say that Disciples would be hypocrites if they should contend that "pedo-baptists are all right, and their churches just as truly the churches of Christ as the churches of the Disciples are the Churches of Christ." Now, I heartily believe just what I have said, and yet I do not mean to intimate that these churches are not churches of Christ in any sense. For if I believed that they are churches of Christ just as truly as the Disciples are churches of Christ, I would join one of these churches at the first opportunity, for the reason that by doing so I would not have to make as many sacrifices as I have made and am still making for the simple reason that I believe the Disciples' position is much more in conformity with the will of the Master than is the position of these pedo-baptist churches. Indeed, if your contention is correct, or even if you sincerely believe it is correct, I cannot understand why you do not move over into the pedo-baptist camp. But I am suddenly held up at this point, for you say that "they are not all right," in these words: "they are wrong, and undone, involved as they are in a sectarian order." Surely the editors of The Century do not wish to be understood that churches in that plight are as "truly churches of Christ as are the churches of the Disciples." I, at least, would regard myself as a hypocrite if I so affirmed. I know many people among the Disciples whom I regard as Christians, though not as "truly" Christians as some others I know. Comparisons are generally odious, but it does not follow for that reason that they are always unjust.

Eustis, Fla. W. T. MOORE.
January 20, 1912.

[It was not our lack of "journalistic courtesy" that was responsible for the lapse of time between our receipt of Dr. Moore's former article and its publication, but the simple physical limitations of our journalistic space. It is not apparent how the article could lose any of its virtue by being published a few weeks later, or even a year later than the date of its writing. It dealt with principles not with passing events. The "most important paragraph" which Dr. Moore says was omitted was simply an irrelevant introduction. We are compelled to omit a similar paragraph or two from the above article.

It is due mainly to "journalistic courtesy" to Doctor Moore that the present communication is given space at this time. As a rejoinder to our criticism of his former article it came many weeks too late to claim the right of way over other discussions that were then proceeding. Meantime its main points have been treated in other connections, and so far as the discussion goes, it adds nothing. But having subjected his former article to a rather searching critique, The Christian Century willingly makes room for this rejoinder. To reply to it adequately would be to repeat things that have been stated again and again in our columns in past months. We have affixed numbers to certain paragraphs corresponding to the numbers in our reply.

1. We are glad that Dr. Moore agrees with us as to the essentially spiritual meaning of baptism. We feel sure that every thoughtful Disciple will agree with the view that baptism is not a physical act, but essentially a psychical, a social act. When the editors of The Christian Century immerse pedo-baptists they perform the whole act of baptism not simply the physical act of immersion.

2. This is a most curious paragraph. To talk of translating a Greek New Testament word whose essential meaning is spiritual by an English word whose only meaning (except in figurative usage) is physical, and compelling the English word to take on all the spiritual significance of the Greek word is ridiculous. That is not translating it at all. The English word "immerse" has never taken on even a hint of the meaning of the New Testament word "baptize." And the reason English scholarship has transliterated baptizo rather than translated it is due solely to the fact that there is no English word that connotes what the Greek word connotes. The words "baptize" and "immerse" are not convertible terms and cannot be made such except by legalists who regard baptism as a physical act. This Dr. Moore does not do.

3. Dr. Moore's "primer teaching" is erroneous. If he were translating the Greek New Testament into Latin and used the word immersio where baptizo occurs he would do a most unscholarly thing.

4. The full meaning of Christian unity has not been revealed to either Dr. Moore or The Christian Century. It is probably a "progressive goal" to be attained from age to age as the church enters farther into the mind of her Lord. But the fundamental principle and obvious first step of this unity is not a question for debate between Dr. Moore and The Christian Century. This fundamental principle was stated in our reply to Dr. Moore's former article as follows: "Our one obvious, immediate and indisputable duty in carrying out the will of our Lord is to receive into the full fellowship of "our" church those whom He has received into His church. This duty is indisputable. Dr. Moore will not dispute it." We are glad to note that Dr. Moore does not dispute it. It is not an "academic controversy," it is a practical and urgent duty.

5. If Dr. Moore will turn to The Christian Century of January 11, to the editorial entitled "Did Christ Command Baptism," he will find our opinion as to what "the Lord did mean by the use of this word." And if he will turn back to The Christian Century of last week, to our reply to a question by W. F. Richardson, he will find a statement as to just what the thing is that is done in baptism. Of course, we do not hold that the essential thing done is either to immerse, or sprinkle, or pour, or to perform any other physical act, and we wonder that Dr. Moore's lucid mind should have gotten tangled up as it has in the latter part of this paragraph.

6. It is comforting in this hour when the Disciples are being represented to the Christian world as denying that Presbyterian and other churches are churches of Christ, and denying the Christian status of their membership, to have Dr. Moore's weighty word refusing even "to intimate that these churches are churches of Christ in any sense." This single statement from him carries greater weight than the three or four contrary utterances taken together. It is a very thin wall of difference if indeed there is any difference at all between Dr. Moore and The Christian Century on this point. If the only matters to consider were the distinctive points involved in the Disciples' plea for unity, then we would hold with Dr. Moore that a Presbyterian church, for example, was not so truly a church of Christ as is a Church of Disciples. But there are many other considerations which we cannot ignore, many other points of Christian excellence and obedience and loyalty. In respect to some of these we must admit that Presbyterian churches are more truly churches of Christ than are Disciples' churches. So without undue self-depreciation on the one hand, or unchristian pride on the other, we are quite content not to try to strike a nice balance of Christian virtues as between us and them, but to act upon the rough assumption that we all measure up to about the same level. As with individuals, so with the evangelical religious bodies:

"There is so much evil in the best of us,
And so much good in the worst of us,
That it ill becomes any of us,
To say much about the rest of us."

We are all truly churches of Christ, and one "just as truly" as the others.—THE EDITORS.]

A Needed Revival

Every congregation, almost, has at least a few good, faithful men and women who practically contribute all the spiritual life that comes to the community. Many others of the body simply hold a nominal relation to the church and their lives are of no great force in a spiritual way. Probably fifty per cent of the membership of the average church contributes to the financial support and it is said that only about forty per cent of our people give in any amount to organized missionary work.

It would seem that a steady and systematic effort should be made in every church, of the kind in hand, to lead these careless ones up to the privilege of service to which they are entitled. Aside from their attitude of unfairness that should be corrected, they should be brought up to the joy of interested service.

Then, it will mean so much for Christianity to have all such disciples made alive to the interests of the kingdom on their own account and that of the whole world.

To this end I will suggest that revivals be held for this very purpose and that the members be called upon to commit themselves to the larger service and in a specific manner, somewhat as we now call our outside friends to confess our Lord before men. Several propositions might be offered at each service and of the following kind:

1. To engage more definitely in the reading of the Bible as a daily and important Christian duty.

2. To practice the art of private devotions at a definite, daily time for meditation and prayer.

3. To put into active effort whatever good impulses arise within them by attempting some definite effort in behalf of other people to assist them either materially or through personal friendship to higher levels of living. That is, to become a personal friend to some family, boy, girl or any other that may be led to better ways, or those who simply need the encouraging fellowship of a personal friend who may be strong. No service can be more Christian and so many need this service.

4. To assume a larger and more generous part in the support of Christianity by systematic and proportionate contributions to the local church and to whatever other forms of benevolence that present themselves.

5. To enter personally and definitely into the campaign for world evangelism by becoming better acquainted with the facts of the missionary fields and by a larger support of that work.

6. To be kind, courteous and brotherly to all and at all times. There are many men and women of prominence in churches that need to know and practice this proposition. The unconscious unkindness and rudeness of the strong to their weaker brothers destroys so much faith and life.

7. Through it all to strive to do justly, love kindness and walk humbly with our God.

Many others might be offered, but these are sufficient to illustrate the suggestion offered.

It would seem that an equal amount of the energy now being used in the evangelization of our unconverted neighbors might be well and profitably spent in bringing our nominal membership into active service. This would greatly facilitate the winning of each neighborhood to the Master.

Letters to the Editors

Editors The Christian Century: The Century is always a welcome visitor, because of its liberality in thought, broad religious outlook and sane interpretation of religious movements. You have caught the spirit that the average man wants in his religious life.

Thank you for the great paper you are giving us in The Christian Century. It is our best by far.

I wish to congratulate the editors on the worthfulness of The Century the past year, and to say that all we have planned for its support and circulation, in this district, has not been realized as yet.

Editors The Christian Century: I am tremendously stirred by your courage. Right or wrong from the standpoint of journalistic success, I am with you. I believe a mighty lot of our ministers will admire the pluck of your present policy. I am beginning to think some of these men who have been denying your affirmations will be hearing from their friends that they have been over-conservative. Another two weeks will show some efforts to modify and trim down the extreme position taken by Mr. Spencer. How the Disciples could continue men with views like that on a commission to promote Christian union would be a great mystery to me. I can almost imagine a demand arising for his resignation from the commission.

Editors Christian Century: I am increasingly convinced that you have steered the issue with great wisdom. You have lifted us all above the cavilling over academic disputes, such as the meaning of specific texts, and made us see that the issue is one of fraternity, of brotherhood, of honesty in dealing with our Christian brethren. We cannot longer tolerate hair splitting distinctions as a justification of our refusal to acknowledge our Christian neighbors as Christians indeed.

Editors Christian Century: I have just read the last issue of The Christian Century. Your policy is, it seems to me, not only going to react favorably to The Century but will spell the doom of uncertainty and equivocation about the Christian status of our religious neighbors. The day is not far hence when there will not be in our brotherhood a single man of real standing who will dare or desire to make such denials as those made by Brothers Spencer and Tharp. If it is true, as Brother Tharp asserts, that he is suffering from a suspicion of heresy attaching to him, he will suffer much longer and more seriously in the future over having his name attached to a denial of the Christian standing of Methodists and Presbyterians.

Editors Christian Century: To my mind "The Call of the Christ," appearing in The Century of Feb. 15 is the clearest note that it has ever sounded forth. It gives evidence of a knowledge of the world of our time, and of the fact that the order of things which has characterized Christendom for an age is passing, that the change is not merely superficial involving only the shifting of stage scenes and actors, but is a new drama. It is a full recognition of the fact that the real Jesus and his social idea have been newly discovered after being overlaid and obscured by the ecclesiastical accumulations of centuries.

The Book World

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST, by Edward Scribner Ames.

This volume of five sermons is not a collection, but a unity. Together the discourses constitute a closely reasoned, though by no means dry and technical, translation of the central truth of Christianity—the Divinity of Christ—into terms of twentieth century life and thought. The point of view is that of the functional psychology, and a more rigorous application of it to the facts of Christian experience and the interpretation of traditional dogma has not yet appeared. If we may speak of the scientific side of a book so purely religious as this, it may be regarded as an appendix to the author's "Psychology of Religious Experience." In both is the same method of "radical empiricism," the same fearless facing of the facts, the same insistence on the functional and pragmatic bases of reality. Nevertheless the psychologist nowhere obscures the man or the Christian. Argument and piety, formula and experience commingle on every page, so that one has no sooner begun to wonder what sort of a congregation this of Dr. Ames' must be to enjoy such close-knit argument, than one is found asking: "How could they fail to enjoy this burning message of a living Christ?" We need not, therefore, covet the congregation, but rather the vision and power of the preacher.

For this is the religious value of the book—that it makes Christ real to us. The sermon, "The Empirical View of Jesus," is especially valuable for this purpose. It gets rid at one stroke of all the word-puzzles about substances, essences, human and divine natures, etc., which make traditional theology, to use Mr. Bradley's oft-quoted phrase, "an unearthly ballet of bloodless categories," and brings us face to face and heart to heart with the Jesus of history—the great idealist, the perfect exemplar, "the lover of women and men," the One who has for humanity the absolute value of God Himself. (We use the word "absolute" with fear and trembling, knowing Dr. Ames' aversion to the philosophy called by that name.) Thus Christian faith becomes faith in the ideals of Jesus together with the demand that, so far forth as human endeavor can, they shall be realized in human lives and institutions. It is the affirmation of the soul: "This good thing is not too good for me; this high thing is not too high for earth; therefore it shall be so."

It is manifest that in this circle of thought if we retain the terms orthodoxy and heterodoxy at all, we must radically revise their meaning. Orthodoxy will then become devotion to the cause of truth, justice and love and the faith that these are not mere cloud-capes which will vanish with the first shifting of the wind, but real outlines of the Promised Land. And heterodoxy will be that attitude of scepticism, express or implicit, towards Jesus' ideals which says in effect: "He was a wonderful dreamer, but—he dreamed." We are reminded that Matthew Arnold was once asked, "Is Christianity a failure?" To which he quickly replied: "I did not know it had ever been tried." The root of the matter is there: to have saving faith is to try Christianity.

"What think ye of Christ, friend? When all's done and said.
Like you this Christianity or not?
It may be false, but will you wish it true?
Has it your vote to be so if it can?"

But the book has also an apologetic value. It is in the succession of Harnack's "What is Christianity" and Father Tyrell's "A Much Abused Letter." It is not hard to imagine how eagerly the young university men, among whom Dr. Ames' life is passed, and who have found the ideals and methods of modern science so often in conflict with traditional belief, will welcome this book which tells them that they may keep their science and their Christ. To the mind puzzled and repelled by the older definitions, the chapter on "The Divinity of Christ" cannot help but prove "a vital breath of more ethereal air"—so simple is the argument, yet so vital and significant. "It is common to assume the nature of God and then to show that Jesus Christ is His son, but the opposite course may be more historical, more scriptural and more reasonable. 'The life of Christ' is the given factor in the equation and from it is to be discovered what kind of a being God is." And again: "The reasonable and satisfying thing is to believe, and to act upon the belief, that God is as good and gracious as Jesus Christ." Here manifestly we are in the realm, not of portents and prodigies, but of ordinary human values, which we can assess historically, psychologically—yes, even "ontologically," despite Dr. Ames' shying at the term—and reach the equation God equals Christ; for "the significant thing finally is not so much whether Christ is divine, but whether God is Christ-like."

Though having points of contact with Ritschlianism, this is not Ritschlianism. The tendency of the latter is to seek for the essence of Christianity in the past—that is to say in some great, inclusive principle or principles in the power of which the historical Jesus lived and taught. Dr. Ames position—if I do not altogether misunderstand it—tends forward instead of backwards and seeks the essence of Christianity in the living, self-adapting (I had almost said, self-critical) Spirit of Jesus as it functions in each and ever-changing environment. It is true that Dr. Ames rejects the mystical view of this Spirit and reduces it to normal psychological processes; and some will differ from him here; but we must remember that from the functional standpoint this is by no means equivalent to denying the Spirit, but only gives it a more "matter-of-fact" basis. In the sermon "The Reincarnation of Christ" this spiritual presence of Christ in the church and the world is very clearly set forth. "The thing by which alone a man may assure himself of the divine presence is not some single religious impulse in the past, or obedience to some outward ordinance, but the continual sense of living the best life of which he is capable."

In all this there is much more in common with Modernist thought in the Catholic Church than with the "liberal theology" as represented especially by the school of Harnack; and that Dr. Ames' position is fundamentally catholic—that is social—rather than Protestant—that is individualistic—is evident from even the most cursory reading of the sermon "Two or Three and Christ." In that sermon Dr. Ames quotes Stanton Coit to this effect: "There still remain the two, but a third party, not only a mightier, but one different in gifts and qualities—springs into existence. Whenever there are two together there are also three, and the third is Master by divine right." Commenting on this Dr. Ames says: "The union of these minds creates an atmosphere in which each individual is stimulated, disciplined and guided by an intelligence shared in a measure by all, but which is greater than any single mind." And what is this but the authority of the church, of the collective Christian conscience, psychologically grounded?

But our enthusiasm is carrying us too far afield; and we close by saying—read the book for yourself. With all of it you will probably not agree and it would be a poor, sapless thing if you did. But it will set you thinking and jostle you out of that intellectual self-complacency, into which all of us, liberal and conservative alike, are prone at times to fall. Above all, this book is a challenge—necessarily so because of its pragmatic point of view for which reality is in the making and we are making it. It sets a task and calls for volunteers. "It is obligatory upon his followers yet to make the demonstration to prove what Christ was . . . . and whether there is really a God in the universe good enough to be called the Father of Jesus Christ." Does not that sound like a trumpet peal?

Book on Social Problems

MEN WANTED, by Fred B. Smith. Fred B. Smith has been called by the American Magazine the most expert lay preacher to men in the English-speaking world. He begins his book with a visit to the places where men sleep in New York, taking us to visit first the ten cent lodging houses and then down the scale to the long line of men lying in the gutter covered with newspapers. At the same time various agencies are clamoring in the papers for more men. He is trying to recognize the conflicting impressions that there are too many men and too few men. He decides there are not too many men but there are too few who are realizing on their opportunities. He does not ignore the social question but insists upon the development of character in the individual. The virtues that he exalts are Work, Honesty, Loyalty, Initiative, Perseverance and Religion. The book will inspire men everywhere to realize their better selves. (New York: Association Press. Pp. 223. 75 cents.)

THE BROKEN WALL, by Edward A. Steiner. There are two kinds of sociologists, the statistical kind and the human kind. Steiner has long delighted us with his human sympathy and deep insight. He is a story teller whose stories out of real life read with a charm that but little of the current fiction possesses. This book is a collection of stories from his experiences which indicate the breaking down of racial prejudice and the coming of brotherhood. The story "Committing Matrimony" tells of the marriage of an Irishman to a Jewish woman and of the christening of the first baby. A fine humor runs through the story but better still a tremendous message. The protestant preacher who officiates at wedding and christening sees the vision of a humanity shorn of its prejudices and divisions. The book will feed the intellect and stir the heart. (New York: F. H. Revell. Pp. 219. $1 net.)

THE IMMIGRATION PROBLEM, by Jeremiah W. Jenks and W. Jett Lauck. We have a considerable literature on the immigration question but this is the latest scientific contribution to the problem. The authors as members of the government commission had unequalled opportunities for the study of the question and have gathered the meat out of the forty volumes of reports of the commission and given their interpretation of this material in a most helpful way. The statistical material is introduced in abundance and we predict that the book will assume the place of an authority on this subject for the great body of social students. (New York: Funk & Wagnalls. Pp. 406. $1.75 net.)

The Annual Child Labor Conference in Louisville

The war against child labor began more than one hundred years ago, and still is waging. The long fight was started in England early in the nineteenth century, with the substitution of machine for hand labor. One of the early machine looms was described in three ominous and significant words: "It enables a totally inexperienced boy to set the whole loom in motion, by simply moving a rod backward and forward."

Child Labor Strongly Entrenched.

Child labor was so strongly intrenched in the mills and factories of England, that it took the combined labors of philanthropists, statesmen, writers and poets many years to overcome it. Dickens in fiction and Elizabeth Barrett Browning in verse did much to bring the movement to the hearts and consciences of the people. Mrs. Browning's "Cry of the Children" still voices for us the plea for the little prisoners of labor. The victory was won after long years in the old country—but greed seeking for cheap labor when banished from one land, flees to another. This hideous servitude crossed the ocean, and found an easy foothold in New England. Seventy-five years ago, in the town of the Puritan, it was customary to work little children from sunshine to sunset in the cotton mills—often, during the long days for thirteen or fourteen hours—a slavery more deadly than that of the negro on the cotton plantation. The same weary fight that had been waged in England was repeated in New England and New York. By the close of the Civil War, legislation both as to the age of the worker, and the length of the working day had banished the most disgraceful phases of the problem, as far as the textile industries were concerned, from the Eastern States.

Textile Industry's Bad Eminence.

But these forces of evil are masters of the tactics of retreat from one base to another. The remarkable industrial revival in the south, after it had rallied from the desolation and stagnation of the war, made it profitable to locate manufactories for cotton goods there; the necessities for the production of textile fabrics are within such easy reach in some of the southern states, that it has been said that from many of their factories a stone may be thrown into a cotton field, and a bullet fired into a coal mine. This, construed with adverse legislation, has caused a great shifting of cotton mills southwards, and has made Alabama, Georgia, and the Carolinas the storm center of the child labor evil today. For while these little slaves of toil are found in glass factories, in coal mines, in cigar and tobacco manufactories, in canneries, in sweat shops, and other trades, yet from the beginning, the cotton textile industry has maintained its bad eminence for longer hours, lower wages, and more extensive exploitation of little children, than any other manufacturing trade. It has been called the Herod among industries, because more than any other it has sought the young child's life; not by conscious cruelty, but by perpetuating a system which undermines the health, thwarts the education, and crushes out the ideals which are the inalienable rights of every child.

Convention in Louisville.

All of these familiar evils and anachronisms of our twentieth century civilization were brought anew into the searchlight by the recent Eighth Annual Conference of the National Child Labor Committee in Louisville, Ky. Most of the sessions were held in the beautiful new First Christian Church. There were representatives from twenty-two states, and people of national prominence in attendance; it was a privilege to look into the faces and hear the voices of leaders in the movement like Dr. Felix Adler, Owen R. Lovejoy, A. T. McKelway, Samuel McCune Lindsay, Miss Florence Kelley, Miss Jean Gordon, and others. The Hon. P. P. Claxton, National commissioner of education, Senator William E. Borah and Congressman A. T. Peters, spoke on different phases of this complex and far-reaching problem. At times, we might have thought ourselves back in the suffrage convention held in Louisville last fall, for no opportunity was let slip to point out the help women would give toward regulating the labor of children, if they were allowed to vote. A delegate from Colorado, where women have full suffrage, declared that Colorado had no child labor problem—that it had been legislated out of existence!

Uniform Law Needed.

Indeed, the burden of most of the arguments was the need of added and effective legislation for the control and ultimate abolition of child labor.

One great legislative need that was urged was for a uniform child labor law for the entire United States. If one state attempts to fix the age of employment at sixteen, and an adjoining state allows the labor of children of ten or twelve years, the manufacturers of the first state will be up in arms against it because of the ruinous competition to their business. The National Committee has drafted a law forbidding the employment of children under fourteen years of age during the session of the public schools, and of children of sixteen and eighteen in the more dangerous and exposed industries, and hope for its passoge in the near future.

Children's Bureau.

Senator Borah and Representative Peters came especially to the conference to plead for help in the passage of the Children's Bureau Bill, which was then pending before both houses of congress. They said that questions relating to child welfare had to be decided on a lack of information which was deplorable. The Census Bureau gave some few statistics concerning infant mortality, orphanages, juvenile courts, the desertion of children and their employment in dangerous occupations, but the need had long been felt for a bureau devoted exclusively to gathering facts about children. A bill providing for the creation of such a bureau has been introduced in the last three preceding congresses, and had been favorably reported by committees to both houses every time; while in the last congress it passed the senate and was on the House calendar but was not reached. The bill asked for a small appropriation, and the amounts were given that were expended annually by the United States in the investigation of plant diseases, cotton and tobacco culture, animal husbandry and the like. It was stated that the appropriation asked for the Children's Bureau was only one-eighth of what is expended by the government in the study of trees!

Write Your Representative!

It goes without saying that the conference endorsed this bill in a series of ringing resolutions. The delegates had hardly reached their homes before the Children's Bureau Bill passed the United States senate by a vote of 54 to 20; it had been favorably reported by the House committee, by unanimous vote, and is now on the calendar. This is exactly where it was when last year's congress adjourned. Will not every one who has the interests of children on his heart do everything in his power to prevent its being again crowded out of the order of business of the House of Representatives?

It is known as the Peters Bill, for the establishment of a Children's Bureau in the Department of Commerce and Labor. Any one who intends to write or telegraph to his representative should do it now.

They Want to Vote

San Francisco was the stronghold of opposition to equal suffrage in California. It was asserted in all keys and tones that women did not want to vote, and would not vote even if the privilege were thrust upon them. Registration for the coming primaries has just opened, and, as a new list is to be made, men as well as women have to register if they wish to vote. And now the San Francisco papers are commenting upon the fact that on the first day of registration three times as many women as men recorded their names.

Los Angeles to Have Municipal Laundries

Woman's love of cleanliness is proverbial. The news that the women of Los Angeles had been enfranchised and had cast a big vote is quickly followed by the announcement that that city is going to add to its facilities for keeping clean. Arrangements have already been made for municipal baths and municipal laundries. The public bathing establishments, the dispatches say, are to be four in number, and will be built in "those sections of the city where a great majority of the population cannot afford such a luxury as a bath as often as necessary. In each of these buildings there will be a fully-equipped free laundry, in order that the bathers may wash their clothes and dry them before leaving the municipal bath-house.

The principle of municipal wash-houses might well be carried further. Jane Addams has pointed out that in many foreign countries washing day is thoroughly enjoyed by the women, because they takes the clothes down to the river, and wash them together, laughing and chatting as they do it. When they come to this country, each woman does her washing alone, in a cramped room which the steam and suds make uncomfortable for her and her family, and wash-day becomes a time of dread. Miss Addams advocates municipal wash-houses as a relief for these poor women.

Legislation has put some restrictions upon the employment of women in factories for a few weeks before and after their confinement, but bending over a wash-tub is particularly bad for a prospective mother, and if she is poor, she generally has to keep on doing it for her family up to the time of childbirth, and as soon after as she can stand. In a municipal laundry she would have the use of the most improved modern machinery, and could do it with much more ease.

Among the men who have recently undertaken work in the Fifth District are the following: H. V. Davis, Old Berlin, George W. Wise, Lincoln, and Mr. Peters, Pleasant Plains.

In the revival meeting at Edwardsville, being conducted by Evangelist F. F. Walters, there are serious obstacles to success, yet the report shows that during the meetings so far the attendance has been excellent.

Centennial church, Bloomington, concluded its meeting under the leadership of Evangelist Herbert Yeuell with over eighty additions. Mr. Yeuell gave his Ben Hur Pictorial Drama, the lecture which the Britt Lyceum Bureau of Lincoln, Nebraska, is booking for fourteen weeks' engagement next season.

The religious campaign at Newman is continuing into the fifth week under the leadership of S. S. Jones of Danville, assisting the pastor, H. J. Hostetler. The interest and kindly feeling of the entire community is noteworthy. Thus far there have been twenty-two additions.

W. W. Denham, by an unanimous action of the congregation at Carthage, has been asked to remain with the church for the coming year. During his ministry, the past four years, the work of the church has been carried on most successfully, and the work of the coming year begins auspiciously.

During the first week of the meeting conducted by Hattress H. Shick and wife at Lewistown, five were added by letter. On Sunday evenings every available space is taken, notwithstanding the fact that meetings are being held at two other places in the town. Lewistown church has extended an unanimous call to J. Cross of Burlington, Ia.

Evangelist Herbert Yeuell is entering upon a six months' evangelistic campaign in Canada. He goes first to London, Ontario, where he will conduct a union meeting, to be held in a large Congregational church. Engagements have been made for evangelistic meetings at Guelph, Bowmanville, Toronto, Grand Valley, St. John, New Brunswick, and Victoria, British Columbia. Mr. Yeuell will also deliver the principal address at the Canadian Disciples Convention at Toronto in June. Immediately upon his return from this tour, Mr. Yeuell will go to Winona Lake, Indiana, to meet Dr. Biederwolf and eight other members of the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists, in several days' conference upon the vital problems of evangelism.

The pastor at Beardstown, G. W. Morton, is having a series of special services on Sunday evenings, in which the opportunities of the various professions are being presented, and interspersed with these are discussions of related subjects: The Minister, The Teacher, The Great Teacher, The Business Man, A Wise Investment, The Lawyer, A Foolish Lawyer, The Housekeeper, A Happy Housekeeper, The Physician, Luke, the Physician, The Labor Union Man, A Desirable Union, The Journalist, The Writings of Jesus. Mr. Morton is drawing on the professional people of the community to assist in the services, and each profession is being represented by an individual of that particular class.

First church, Bloomington, is planning to celebrate its seventy-fifth anniversary in April. Miss Grace Emerson, who for some time has been one of the most active members of the church, has been employed for a period of four months to assist the pastor in preparing for this event. According to the outline of the anniversary services now being planned, there will be three weeks of celebration, designated respectively as Fellowship Week, Anniversary Week, and Decision Week. Sunday evening, April 17, is set for the beginning of the celebration. During Fellowship Week it is planned to have a speaker every evening, who will represent the various denominations and set forth to the world the contribution of each. Some of the most prominent ministers of the Disciples will speak during the anniversary celebration, and during Decision Week the pastor, Edgar D. Jones, will preach every evening.

Monday evening, Feb. 12, Miss S. E. Olive, minister of the Christian Church, of Findlay, Ill., was regularly ordained to the Christian ministry. The service was conducted by H. H. Peters of Eureka College. J. O. Henry, a member of the Findlay congregation, who has preached th Gospel for sixty years, delivered the ordination prayer. He has known Miss Olive all her life, having been pastor of the New Douglas Church in her infancy. Miss Olive became pastor of the church in Findlay Jan. 1, and the outlook is fine for her work. She attended Eureka College five years, and is prepared to do very effective service. The service was very impressive, all the officers of the church taking part. The Findlay church is a "live wire." It was organized Nov. 4, 1906, by Harold E. Monser, of Champaign, with forty-two charter members. Mr. Monser followed the organization of the church with a revival meeting, and added forty-six others. A new $6,000 brick church was dedicated by L. L. Carpenter Jan. 24, 1909. The congregation now numbers about 200, and is active and aggressive. The Sunday-school is one of the special features of the work. Mr. and Mrs. Terry, who moved to Shelbyville some three years before there was a Christian Church in Findlay, was instrumental in starting the church. Much credit is due Mrs. Terry for her untiring personal work before the church was organized. It is rather significant that an auxiliary to the C. W. B. M. was organized almost a year and a half before the church. Mr. Peters lectured on Tuesday evening following the ordination service, on "The Song of the Dawn."

J. M. Rudy at Springfield

J. M. Rudy of Greencastle, Ind., has just closed a meeting with us at the West Side Christian Church. The severe weather was a great drawback to the progress of the meeting, but even with only about four good nights there was a fair hearing. The church was greatly helped by Brother Rudy's strong preaching. He is a close Bible student and preaches strong sermons. He appeals to the mind and the heart of men, and believes that they should act as free agents in making the decision. He does not have a single questionable method, and he does nothing for which one feels ashamed after he is gone. He does not do or say things for which one must apologize.

More of our people pray and read their Bible now than before and all who heard him love the church better. Brother Rudy approaches very closely to the ideal evangelist. He helps the pastor solve his problems, and does not leave him with added problems after the meeting is over. He is content to preach the gospel and serve the church and build it up, and not use the church to build him up and make a reputation for him at the expense of the church. He is a man who is greatly needed in the evangelistic field.

Christian Conservation Congress

The Christian Conservation Congress and the Men and Religion Forward Movement, the various National Brotherhoods, the International Sunday-school Association, the Y. M. C. A., the Gideon and other participating organizations, will be held in New York City April 19 to 24. The sessions will be held in Carnegie Hall.

At this congress, a summary of the Men and Religion surveys of seventy-five of the chiefest cities of America, will be presented. Various committees appointed to study this survey and bring before the congress, certain vital recommendations regarding future relation of the church to humanity, will here be presented and discussed. To America this will be a second Edinburgh conference. The leaders of thought and action in the various communions will be in attendance in large numbers. The delegates will be selected from among the participating organizations and from the convention cities, although the attendance is not restricted to delegates, seats on the floor may be secured by a payment of the registration fee of $5.00, which is to defray the expense of the congress.

Our people should have a liberal representation. The leaders of our various National and State Missionary Societies and hundreds of our ministers and laymen should take advantage of this opportunity to obtain knowledge and inspiration that will be of inestimable value in the work of the local church. Brotherhood presidents, officers and members should be in attendance.

Arrangements have been made with the Hotel York, at 36th Street and Seventh Avenue, as the headquarters for our people, and it is hoped that a large number will avail themselves of the opportunity for fellowship while in attendance at the congress. Reservations may be made by writing to the Manager, Hotel York, New York City.

Benevolent Association News

Two fine annuities have recently been received by the association. One of them is from an old annuitant who has formed the habit of making regular contributions to the association on the annuity plan, because she believes that this is the best way by which she can save her money and at the same time give it to the Lord. The other comes from a new annuitant, but one who says he has been anxiously waiting until he should have a fund sufficient to warrant him in taking out an annuity bond.

A will has just been filed with the association in which a number of the general societies of the church are mentioned for goodly sums. Under the terms of this will the National Benevolent Association will come into possession of the largest single contribution ever made to its work. The testator of this will has long been a friend of Christ and humanity. She proposes to make both her heir. This is an example worthy of imitation.

The association has just issued a very attractive cantata. The fact that it was prepared by J. H. Rosecrans is a guarantee that the work has been well done. The printer has done his part well. This cantata will be sent free to churches, Sunday-schools and endeavor societies wishing to give an entertainment in the interest of the association's work.

Samuel J. McFarland, of Dallas, Texas, who has served as president of the board of managers of the Juliette Fowler Home with such conspicuous success for the last two or three years, has resigned, and Mr. W. A. Wyatt has been elected to succeed him. Mr. Wyatt is Bradstreet's representative, and is a thoroughly experienced business man. He is deeply interested in the work of the Juliette Fowler Orphans' Home. Mr. McFarland will remain on the board.

The association has under its care at the present time about 450 children and sixty-five aged, indigent Disciples of Christ.

The friends of the association will please note that Mrs. T. R., or Mrs. Fannie H. S. Ayars is no longer connected in any way with the National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church. The Christian Woman's National Benevolent Association, an organization for which she is soliciting funds, and which in a letter recently sent out bearing her signature she called "Our National Benevolent Association," is not The National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church. All funds intended for the benefit of the eleven institutions of The National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church should be sent to the address of that association, 2955 N. Euclid Ave., St. Louis.

Let Something Good Be Said

When over the fair name of friend or foe
The shadow of disgrace shall fall, instead
Of words of blame, or proof of thus and so,
Let something good be said.

Forget not that no fellow being yet
May fall so low but love may lift his head;
Even the cheek of shame with tears is wet.
If something good be said.

No generous heart may vainly turn aside
In ways of sympathy; no soul so dead
But may awaken strong and glorified,
If something good be said.

And so I charge ye, by the thorny crown,
And by the cross on which the Saviour bled,
And by your own soul's hope of fair renown,
Let something good be said.

—James Whitcomb Riley.

Yale University, the American Geographical Society and the American Museum of Natural History will back a polar expedition to explore Crockerland, which Rear Admiral Peary saw across the ice from Grantland in 1906. George Borup and Donald B. MacMillan, who were with Peary in his last expedition, will lead the explorers. They will leave Sydney, Nova Scotia, about July 20. In February, 1913, the dash across the ice to Crockerland will begin. They expect to return to New York in the autumn of 1914. The cost of the expedition will be $50,000.

The S. L. W. Ranch church, ten miles west of Greeley, Colo., J. E. Lynn, pastor, has purchased a fine property for a parsonage. It is located at Gill, a small town not far from church. It is by far the best property in the town. Mr. Lynn has just closed a very successful meeting at the Ranch church.

An entire family of St. Louisans has been appointed by the Christain Woman's Board to missionary work on the island of Jamaica. Frank Beach, pastor of the Fourth Christian Church of St. Louis, will look after the spiritual welfare of the churches. His wife has been appointed domestic science instructor and his 13-year-old daughter will teach music.

On Sunday, Feb. 11, the First Christian Church, of Gill, Colo., was organized. J. E. Lynn is the pastor, and has been preaching there for some months past. There is no other church in the town. Mr. Lynn is developing the field at two other new towns along the Union Pacific R. R., where there are at present no churches. The policy followed is that of developing a chain of churches of the same faith so that they can always cooperate with each other in sustaining a regular pastor.

There were 105 men who sat down to a banquet given by the Brotherhood of the Ann Arbor, Mich., church on Lincoln's birthday.

Walter P. Jennings of Amarillo, Tex., has received a call from the church at Palestine, Tex., where L. D. Anderson was minister for eight years.

Chelan, Wash., is enjoying a fine meeting with S. W. Jackson doing the preaching. There had been 147 additions at the last report. The church at Chelan desires to secure a pastor at once.

The members of the Brotherhood Class of First Church, Akron, O., recently passed some strong resolutions commending the mayor of the city for his brave stand for the enforcement of the law.

The dedicatory services conducted by I. J. Cahill at Brilliant, O., were marked with success. $1,500 was raised in cash and pledges and one addition was made to the church. They hope to locate a man to take Mr. Pallister's place very shortly.

The Philippine Christian reports the return of Dr. and Mrs. Pickett and children to their work in the Laoag station. The Christian says, "They are in good health and spirits to take up their great work."

There were 55 additions at Everett, Wash., during 1911. $321.73 of the $2,956.87 raised was for missions and benevolences. O. H. King, the minister, is a loyal believer in "cast thy bread upon the waters."

The missionary rally and ministerial meeting at the Fifth Ave. Church, Grand Rapids, Mich., was a success in both departments. Plans were completed for the third district convention to be held at Ballards, March 12 and 13.

The eight day campaign of the Men and Religion Forward Movement will be held in Lincoln, Neb., the last week of March. Experts along all lines of church activity will be in attendance to lead the religious forces of this community to real visions of efficiency.

J. Randall Farris has resigned the work at Bristol, Tenn., where he has had a successful pastorate for some years. Mr. Farris will make his headquarters in Birmingham, Ala., and will give his attention to the organizing work of the Sunday-schools. He was pastor at South Bend, Ind., a few years ago.

The Disciples in St. Louis have recently held their first district convention. Dr. Garrison addressed the meeting on the history of the Christian church in St. Louis. The experience of Chicago Disciples in the city mission coöperation with its quarterly convention leads us to expect and prophesy much good from the St. Louis beginning.

P. J. Rice is in a "double up" campaign in the Sunday-school, El Paso, Tex. There were 247 present on Feb. 11 and the interest is growing. There were five additions to the church during January. The Men's Bible Class recently entertained the classes of all the churches in the city.

The East Akron, O., Christian Church hopes to be able to dedicate its new building the first of April. It will be an admirable work-shop when completed. The church deserves great credit for its enterprise and pluck in financing and erecting such an edifice in which to carry on the work of the Lord. It will cost $35,000.

Buchanan, Mich., has for some time enjoyed the services of S. C. Brock as supply. They are now in the market for a regular minister. Here is a good church composed of good people, willing to do all they can to support the work. They offer $15 per week as a starter.

The churches in Warren, O., reported over 100 additions each after the union meeting held by Evangelist Lyons. The Second Church, on the West Side, talks seriously of enlarging its building. This church started as a mission about four years ago and has had a phenomenal growth. Its membership is large and enthusiastic.

J. F. Findley assumed the pastorate of the Monte Vista, Colo., church on Jan. 1, and is gratified at the progress that is evident in all departments. The Sunday-school has become a front rank one and there is a large teachers' meeting. Mr. Findley has been appointed chaplain of the Soldiers' Home and conducts services there each Sunday afternoon.

P. J. Rice visited the Living Link Mission of the El Paso, Tex., church, at Alamogordo, N. Mex., the early part of last week and assisted F. F. Grim one night in the meeting he is holding there. A plan was inaugurated to pay off all the balance of the debt save the $1,000 to the Church Extension Society, and to secure a young man to serve as pastor. The outlook is hopeful.

The student volunteer convention of the different colleges and Normal schools of Nebraska was held in Bethany last Friday, Saturday and Sunday. It was a great convention. Mr. Schwartz, one of the national secretaries of the Y. M. C. A., pronounced it the best convention he had attended this year. During the convention eight young men and women definitely decided to go to the foreign field.

The offerings from the Sunday-schools for the Moninger Memorial Fund continue to come in, likewise many pledges that the offerings will be taken later. At the end of the third week Mr. Hopkins reports 360 schools sending in $2,942.57. The larger schools are beginning to send in their offerings, and it is hoped that within a few months the full amount, $25,000, will be raised.

True Economy

The difference in cost between an alum baking powder and the highest-class cream of tartar baking powder would not amount for a family's supply to one dollar a year.

Dr. Price's is the standard cream of tartar baking powder. It makes the food delicious and healthful.

NOTE.—You cannot, if you value good health, afford to use cheap, low-grade, alum baking powders. They are apt to spoil the food; they do endanger the health. All physicians will tell you that alum in food is deleterious.

Ernest L. Hand, late minister at Cortland, O., was found dead in bed on Feb. 16. His death was due to heart failure. The summons came at the time that he was busily engaged in packing his household effects preparatory to shipping to Leipsic, O., where he was to begin his pastorate March 1. The funeral was held at his old boyhood home, Edon, O., Feb. 19, conducted by S. B. Braden.

J. C. Ogden of Batang, Tibet, is in Los Angeles, where he will remain for a month or so longer, resting and recuperating before making some visits among the churches. The First Church of Los Angeles has pledged to raise $2,600 for a house for Mr. Ogden. They expect to raise the balance of the fund on the first Sunday in March.

The church at Warren, O., where F. N. Calvin is pastor, is planning to take up the book on missions by S. J. Corey, "Ten Lessons in World Conquest," and discuss it in their monthly meeting. There is no better book of the sort prepared than this one. It meets the needs of churches and study classes and we should like to see it get the recognition it deserves. Many other churches could profitably follow the example of the Warren church.

W. J. Wright began a series of meetings with the Centenary Church, Indianapolis, Ind., on Sunday, Feb. 25. The first day was devoted to a dedicatory service to which all the other churches in the city were invited.

Harold Bell Wright recently sent a check for $500 to the authorities of Hiram College to be applied to the Y. M. C. A. building fund. Mr. Wright's great success in the literary field has not made him, in any sense, forget his alma mater.

The subject for the prayer-meeting recently at the Central Church, New York City, was "What to Do with the Second Service." The problem of the evening service is pressing on the pastors more and more as competition of the cheap shows increases and other distractions multiply. But there are churches in the smaller towns which have equal difficulty and the causes are to be sought in more than one direction.

The Union Church—Baptists and Disciples—of Keuka Park, N. Y., has just had a fine two weeks' meeting in which President Joseph A. Serena did the preaching and Professor Henry E. Mozealous led the singing. The attendance and interest were fine throughout the series and there were fifteen added to the church as a direct result. President Serena was called to the pastorate of the church January 1 and has assumed this together with his other duties in the college.

Professor W. D. MacClintock of the department of English in the University of Chicago and one of the elders of the Hyde Park Church, has been appointed lecturer to the teachers in the Philippines. This is the second time that Prof. MacClintock has been asked by the United States Government to deliver lectures to the assembly. He will spend his summer in Japan and continue on around the world, going by way of Russia. He leaves about the middle of March.

George L. Snively writes as follows: Last Lord's day I dedicated the new $18,000 Madisonville Church, Cincinnati. We needed $9,000 to complete payment but secured $10,500 in cash and pledges. Russell Errett and family have membership in this church, and it is largely due their unstinted generosity the building enterprise was undertaken and so successfully completed. Editor Lappin, Mr. and Mrs. Wetzel of Covington, Ky., and several Cincinnati preachers greatly assisted in dedication services.

Elster M. Haile published recently in the Christian Messenger some figures concerning the growth and present strength of the Disciples that are interesting. While the showing does not call for despair, the facts are not at all elating. In particular, the condition in the cities is a challenge. Only 11.5 per cent of the population in Chicago are in Protestant churches and yet Chicago is third among the cities in the rate of growth of the Disciples, being exceeded only by Pittsburgh and Los Angeles.

J. M. Lowe writes of the great day of the dedication of the church at Escondido, Cal., on Feb. 11. F. M. Dowling was the speaker of the occasion and proved to be in every way equal to the task of raising the $2,000 needed. The pastor, Mr. McReynolds, has been sick for several months, but was able to be present on that day. The meeting is starting off well. E. E. Lowe, brother of the evangelist, is doing the singing and has also been supplying during the temporary incapacity of the pastor. Mr. Lowe's next meeting will be at Santa Anna, where Paul E. Wright is pastor, with whom the evangelist has already held two meetings.

The mayor of Canton, O., was opposed to the coming of Billy Sunday before the evangelist arrived in the city, but he has recently sent a letter to Mr. Sunday together with a wreath of roses and a check for $100 as a personal tribute to the work for the good of the city. He says that the city government will follow the trail that the evangelist has opened if the pastors will just keep the road clear. That is certainly a remarkable instance of the power of the evangelist to win the admiration and allegiance of men.

Russell F. Thrapp writes interestingly of his joy in his work with First Church, Los Angeles, Cal. There have been 54 additions during the first eight weeks of the new pastorate and everything prosperous. A. C. Smither, who was pastor for 21 years and who prepared for the coming of the new pastor very thoroughly, preached recently for the church and was greeted with a large audience. Russell E. Booker is the assistant pastor and is of great assistance in the work of the church. Mr. Booker was formerly with I. J. Spencer in Lexington, Ky. Mr. Thrapp would like the names of people who are coming to Los Angeles for permanent residence as it would assist him to align them for Christian service. People are coming by his thousands to that land.

In a report submitted on leaving Gary, Ind., Nelson Hastings Trimble and Martha Stout Trimble, the ministers, give some interesting facts about the work in that center. It seems that the steel company made it as difficult as possible for the churches to secure locations in the place and no encouragement was received from that source at all. The Tolleston Church was put up on Saturday afternoon and the Glen Park Church was erected, both of which were due to the coöperation of the various labor unions in the building trades. These two churches are valued now at $5,000, with a combined debt of $700, while Central Church is valued at $15,000 with a debt of $6,500 and a revenue of $720 a year from flats in the third floor. This means that a total of $20,000 has been secured for property in twenty months. The heroic work should receive the admiration of all who are in sympathy with earnest, devoted, sacrificing service.

W. M. Long has accomplished a most excellent work in Clarksburg, W. Va. He went there five years ago, held a short meeting and organized a congregation. It was pioneer work in as busy a little city as can be found in the East, with Mammonism and Pleasure all but supreme. The campaign resulted in a fine property worth $50,000, including an excellent parsonage, and but little indebtedness. Recently R. W. Abberley assisted there in his second series of meetings and the third with Mr. Long. The campaign resulted in sixty persons added to the church, forty by confession and baptism. An interesting incident was the baptizing of three generations in one family of good old Scotch and English nativity. Another pleasing feature was that the meeting left over $100 in the treasury above all expenses, and the pastor's salary was raised $200 a year. Church and preacher were left happy in service and the evangelist invited for a third campaign at a future date. Frank McDonald rendered most efficient help as soloist and song leader.

A new thing is reported in the home mission field. Representatives of twenty-two home mission boards have completed a preliminary survey of neglected fields in the Northwest, covering thirteen states from Nebraska and Minnesota to the Pacific. A deputation consisting of the secretaries of the Baptist, Congregational, Methodist and Presbyterian Home Boards, and I. N. McCash of the American Christian Missionary Society, traveled the territory together, holding consultations in fifteen centers, each representative also doing secretarial work for his own people. Dr. McCash says: "This survey is the first attempt to apply scientific methods to practical religious labors in American missions. Instead of taking isolated cases upon which to base an appeal, the needs of the whole territory are put before contributors. It is an advanced step in a united effort on the part of Protestant leaders, and is the vanguard of that unity of God's people to be made visible to the unspiritual.."

Walter Scott Priest sends us the following fully corrected report of his year's work at Wichita, Kan. We have already printed a partial report, but are glad to have this more accurate statement: Sermons and addresses, 104; additions by confession and baptism, 79; by letter and statement, 97; total, 176. Losses: By death, 11; by letter, 45; by withdrawal, 4; total, 60; net gain, 116. Weddings, 51; funerals, 36. Money raised in all departments, $8,070.08. On account of dry weather and hot winds in southern Kansas last year, the failure of crops and the consequent hard times, this is about $2,000 less than we raised last year; but we did not call in one of our Living Link missionaries. We have three on the foreign field and one on the home field, raising for their support and all benevolences and educational enterprises, $4,162.53, thus spending as much, or more for others than for ourselves. Four months of our third year with this great church have gone and in that time 270 people have been received into fellowship, of whom 140 have been baptized.

Herbert Yeuell in Bloomington

The Centennial church is the third church built by J. H. Gilliland in Bloomington, and is only a little over two years old. It is located in a strictly residence district more than a mile from any other church, surrounded by a class of cultured well-to-do people who are nearly all identified at least nominally with some church. The membership of Centennial was only one hundred and fifty, but the audiences who heard Herbert Yeuell numbered several hundred every night. Thus there were always a large number of people among his hearers who were members of the various churches. Their loyalty and interest in the meetings was scarcely less than that of the members of Centennial. With such an audience Mr. Yeuell was absolutely loyal to the Book, and truly representative of our great plea throughout, so that while a large number of the additions came from the various churches represented, we still enjoy the freest and fullest fellowship of our denominational neighbors.

Among the four score persons who came forward there were Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Catholics.

I have been trying for four weeks to classify Yeuell as a preacher. I can only say he is great. He is in a class by himself. There is a purity of diction and rhetorical finish about his sermons that suggests the pulpit orator, but before you get him placed in that class he has gripped you with the force of his prophetic vision and swept you on by his impassioned appeals until you feel the presence of Calvary and you forget the preacher.

The Centennial Church is fortunate in having as regular soloist and chorus director L. B. Conrad, who has had wide experience as evangelistic singer. His work in the meeting was a most inspiring and enjoyable feature of the services. His strong commanding powers of leadership blend remarkably with a rich and sympathetic solo voice. We all love him and appreciate him not only for his excellent work, but for his splendid personality and Christian character.

MILO ATKINSON.

THE MARCH OFFERING

Make it Great

March 3 is another milestone in the ongoing of our people. It is sure to prove a historic occasion. On that day our churches take their offering for the evangelization of the world.

Taking the March offering is the expression of the interest of our people in preaching the gospel to the whole creation. Let it be the crowning service in the present campaign.

This can be made one of the most delightful and altogether stimulating services of the whole year. Many churches look forward to it in the most joyous expectancy.

Our missionaries were never so tried as just now. War, and pestilence, and famine, and broken health, and even death, and separated families, have all combined in one of the very severest of tests. But not one word of complaint comes from those doing service. They only ask the churches in the home-land to enter more fully in the fellowship of real daring that has thrilled and enriched their own lives.

The service on March 3 should have life and unction. It should be launched upon a high spiritual plane, of course, but entirely free from stiffness and mere formalism. We are sure the churches will make it a great spiritual event.

It is time to plan large things. We are a rich people and growing in wealth daily. We are in danger of being overwhelmed by the unparalleled material prosperity of the whole country. Every member should be asked to give something. There should be no exception. Let the poor give out of their penury. Ask the well-to-do and the rich to give up to their abundance. If some should give $10,000, it would not be too much. We should put God to the test. Ask for $500 gifts and $100 gifts. Aim to make the average offering of your church at least $1 per capita, and even then we would not come up to what many religious people are doing. Let us rejoice together in a common fellowship of liberality. This is no time for excuses. This is no time to pull back. We have put our hand to the missionary plow in the heathen fields and we must not look back. We have too much at stake. The most loyal disciples to be found anywhere on the globe are those on the mission field. The liberality of March 3 should be gauged and measured by the Cross. This is the final and supreme test.

Remember the eyes of the world are upon us. Not only so, but God is standing over against the treasury. Every missionary and every evangelist throughout the world-field, numbering nearly 1,000, are anxious about this day and its final results. Our plea is on trial. The world is wondering what we mean by the expression, "Where the Bible speaks we speak." Let us with one united step, with oneness of purpose, with oneness of heart, demonstrate to the world that we are at work restoring the Apostolic church in teaching and real practice

Please send your offering promptly Monday morning, March 4. If the offering is not all ready, send on what you have and the balance later when pledges have been paid. Be careful to give the local name of the church when different from the post-office.

Please send to F. M. Rains, secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio, who will at once return a proper receipt.

Glorious Times in China

These are glorious times to be in China. It was pretty hard to stay in Shanghai when Nankin was in danger. If we could have only stayed with our people! The few men who did stay had such wonderful opportunities for service. I believe that in a month's time more was accomplished by the faith and bravery of those few than we, or many of us, accomplish by years of preaching. It is wonderful to hear from the lips of the people about the "life savers," as they call Dr. Macklin and Frank Garrett. Religion has been made tremendously real to a lot of people.

My faithful woman, Chen Sao-Dz, stayed with the work here and her testimony I am sure must bear fruit. So many of our Christian women are young in the faith and it was a testing time for Chen Sao-Dz. During the siege these younger Christians and outsiders said to her, "Why, you eat and sleep and sew and make shoes just as if nothing were wrong and veryone is fleeing from the city. Why don't you go to Shanghai with Miss Raw?" Chen Sao-Dz would answer, "The Lord has not gone yet, has he? I am safe as long as he is here." I very much wanted her to go with me, but she would not.

I miss Miss Kelly greatly, but I have learned to live alone when I must, and forget how far it is to the next white man's

The Best

The Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 are in The Life of Christ. You want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition has just been issued to meet the great demand. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

house. There are new problems constantly arising, but with it all is a great contentment that I am in the place of my appointment and that God is using or over-ruling even some of my mistakes.

News From the Foreign Society

Fred E. Hagin, Tokyo, Japan, says, "Our work is growing and we are dreadfully cramped on the present monthly allowances. My house will be done in May."

Dr. C. L. Pickett, Laoag, Philippine Islands, reports 1,243 treatments in the hospital for the month of December, and the number of conversions for the month was 13. He also says that during the month he purchased property for the great new hospital and has made a payment of $500. "All in all," he says, "the work is very hopeful and encouraging, but there are a good many knotty places that require the exercise of care and patience. We are praying that the churches may not fail in the March offering."

Leslie Wolfe writes from Manila, under date of January 20, stating that they have had 56 baptisms in the city of Manila alone during the first 20 days of January. This is a true apostolic report. Our people have done a marvelous work in the great city of Manila, which is an exceedingly important city in the far East.

W. R. Hunt, missionary of the Foreign Society, telegraphed from Chuchow to the Bible Society in China and secured a gift of 5,000 copies of the Scriptures to be presented to the soldiers of the Republican armies in the campus north of Chuchow. The soldiers received them with deepest appreciation.

Our great Chinese evangelist, Brother Shi, will go to Nantungchow, China, and have charge of the evangelistic work during the absence of Mr. and Mrs. Johnson.

The splendid new Tisdale Memorial Chapel in Chuchow, which is known there as the Central Christian Church, will be opened on March 1. The annual Chinese convention will be held after the opening ceremonies and it will be followed by special revival evangelistic services. The whole city seems very much interested in the new building, which is airy, spacious and substantial. It will be remembered that O. G. Hertzog of Hiram, Ohio, helped in its construction. W. R. Hunt will preach there regularly and the increased membership will be added to and trained in the evangelistic work right along.

Never was there a time in the history of the world when a more positive and constructive and workmanlike organization and administration was expected and demanded of Christian missions in Asia. The immediate and effective evangelization of China, Japan and India is the only sound, safe and sane policy. It is the supreme imperative. Whatever the future has in store for China, one thing is certain, that the new China has its face toward the morning; China will never return to her former state of isolation and conservatism.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first twenty-one days of February amount to $12,007.07. This was a gain over the corresponding time last year of $8,227.02.

The impression has been made upon some that Guy W. Sarvis, a missionary of the Foreign Society in China, advocates the reception of the unimmersed into the church in that land. Nothing could be further from truth. This has never been his position either in America or in China. The Foreign Society would not stand for anything like this for a moment.

Dr. Wm. M. Hardy, missionary of the Foreign Society, writing to his father from Liu Ewai Kwan, China, under date of January 19, says, "At Nankin we met General Homer Lee, the American advisor to the president, and a number of the assembly men. They plan great things for China and I believe they will be able to carry out their plans. The most favorable sign is that 80 per cent of those now leading are Christians. They are praying, as well as working, for success."

F. H. Schmitt, Herrington, Kans., hopes to make that church a living-link when the new house of worship is dedicated.

Last week a friend sent $600 for the support of a missionary in China. We are hoping to have a number of such personal friends during the month of March.

Last week the Foreign Society received $1,000 direct gift from a friend in Ohio for the work in China. A few more personal gifts like that will help mightily to increase the March offering.

"Our church board decided yesterday to raise $100 for foreign missions in the March offering, $50 in the Sunday-school in June, making $150 in 1912. And they decided to double the $150 next year, making $300 in 1913, and again doubling in 1914 and enter the living-link column."—C. H. Bass, Fairmont, W. Va.

Walter Scott Priest of the Central Church, Wichita, Kans., would be pleased to see his church raise $1,000 the first Sunday in March. Dr. Jaggard is the living-link of this great church.

Dr. C. C. Drummond of Bardo, India, writes, "We now have the largest school we have ever had. Our workers are better trained and I believe realize more and more the importance of the work."

Last week a consecrated woman on the Pacific Coast and her daughter combined their offerings and sent enough to support a living-link in the Foreign Society. These friends appreciate the present day open doors. We are trusting that large numbers of individuals will take this step during these March offering days.

David Livingstone was born March 19, 1813. The Missionary Education Movement suggests that an international centennial celebration of his birth be observed in March, 1913. This suggestion has been most cordially endorsed by the Conference of Missionary Boards of Canada and the United States. Each board takes steps to celebrate in the proper way and at the proper time the proposed centennial.

"There is a missionary preacher at the helm at ———— just now. We shall endeavor to double or treble our apportionment."————.

One of our church officers writes as follows: "We took the offering last year, but our church treasurer used the money for other purposes. We will see that you get it this year."

The church at Bozeman, Mont., J. E. Parker, pastor, enters the living-link column this year.

The churches in Birmingham, Ala., enter the living-link rank this year. The Central Church pays $400 and the others pay the rest. This is an increase over last year of about four fold. A. R. Moore and the other ministers of that city greatly rejoice over this advance step.

The Convict

he approached cautiously. Two men were sitting near a fire, their backs toward him, smoking. One was large; the other, small.

"Hello," said Pete. The two jumped to their feet with agility born of fear. The big man's hand grasped a billy, and the little man's hand felt for his gun. Then the big man laughed a big coarse laugh. "Blast me, ef 'tain't Pete Nevins! Out again an' lookin' fine. Just the man we need."

"Hello Pete," said the little man.

The big man's name was Bill. No one knew his last name; for years ago, someone in the underworld, who had seen better days and had read Dickens, dubbed him Bill Sykes; and the name stuck. Just why the name clung no one knew, but he certainly looked the part. The small man was named the Ferret, for he was a caricature of that animal—small, beady eyed, cunning, ruthless, and an adept in "chasing out the game."

Pete said, "Hello," and shook hands. They were old cronies before he "got sent over." Many a crime had they planned and several committed together.

Bill Sykes began, "Say bo, findin' you is sure lucky. We got everything ready and planned to crack a crib in town tonight. Red Rafferty was to jine us, but he must a got cold feet. You're on. Divvy equal. You an' Ferret touch off the soup an' gather in the Mazum'. I'll be outside an' do a strong arm if necessary. Got a gas wagon hid here to make the getaway with. With the haul we kin make tonight, we kin live on Joy Street some time, eh?"

Old thoughts flooded Pete's mind. The old excitement, the old lusts, the wanton desires of the old life—nearly, but not quite, obliterated—rose up and filled his mind. His eyes shone, nostrils dilated, frame stiffened.

Ding dong, ding dong, ding dong—floated over the atmosphere. It was the farm bell calling to dinner. There was once another man named Peter, who was living a changed life. He, too, had a rugged nature; but once, under the fire of temptation, the old Peter in him had reasserted itself. He cursed and denied his Lord. Millions of men since have done as Peter did. The same kind of temptation was in Peter Nevins' mind now. The old life with its passions, the old cronies, the wanton lusts were stiffling his will. On the other hand, the farm bell was calling him back to his new life.

Thus was the Eternal War going on between God and the devil.

The sad eyes of the Lord held Peter for a moment, but by continued temptation the old Peter gained control.

Thus the voice of the farm bell calling dinner was acting upon Peter Nevins, as the pleading eyes of the Lord might have acted upon the Peter of long ago.

Like two magnificent monsters of the jungle fighting over their prey, so the two Peters fought to gain control of the ex-convict's will. Bill Sykes was not a psychologist, but he knew that Pete was hesitating. So he produced his most potent argument. He shoved a whisky bottle under Pete's nose, "Here bo, take a swig o' this. It's good stuff." In Pete's present state, it was as incense to the gods. Deeply he drank. And like the Peter of long ago, he fell before temptation.

So that afternoon they talked it over; and when, about four o'clock, Pete returned home with the sheep, he was mildly scolded by Martha Harkness for not returning to dinner. He went about his work as usual, and no attention was given to his tardiness.

After supper little Bobbie climbed into his lap and administered a "bear hug." Then he commenced a story that his mother had been reading him.

"Mamma read me a story about a man named Peter today. Just think, his name was the same as yours; but he wasn't like you a bit. He was a quitter. You wouldn't be a quitter, would you? He was Jesus' friend and disciple, and, when Jesus got crucified and the folks said he was Jesus' friend, he swore and said he wasn't. Wasn't that awful? Yes sir, he just quit cold. I told mamma that I knew one Peter who wouldn't quit cold, but she said to wait and see about this Peter. Well, he came back, and was better than ever before, and died for Jesus afterwards. And she said as how a man that did wrong could come back and be better than ever, if he would. I told her that you wouldn't have to come back, because you would have stuck to him all the time."

Peter Nevins felt the hot blood in his face. Carefully he slid the boy off his lap, and quietly slipped off to bed.

The hours slipped by. At eleven o'clock, he carefully tip-toed out of the house and met Bill Sykes and the Ferret.

His heart was pounding as it never had before; his brain was in a turmoil; but, with each heart throb, with each whirl of his dizzied brain, he felt little Bobbie's words being branded over and over again into his mind, "I told her I knew one Peter who wouldn't quit cold. You wouldn't quit, would you?"

Mechanically, he walked into town with his two old cronies. Mechanically, he helped the Ferret jimmy a window, drill the safe, insert the nitro-glycerin, and light the fuse.

But the first sputter of the fuse aroused him to what he was doing. Quickly he drew it out, then caught the Ferret and took from him his revolver. Hoarsely he whispered, "I can't do it, and I can't let you. I begun an honest life five months ago; and, before God, I ain't goin' to be a quitter now."

The Ferret thought he was crazy. To him there was but one thing to do, take him to Bill Sykes who would quiet him one way or the other. Softly he whispered, "Let's go tell Bill then."

"Yes, let's do."

They found Bill carefully on watch. "What you doin' here? Everything's O. K. Git to it."

Then Peter found his voice. "Bill, I can't do it and I can't let you fellers. I thought I could, but I can't. Just before I got out, I made up my mind that I'd be honest. I ain't done a crooked thing yet; and what's more I ain't goin' to."

Bill Sykes breathed out "fire and slaughter." "No one ever double-crossed me and got away with it yet, and you ain't goin' to." He pulled a knife, but stopped short. He was looking into the muzzle of the gun Peter had taken from the Ferret, and Pete's hand was steady.

"I ain't goin' to snitch on you Bill Sykes, but you an' the Ferret has got to hit the pike an' hit it hard. Git! If you ever come back I will."

Peter had forgotten about the Ferret. He feared only Bill. The Ferret was a coward. But the Ferret? It was his motto:—"If it is a good thing for a man to go heeled, it's better to have two heels." Hence he always carried two guns.

True to his name, he sneaked behind, drew his second gun, and deliberately shot Pete in the back. Then he and Bill Sykes "hit the pike, and hit it hard."

The shot awoke the slumbering town watchman. Running toward the sound, he saw a man lying face downward. It was Peter Nevins.

"Hey thar, what's the matter?"

"Just got plugged, that's all. The safe in the bank is full of soup—nitroglycerin—robbers gone. An'—an' I guess I'm goin' too."

Tenderly, the men summoned by the watchman carried Pete to the doctor's office. Robert Harkness, Martha, and little Bob came as quickly as they could.

"Oh, Peter," wailed the little fellow, "You went and got shot!"

"Yes," said Peter, "but I didn't quite quit cold. I had my "come back" five months ago, an' I've stuck to him."

No one knew just what Pete meant by his words, until, just before he died, he told Robert Harkness the story.

Over in the "berryin' ground" where their little one lay, Robert and Martha buried Pete. The little white stone that marks the spot says:—

Peter Nevins
Born——— Died———
Quit you like men.

And around the base—A little child shall lead them.

The Divinity of Christ

By EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly without being technical.

It lifts the discussion of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogma and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

Bethany Graded Lessons

Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The Graded Lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' and Primary Departments are fully completed. Three of the four Junior grades are complete. Fourth year Junior pupils may use either third year Junior lessons or first year Intermediate. Two of the four Intermediate grades are complete, and these materials may be used for the entire Intermediate Department. For Senior and Adult Departments, Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus" is provided. Other Adult classes may use Dr. Strong's "The Gospel of the Kingdom."]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

EVERY LESSON WRITER IS A RECOGNIZED AUTHORITY IN THE INTERDENOMINATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL WORLD!

Demonstration of Christian Unity

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that co-operation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

SITA. By Olivia A. Baldwin, M. D. The missionary literature produced by the Disciples of Christ in recent years is a notable and increasing volume. It began with A. McLean's inspiring books on that subject, and has been continued by such works as Mrs. Rijnhart's thrilling recital, "With the Tibetans in Tent and Temple;" Mrs. Dye's "Bolenge;" Prof. Taylor's "The Social Work of Christian Missions," Mrs. Garst's "In the Shadow of the Drum Tower," and Dr. Loftis' "A Message from Batang." To this list another book is now added, though of a different sort, for Dr. Baldwin's "Sita" is a story, sufficiently interesting and important to merit early and consistent reading. Sita is a little girl who came to one of the mission stations of central India with her small brother as refugees in a time of famine. She belonged to the Rajput or noble caste, and had already been promised in marriage to the son of a neighbor. Owing to the misfortunes that fell upon her family she remained with the missionaries and became a Christian. Then came the efforts of her prospective husband and his family to compel her to carry out the conditions of the preliminary marriage. The recital is full of dramatic interest. The insight afforded into Indian customs is intimate and fascinating. The characters are well drawn and the climax of the story, in the scene at the trial before the commissioner, and the act of self-immolation that followed, retains the interest of the reader to the very end. Dr. Baldwin has poured into this volume her own experience in the mission field and a wide knowledge of Indian affairs. The characters in the story are life-like and convincing. Since this volume is so revealing in its picture of child marriage and its fetters one hopes that the author will provide us with a sequel, following the heroine through what must have been an eventful and perhaps tragic career. The book is a document of unusual missionary value as well as a story of sustained interest. [New York: Fleming H. Revell Co. Cloth. Pp. 353. $1.25 net.]

PROCEEDINGS OF THE BAPTIST CONGRESS. It is the custom of the executive committee of the Baptist Congress to publish the proceedings of that body in annual volumes. The last gathering was held at Atlantic City, Nov. 14-16, 1911, and was a joint Congress of the Baptists, Free Baptists and Disciples. The topics discussed were six in number, "In What Sense is Christ Divine?" "What are the Assured Results of Biblical Criticism?" "What Hinders the Union of Baptists and Disciples?" "Immersionists and Church Union," "Pauperism—Its Causes and Cure," and "The Mystical Element in Christianity—What Is It and What Is Its Value?" The volume makes a most interesting contribution to the current discussion of these important themes. The Disciples who contribute to the volumes are not as numerous as they should be. Several who accepted places upon the program neither attended nor sent their papers. Those who appear in this volume are Rev. Peter Ainslie D. D. on "The Union of Baptists and Disciples," Rev. L. E. Sellers on "Immersionists and Church Union," Rev. J. P. Lichtenberger, Ph. D., on "Pauperism," and Prof. H. L. Willett on "The Higher Criticism." [Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. Pp. 202. 60 cents, postpaid.]

THE LIFE AND WORK OF JACOB KENOLY. By C. C. Smith. The following letter was sent to the author by Dr. Tyler: Dear Brother Smith: "The Life and Work of Jacob Kenoly" is an unusually interesting book. Mrs. Tyler read it first. She was enthusiastic over it and said: "It is a fine book." There is harmony in our home on this, as on all other subjects. Jacob Kenoly was a remarkable man. In telling the story of his life you have measured up to the opportunity. Your work is well done. The spiritual impression produced by the reading of the book is excellent. I am a better man because I read "The Life and Work of Jacob Kenoly," by C. C. Smith. Mrs. Tyler said at the conclusion of her reading: "Jacob Kenoly had more of the spirit of Christ than any man I ever knew." The reading of your book is a means of grace. I will speak of and commend the book to the people of the South Broadway Church. Cordially and fraternally, B. B. Tyler.

THE COUNTRY CHURCH AND THE RURAL PROBLEM, by Kenyon L. Butterfield. This book is written by a man who is the president of an agricultural college and at the same time a Christian. He gathers together what he considers the elements of the rural problem in industry and social progress and then undertakes to relate the church and its minister to his program. The book does not undertake to suggest specific methods but to furnish incentive and point of view for the country minister to work out the problem in his own community. The book opens up in a most suggestive way the problem and its clear statement will help us on to further contributions toward the redemption of the rural district. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. Pp. 165. $1.08 postpaid.)

A Greater Enterprise

THE MOTTO, "The Evangelization of the Whole World in This Generation," has become familiar to most of those who are concerned with the missionary interests of today. It is perhaps less frequently heard than once, because second sober thought has recognized its naive ineptness. But one still hears it repeated in gatherings, particularly of young people, when missionary ideals are discussed.

* * *

This motto was coined by a few of the most devoted and successful young missionary enthusiasts of our generation. It was believed by them to point the way toward such an arousal of missionary passion as should actually send out to the foreign field a sufficient host of teachers and preachers to reach all the unevangelized lands within the present generation. That was a noble conception of Christian duty. Too long had the waiting lands been all but neglected. Christendom needed awakening to its larger duties. In a certain sense it was believed by Mr. Mott, Mr. Speer and some of their comrades that to a degree hitherto unattempted the world could be evangelized in this generation.

Since that time, however, it has become increasingly apparent that this watchword is entirely superficial and to a large degree misleading. It does not in any adequate degree express the tremendous volume of the task which actually confronts the church. Its authors have been at pains to explain the distinction which they make between the evangelization of the world and its Christianization. They have pointed the church to the fact that it is possible within a very short time to send representatives of the gospel message to all lands hitherto unreached, but they have hastened to add that this does not include the vastly greater task of the complete Christianization of these lands, which must take generations and centuries yet to come.

* * *

It is now apparent that in reality the business of missions has only just begun. It is a work so gigantic and far-reaching that for generations and centuries yet to come it must be the chief item in the prescribed vocation of the Christian society, precisely as it was the leading detail in the great commission of our Lord. It is a task so great and so inspiring that the soul of the intelligent Christian rises to it with the sheer joy of one to whom is committed a supremely worthy and exacting enterprise, in whose achievement no time can be lost and no effort spared.

* * *

The field of missions is the world, and though the world has become smaller through the ministries of steam and electricity, it has also become a much more baffling and widely extended world through the adventurous achievement of the explorer, the pioneer and the maker of empire. The little world of Jesus' day, so far as it was known to the cultivated men of the Roman empire, seems small and almost negligible in comparison with the vastness of those continents which have since come into the current of the world's life. The meaning of the great commisson has been enlarged by whole diameters since the days of the Man of Nazareth.

Then too the task of Christianizing the world is not one of simple and homogeneous sort. One cannot go out to the different levels of religious belief and social life with the same equipment in all cases. It is curious what superficial conceptions of missionary work still prevail in church circles. There are many people who embrace the entire non-Christian world in the sweeping and patronizing term "heathen," by which too frequently they appear to describe groups of naked savages on some south Pacific island as the representatives of the world which waits for the gospel. This is as grotesque a conception of the task as would be the affirmaton that the only subjects of public school instruction were the ragged and ignorant waifs of some crowded city ward. In point of fact the non-Christian peoples include some of the oldest and richest civilizations in the world, as well as the youngest and least resourceful, and it is to this complicated and exacting task that the missionary cause summons the church.

* * *

More than this, it must be remembered that Christianity undertakes to change some of the most deeply rooted and sincerely cherished beliefs and customs to be found in all human society. The western world changes its habits and its opinions with ease and celerity. Not so the Orient. Custom is law and tradition is compelling. It requires great tact and patience to make way against the cherished and immemorial habits of a conservative and sensitive people. Yet hundreds of such transformations have already been achieved with success, and thousands more await the patient and courageous yet tactful influence of missionry workers.

But when to these considerations there must be added the almost insurmountable obstacles of languages to be mastered to the point where the missionary commands the serious attention of the native, the confidence that must be won by long and sympathetic association, and the work that must be done many times over because of the imperfection of first efforts, as in translation, education, the acquisition of comradeship in social customs, the transformation of habitual methods of thought and the necessity of re-laying many times foundations which were supposed to be placed at sufficient depth and with sufficient stability, one can begin to realize how continental and magnificent is the work of Christian missions.

* * *

It demands the most consecrated effort, the most comthought and the necessity of re-laying many times that must continue through many generations, making its slow way by sympathy and love into the hearts of peoples otherwise suspicious and reserved, to whom the proofs of Christianity must come not in flashes of evangelistic fervor, but through generations of Christ-like living.

Social Survey

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

The Growth of Cities

The growth of cities is a social phenomenon of commanding importance. Chicago in 1850 had fifty thousand inhabitants. Today with her suburbs in Cook county, Chicago has a population of two and a half millions. There are only twelve states in the union that have a population equal to Chicago. It is possible to name eight western states that have a combined population less than Chicago. At the close of the revolutionary war there were only six cities in this country with a population of eight thousand or more. Only three per cent of the population was urban. At the present time forty per cent is urban. Some of the states now have as high as seventy-five per cent of their population urban.

The growth of cities is differently interpreted by different writers. Some would have us believe that the cities are created by forcing men off of the farms through improved methods in agriculture. This does not seem to be a very urgent motive just now with farmers getting rich everywhere and the demand for agricultural products continually growing. Other writers like Ferrero insist that this growth of urban population is a social disease brought on by the attractiveness of the city. He says this indifference to agriculture and desire to live in cities brought a reign of high prices to Rome and finally wrought the ruin and downfall of the empire.

The growth of cities is not simply a phenomenon of the United States. It is in progress over the entire civilized world wherever the improved methods of production have come. Even Constantinople has been growing, as well as certain cities in China. Throughout the world there has been the corresponding rise in prices of food stuffs. The city not only has threatening economic problems but human problems of every sort. We are none of us yet able to grasp the full significance to civilization of the birth of great cities like London, Paris, New York and Chicago.

Social Study in the Sunday-school

The growth of the adult movement in the Sunday-school has happily coincided with the invention of new ways of presenting biblical truth. No kind of Sunday-school lessons for men's classes has proved of more service than the lessons provided by Josiah Strong on "The Gospel of the Kingdom." The lessons come in lesson monthlies and for 1912 embrace a set of subjects of the very greatest importance. Since three months of the year is to be given to the interests of women, including a study of all the interests dear to "the new woman," the lessons will work equally well in mixed adult classes. We have many teachers of social truths but few of them combine so admirably as does Josiah Strong the strictly scientific method with the warmly human and religious spirit. The lessons have a biblical foundation continually and this biblical material is made to apply to modern life and conditions, in a way to set forth the Bible as a most modern book. The equipment for a teacher of an adult class is now greatly simplified.

In addition to the lessons, the teacher should have some good reference work from which to glean additional facts. There is no reference work in the field of sociology superior to Bliss' Encyclopedia of Social Reform. Bliss is by our side every week as we write these notes and we freely acknowledge our indebtedness to his careful and scientific gathering of facts. There are other books the teacher will want that are referrred to in the lessons but these can in many cases be secured at the public library. If you have a men's class that has to be gathered in by persistent organized effort or by spectacular devices, try giving them these interesting lessons and they will wake up and come with zest and interest every Sunday.

Our Foreign Society and Social Work

These lines will be read in the midst of the campaign for the March offering for the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. It is fitting that social workers in the church acknowledge their indebtedness to the Foreign Society as a leading agency of the church in social service. A book written by one of our missionaries is not only a story of baptisms but a story of service. The Dyes were introducing modern medicine and surgery into the heart of Africa.

The use of an anaesthetic made Dr. Dye the unwilling object of superstitious veneration as having raised the dead. In the Philippines we have a printing press, not only that the Word may be scattered through its use, but that it may itself serve the people as an educational tool. In India we have orphanages with industrial schools attached where social service of the very highest importance is performed. In China we have hospitals of the very greatest efficiency. Here without regard to credal affiliation the people are treated for their physical infirmities. In whatever field the Foreign Society is doing its good work, we will see the Christ-like combination of gospel with service. It is this New Testament relation of two great forces, preaching and practice, that has made it possible for the missionaries of the Foreign Society to report a larger number of additions to the churches in pagan lands per minister, than we men at home have been able to secure.

The Poor Relief of the Church

Almost every church is called on at times to administer relief to the poor of its membership and parish. This was the first form of social service arising in the infant church of New Testament times and Paul kept the Greek Christian world bound to the Jewish Christian world by offerings for the poor gathered in Greek churches and carried to Jerusalem. While this is the most ancient of the philanthropies of the church, it is still done in many communities without discrimination. A combination of the sympathy of old-time church charity with the scientific care of modern united charities is desirable.

To give off-hand and unintelligently may, from the modern viewpoint, do more harm than not to give at all. We should know something about the causes of poverty where we go to help. If it is lack of employment, our efforts should be to hunt up a position. If medical attention would restore the wage-earner quickly, then the church might care for this. There are doctors in every community good enough to give a certain portion of their time to deserving poor. Sometimes where old age or hopeless invalidism has come, there is nothing to do but get under the burden. The church that graciously cares for these with sacrifice will earn and secure the good-will of the community.

There are forms of poor relief, however, that do harm by encouraging vagabonds. The young minister who has been victimized by a wandering hard luck man, will find the friends of this man appearing soon to continue the game. It takes time to go with a man who says he is hungry to a restaurant, but one is often rewarded by finding the hungry man cannot eat a bite but is suffering from thirst instead. Every church and every Christian that does any extensive philanthropy should coöperate with the bureau of charities in order that unworthy individuals may not draw aid from several organizations. The work of administering aid requires both intelligence and human feeling.

The Secret Orders

We have sometimes argued from the success of secret orders that men were hungry for ritualism. We might better have argued that they are hungry for brotherhood. We have been watching the work of the order to which we belong. There is a degree team to "put on the work" with dramatic effect. The degree team, however, is not the popular feature of the lodge. It is the work of relief, the visiting of the sick and the burial of the dead which arouses the interest of the membership more than anything else.

Perhaps but few realize the extent of the philanthropic work that is being done by the orders. The Odd Fellows were the pioneers in the work of relief and they now have the largest investment in Orphans' Homes and Old People's homes of any order in this country. They have paid $136,000,000 in relief work in this country. Their work in England has been so important that the government has recognized them as an agent to carry out government relief. The Masons following in the footsteps of the Odd Fellows, have erected many homes for unfortunates, though never adopting a system of sick benefits. The fraternal insurance orders, though unfortunately on such impossible financial footing in many cases, have done a world of good as every preacher who conducts funerals among the poor, knows.

Just as philanthropy keeps the Catholic church alive, and not ritual, so the philanthropy of the orders has been their bond. The church for a long time foolishly fought the orders and even yet certain small denominations do not allow their members to belong, but there can be no doubt that the members of the orders have carried into the churches a human spirit which in the providence of God has been one of the means of vitalizing the church of modern times with a new spirit of social sympathy.

Frank De Witt Talmage

Rev. Frank De Witt Talmage, D. D., pastor of the Chambers-Wylie Presbyterian Church, Broad street, Philadelphia, died on Saturday, February 9, at his home in that city. The news of Dr. Talmage's death will come as a shock to his many friends, for although he had been laid aside with a nervous break-down for about a month, his decease was quite unexpected, and at the end came as a result of an attack of heart disease.

The deceased minister was forty-four years old, and son of his still more famous father, the late T. De Witt Talmage. He was educated in the Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute, and the Military Academy of New York University, and received his training for the ministry at Union Theological Seminary. He commenced his ministerial career as assistant to Rev. Loyal Young Graham, D. D., at Olivet Church, Philadelphia. After several years he became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, where he remained four years, resigning to accept a call to Jefferson Park Church, Chicago. He then went to Los Angeles as pastor of the First Church.

Some years ago Dr. Talmage resigned his charge to make a European tour. On his return to this country in 1908 he went to the Chambers-Wylie church, where he remained until his regretted death on February 9. Dr. Talmage was a forcible and striking preacher. His pulpit manner recalled that of his father and he always spoke without notes. He is survived by a widow, two sons and two daughters.

The Greatest Englishman

While in England, a few weeks ago, Rev. R. S. MacArthur, president of the Baptist World Alliance, spent two hours in the home of Lloyd George, whom he regards as the foremost man of the British Empire today. Dr. MacArthur compares George to Lincoln in his ability to triumph over difficulties, to McKinley in his wholeheartedness, and to Roosevelt in his power of initiative. George's great task of the immediate future Dr. MacArthur declares to be disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of Wales, to be followed by the same of the Church of England, and the Church of Scotland.

"I met many Englishmen and Scotsmen," observes the Baptist Alliance president, "who believe that the Irish politicians and Roman priesthood do not really desire home rule for Ireland. If such rule were granted the oratorical vocation of these men would be taken away. For myself, I believe the Ulstermen to be mistaken in their attitude. I am a Protestant of Protestants. That is one reason why I desire to see home rule in Ireland. Both home rule and disestabishment are sure to come. Lloyd George is a man of brilliant abilities. He is also influenced by lofty ideals. He is truly religious in heart and life. All his political endeavors are inspired by a sense of justice toward his fellow-men and obedience toward God. Higher honors await him. He is the man of the hour in the British Empire."

Mr. Lloyd George's Religious Affiliation

For some time this subject has been canvassed in the papers, the Chancellor of the British exechequer being claimed alternately by Baptists and Disciples. The latest news is that he is a Disciple, according to a Baptist newspaper, the proof being positive and final, on the testimony of Rev. Robert Whitaker, a Baptist, who visited the home of Mr. George, at Criccieth, in North Wales, last September. He says, "Mrs. George is a Calvinistic Methodist, as she explained to me, and Mr. Lloyd George is what we call here a Disciple, or Campbellite. A 'Campbellite' paper lay on the table, and the church at Criccieth is a Campbellite church. They have no paid minister, but David Lloyd, an uncle of the statesman, ministers, and, as William George assured me, he had preached a powerful sermon only the Sunday before. He made it plain to me that the church to which his uncle ministers and to which he and his more famous brother belong is, to all intents and purposes, a church of the kind classified in America as 'Campbellite,' or Christian, only that it is of the more primitive type than are most of their churches here."

Chinas President a Christian

A writer in the Chicago Record-Herald gives the following particulars concerning Sun Yat Sen, the retiring president of the Chinese republic, who also seems likely to come back into the presidency through the retirement of Yuan Shih Kai. He was trained in an English mission school in Honolulu and baptized in Canton:

His father was a poor Cantonese who emigrated to Hawaii, worked first on a sugar plantation and finally obtained a small rice field in the Island of Oahu, about three miles from Honolulu. Here, almost in the shadow of the famous precipice of the Pali, where the conqueror Kamehameha the Great won his decisive victory, Dr. Sun Yat Sen was born. With customary Chinese industry and frugality his father supported his family, a wife and four children, and about the time that Sun Yat Sen was twelve years of age, had saved money enough to enable him to return to Canton with his wife and daughters, leaving his two sons in Honolulu.

The elder, Sun Ahmi, moved to Maui and engaged in the cattle business. He placed his young brother in the school of Bishop Willis, in Honolulu, where the boy remained for several years. He became a convert to Christianity and his brother at once advised the father, who wrote his younger son to come immediately to Canton. Sun Yat Sen obeyed, and, at Canton, began the study of medicine. He refused, however, to worship the ancestral gods and was baptized by a missionary, uniting with the Episcopal Church. He has steadfastly clung to his new faith ever since, although many times importuned by influential friends to resume the old religion in order to strengthen his political following. His most intimate friend, Chang Chau, whom he has summoned from Oahu to China to help him, is also a Christian. His wife, however, still follows the old faith.

His father, though subsequently reconciled to him, turned him out of his home. The penniless lad made his way to Hong Kong, obtained employment in the Alice Memorial Hospital, and, by reason of the kindness of the dean of the medical faculty connected with that institution, was enabled to graduate in medicine. Sun Yat Sen then went to Macao, a Portuguese settlement near the coast, and there became interested in the revolutionary movement, to which he has devoted his life.

His story since is a thrilling one, full of perilous incident, thrice barely escaping in disguise from Chinese towns, arrested in London at the instance of the Chinese minister and released by English law, suffering deprivation in many lands and reduplicated disappointments in his own, working ever at the hazard of his life with a price set upon his head, and finally achieving the glorious success to which he has attained.

We are proud of Lincoln and of Garfield, each of whom rose from poverty to the presidency. The Chinese with equal reason can honor the name of Sun Yat Sen."

The Christianization of Society

Those zealous souls who believe that churches and preachers should insist on individual regeneration to the neglect of social amelioration, should ponder well this illuminating paragraph from an editorial on the above subject in the Presbyterian Banner:

The place of the church in this modern battle and march should be that of moral leadership and inspiration. It cannot take upon itself the scientific and sociological discussion and solution of these problems, though it cannot wholly avoid such discussion. Deed always runs back into doctrine, and doctrine forward into deed, so that the two cannot be wholly separated. Yet the church should not entangle itself in the snarl of social theory and debate, but keep to its own field of moral and spiritual regeneration. It is primarily seeking to produce that good human nature which is the soil out of which all good things must grow. Yet it must let its voice be heard in the interest of human welfare at every point, and especially must it show such a spirit of social service and sacrifice as will be a healing and regenerating influence among men. It dare not compromise with any injustice or wrong, however it may be intrenched in wealth and power, and must stand for that human righteousness which is the reflection and fulfilment of the divine.

Once the outcast was "converted" and thrown back again upon the wreckage from which he had been rescued. Of course the church prayed for him, saw that he attended its services, and did what was in its power to do, according to its vision of that time. But the failures were so frequent that men have wondered whether the gospel were really the power of God unto salvation, or whether such natures were not doomed to be cast as rubbish to the void. But as men learned the meaning of environment, a new era dawned; they saw the necessity of clearing away the wreckage as well as of saving the shipwrecked. They learned that while a few hours of a new experience were pulling them to the church, a half-century's experience was pulling them back to the wreck, back to the scenes in which they had spent their lives. Then came the task of creating an environment in harmony with the new life. A man's moral being is not more impervious to the color of vice and crime by contact with it, than is the dyer's hand to the color it works in. The reorganization of society is a matter of importance second only to the reconstruction of manhood. The two go together. Good men is the imperative need; they are needed to rebuild the world for God.

Gleaning in Unpromising Fields

It is always in order to inquire who has decided that a field is unpromising. Perhaps some despotism has warned the Christian teacher to stay out of its dominions. The timid among Christians may be disposed to think nothing can be done in opposition to despotism. The Russian Ambassador at Constantinople said to one of the early American missionaries, "I might as well tell you now, Mr. Schauffler, that the Emperor of Russia, who is my master, will never allow Protestantism to set its foot in Turkey." Dr. Schauffler replied, "Your Excellency, the kingdom of Christ, who is my Master, will never ask the Emperor of all the Russias where it may set its foot." This is the spirit that has gained for Christianity its place of leadership in the world.

The crooked politicians warn the church against meddling with affairs of government. The brewers try to fix the limits of Christian activity. They use the power that money gives them to check the growth of temperance sentiment. They would have us believe that it is useless to fight against beastly indulgence. The ecclesiastic denounces democracy in religion as anti-Christian. He is opposed to admitting to heaven any who do not have the mark of authority placed on them by the one apostolic church. The disciple of Jesus does not wait upon the favor of these despots. He does not need any authority to do right. He is not foolhardy. He considers the demands of time and place but he does this as the servant of Christ and not at the command of the enemies of his Master.

There is a paragraph in the "Missionary Addresses" of A. McLean that illustrates a common method of increasing the ranks of the unfit:—"The Eskimo calls himself the man. In his opinion the white man was made first, but the white man having proved a failure, the yellow man, the man par excellence, was made. There are African tribes that call themselves 'the men.' The Chinese speak of themselves as Celestials, and of all others as 'foreign devils.' The Anglo-Saxons regard themselves superior to other peoples. This pride of race is characteristic of humanity." We of the United States know something of the pride of nationality. Our orators have told us again and again that we are the greatest nation on the face of the earth, and we have believed them. Let us, then, accept this greatness, if we must believe in it, as a call to serve in unpromising fields.

There are classes and individuals whom we give over to the ways of death. An examination of our reasons for hopelessness in respect to certain classes may reveal the Pharisee in us. We need the help of manners and customs. The most enlightened Christian cannot dispense with the aid of the experience of mankind which is expressed in "folk-ways." But many of these ways are outgrown. Many of them represent the selfishness of one or more classes. The habit of despising labor with the hands, which we are just overcoming, was learned from the Pharoahs and other tyrants who forced men to toil like beasts of burden to build tombs and palaces for these same Pharoahs and tyrants. Other habits have a like origin. To accept them as standards is to reject the ethics of Jesus.

Browning points out how the world does injustice to the individual:

"But all, the world's coarse thumb
And finger failed to plumb,
So passed in making up the main account:
All instincts immature,
All purposes unsure,
That weighed not as his work, yet swelled the man's account:

Thoughts hardly to be packed
Into a narrow act,
Fancies that broke through language and escaped:
All I could never be,
All men ignored in me,
This, I was worth to God, whose wheel the pitcher shaped."

Christian workers in unpromising fields and with unpromising persons discover the instincts immature and the purposes unsure and assist them to expression. [Midweek Service, March 13. John 4:27-42.] S. J.

On the Heights

A LENTEN STUDY.

It was with the high enthusiasm of a great enterprise that Jesus withdrew into the mountain region of Judea. He had come to the Jordan to share the work of preparing for a new disclosure of the life of God in the national experience. Awakened by the message of John to the belief that the time for action had arrived at last, he had journeyed southward to the place whither all men were going. He had thrown himself with enthusiasm into the great movement which the preacher of the wilderness was promoting. But suddenly and apparently without expectation, Jesus found himself the appointed leader of the new enterprise. He had come to enlist in the ranks, but he discovered that he was to be the commander.

With such a recognition of the honor and responsibility placed upon him by the current of events and the call of God, he withdrew to the solitude of the hills. There amid the great silences he faced the tremendous and inspiring work that lay before Him. His soul was lifted into the new atmosphere of humbled confidence and chastened joy. It was his duty now to consider his resources, the greatness of the occasion and the obstacles which awaited his conquest.

* * *

His personal equipment for his work was adequate and encouraging. His physical powers were at their early maturity. In the fullness of bodily strength and with the abounding vitality of a disciplined youth he had come to the supreme moment of his public work. His education had been the best that the limitations of his career in Nazareth could supply. The home and the synagogue school alike had yielded him the values of the rich culture of Biblical lore and national memorials. If he lacked the formal training of the University at Jerusalem, such as John the son of Zecharias had undoubtedly received, there were compensations in the close personal application which an ambitious youth would devote to the important matters of intellectual training. Then too, no doubt, Jesus had visited the holy city many times since that first journey at the age of twelve, and if he had never enjoyed the formal experience of a student during all those years, while Paul was studying at the feet of Gamaliel, he was still trained in such knowledge as perhaps even the university teachers could not supply.

Then too Jesus knew himself to be possessed of qualities of attractiveness and leadership which were of the greatest value in the work that lay before him. He had grown in favor with his fellow citizens in Nazareth and those whom he had met elsewhere. He understood something of the power of winning men's regard and making them his friends. Moreover he was gifted with an eloquence which later became the wonder of those who listened to him, and this power could not have been acquired without the practices of the long years of his advancing youth.

But beyond all these was the intensity of his moral purpose which would have overcome any obstacle, but which was now able to serve as the guiding motive of those many endowments which made him the most winsome and promising young leader of his day. The occasion for such a leader had come, and Jesus had recognized its arrival before he left his home. It was now with the sense of deepest responsibility that he knew himself the called of God to meet the emergency. His own spirit and the divine voice combined to announce to him his summons to the leadership of his people at the moment of the greatest crisis in their history.

Before him there seemed to lie a broadening pathway of opportunity. He had discerned the fact that the people were leaderless, and to this he had occasion many times later to recur. They were expectant of some one who should appear to lift them from the gloom and depression of their unrewarded life into the joy of national deliverance and wished-for prosperity. So widespread was this hope that already several pretenders had deliberately practiced upon the popular credulity by claiming to be the expected hero, and no overthrow of popular hopes or tragedy of misplaced confidence seemed sufficient to disillusionize the eager multitude.

* * *

What an opportunity for one who could present to his nation not a mere platform of political emancipation but a program of moral regeneration! Why should not the people who had enjoyed such opportunities of prophetic instruction in earlier ages respond to the appeal which he was so admirably fitted to make to them on the still higher levels of the kingdom of God?

* * *

More than this, the world outside of Judaism was waiting for a new voice. Never was religion more costly, more ostentatious and less effective than in that day. What an arousal of soul might not Jesus create in those far stretching nationalities that lay on every side of Palestine! That little land in which he lived seemed the center of the world, and out from it in all directions it would surely be possible to send such messages of light and leading as should transform the sordid and self-seeking men of the empire into the citizens of the kingdom of God. To the Jew, the Greek, the Roman, Jesus would speak his message of human love and divine purpose. No longer should there be the exclusiveness of the Jew, the intellectual pride of the Greek or the insolent tyranny of the Roman. Such enthusiasms as he could generate in the hearts of the men whom he would summon to his companionship would be borne forth into all lands by the willing messengers of the kingdom of God.

* * *

The time had come, the need was urgent, the opportunity was inspiring. The success of the enterprise was not to be questioned, the qualities of leadership essential for such a purpose Jesus felt himself to possess. His own spirit attested his sufficiency, and the divine promptings within his soul lent their ample assurance. And thus amid the solitudes of the hills Jesus brooded over the mighty undertaking which lay just before him. Time and space were forgotten. The needs of the body sunk below the horizon of his thought in the high and passionate eagerness of those days of expectant counsel and those nights of fervent prayer. It seemed that all things were possible of speedy accomplishment. Our Lord lived upon the heights of his great spiritual purpose, and the joy of anticipated and triumphant success rested like a benediction upon his soul.

But the temptation was yet to come.

A Nobler Crusade

An address was recently given in this city by Captain Richmond P. Hobson on the power and peril of the saloon. It was a most convincing array of facts and a most urgent appeal to American citizenship for arousal against this deadliest foe of the republic.

It is a matter of unusual satisfaction that Captain Hobson has turned his attention from the effort to stir up war sentiments against the Japanese into this more impressive and significant channel. For several years he has been delivering popular addresses in different parts of the country under the direction of lyceum and chautauqua organizations. His leading theme has been a plea for the enlargement of the navy on the ground that the country is in dire peril from Japanese hatred, which only waits a favorable moment to descend first upon Manila and then upon the Pacific Coast to overwhelm the power of the United States.

Those who knew the facts as to the actual attitude of Japan toward this country have been amazed at Captain Hobson's persistent utterance of this unfounded charge. In a period when Japan is just recovering from the enormous costs of a great war and has every reason to cultivate the friendship of all the nations, but particularly the United States, it seemed inconceivable that such direful portents could be based upon fact. In an age when the nations are struggling slowly and painfully toward the ideal of peace it seemed pathetic that a young man gifted with the abilities which Captain Hobson so evidently possesses should employ his time in the effort to foment suspicion and habituate his hearers to the idea of a Japanese-American war.

To be sure there are local causes of irritation on the Pacific Coast which can easily be magnified into serious proportions. Moreover, it is undoubtedly true that both army and navy men are committed to the program of a vastly extended military and naval equipment for the country. Nor can it be questioned that those industries, like ship-building and the manufacture of war supplies, which depend upon military and naval activity would be glad to see the fighting forces of the nation increased even at the expense of a war with Japan or any other nation.

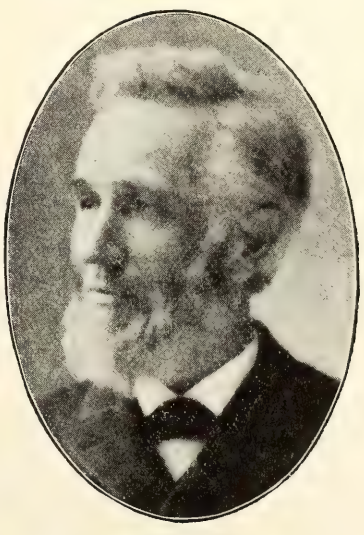
One has often been led to wonder, as he caught echoes of Captain Hobson's ill-timed and reactionary speeches, to which of these influences he owed the inspiration of his words. Whatever be the truth regarding this matter, probably few men were able to do more harm in this field than he. His gifts of body and of mind, his brilliant experience in the navy and the publicity which his career in Congress afforded him gave his utterances a weight which on their own merits they never would have possessed. That they have been taken with so little seriousness is rather the result of sober reflection on the part of the people than any deficiency in Captain Hobson's abilities or persistence.

But it is vastly encouraging to believe that he has turned from this irritating and mediæval campaign to give his unusual powers to a crusade of the very first importance. If Captain Hobson can deliver his strong temperance address in as many places as he has uttered his jingo sentiments on the Japanese question, it will be a campaign of tremendous importance.

The temperance battle is passing into its final and triumphant stage. It has passed the period of experiment; it has accustomed itself both to gains and losses; its champions have come to understand that a victory has to be held by methods as persistent and costly as those that first won it. It is now a question of the greatest national importance. It puts all the problems of tariff, money, trusts, conservation and constitutional amendment into a secondary category. It is time that men of ability and patriotism gave this question their first consideration. It is worthy of the time, effort and eloquence of any man. And in the arrival of Captain Hobson in the ranks of ardent and convincing interpreters of the temperance cause there is proof that he has undertaken a nobler crusade, and that the nation is certain to be the gainer thereby.

Charles Louis Loos

Charles Louis Loos, eminent as an educator and for twelve years —1888 to 1900—president of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, passed to his reward from his home at Lexington, Ky., Tuesday morning, Feb. 27, at the advanced age of 88 years. Professor Loos was born at Woerth-sur-Sauer, Lower Rhine (Lower Alsace) France. With his father's family he came to the United States and settled in Ohio in 1834. Lutherans upon their arrival, it was not long until the family heard and were impressed by the preaching of the Disciples. In 1838 Charles was baptized. He entered Bethany College and graduated in 1846. Afterward he was pastor of the churches at Wellsburg, Va., (1849-1850), Somerset, Pa., (1850-1856), Cincinnati, O., First Church, (1856-1857). For a year following this last pastorate he was president of Eureka College in Illinois, then professor of Ancient Languages and Literature in Bethany College from 1858 to 1880, at which time he became president of Kentucky University (now Transylvania), a post he held for seventeen years, continuing with the university in his professorial capacity up to three years ago when he was granted a pension by the Carnegie Fund.



Through all the journalistic literature of the Disciples Professor Loos has made contribution of his wisdom and vision. Intimately associated with the early leaders of the Disciples—Alexander Campbell, Walter Scott, Dr. Robert Richardson—he has been regarded by the present generation as in many ways the classic representative of the ideals and purposes of the fathers. He was a man of peace, an inhibitor of strife, an inspirer of good works and one of the creators among his brethren of their lively conscience for world-wide evangelization.

Birthday of a Great American

Bishop John H. Vincent, originator of the Chautauqua Movement for popular education, and Chancellor of Chautauqua Institution, received a unique "letter shower" on his eightieth birthday, falling on Feb. 23. The Bishop lives in Chicago, enjoys vigorous health, and the suggestion that this anniversary be made the occasion of a shower of personal letters appealed to thousands of people who recognize their educational indebtedness to him. Three quarters of a million readers in all parts of the world have enrolled for the Chautauqua Reading Course since Bishop Vincent inaugurated the plan thirty-three years ago.

Fifty thousand visitors go to Chautauqua, New York, every year, and hundreds of Chautauquas modelled upon the original are held every summer. Born at Tuscaloosa, Alabama, he entered the ministry in Pennsylvania at the age of eighteen. He attended the old Wesleyan Institute at Newark, N. J., but, denied college opportunities, he not only deliberately set about to give himself a liberal education, but from his experience was able to devise a plan of self-education for adults which has become (under the name of the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle) one of the greatest educational influences in the modern world.

General U. S. Grant attended John H. Vincent's church at Galena, Ill., in 1860-1. A Palestine Study Class at Rockford, Ill., was notable. The first Chautauqua Assembly in 1874 was held to broaden the education of Sunday-school teachers; Dr. Vincent having established the Sunday-school Quarterly and other means of teaching under the auspices of the Methodist Book Concern in New York. He led in the establishment of the International Sunday-school Lesson system. Contemporaneous with the development of the Chautauqua Idea of out-of-school education for all sorts and conditions of people, his fame as a preacher extended beyond the bounds of his own denomination. He was elected a Bishop of the Methodist Church in 1888, residing in Buffalo and Topeka. In 1900 he was resident abroad, retiring in 1904, but serving as preacher to Harvard, Yale, Cornell, Wellesley and other colleges, and widely called to communities for conducting unique weeks of interchurch service known as "Seven Days of Church Life." His only son, George E. Vincent, is president of Chautauqua Institution and of the University of Minnesota. He is the author of many religious and educational books and pamphlets.

The first Chautauqua Assembly was held at Chautauqua Lake, New York, for three weeks in August, 1874, for the broader training of Sunday-school teachers. The Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle, which made Chautauqua an all-the-year-round educational movement was founded in August, 1878. The number of readers since the first year, 1878-9, when eight thousand persons actually enrolled their names and perhaps half as many more studied with them, has reached three quarters of a million people. Some ten thousand reading circles have been formed within the thirty-three years since its organization.

Not True Yet, But—

The newspapers have been passing a report around to the effect that three churches—Disciple, Baptist and Congregational—in the state university town of Iowa City, Ia., were about to consolidate for purposes of increased effectiveness and in the spirit of Christian unity. Such a union would have far-reaching significance, as the membership of all three congregations is both numerous and substantial. The Christian Century regrets to break the illusion which this harbinger of the millenium has no doubt set up in the minds of many. The union is as yet real only in the sense that dreams and hopes and, perhaps, purposes, are real but in no other.

The thread of fact out of which the fabric of the story was woven is about as follows. The churches of Iowa City subsist together in the kindliest relationship. The grace of Christian courtesy has been developed there to as high a degree as in any city. There had been among the members of these three congregations some interchange of sentiment favorable to a union, and on a recent Sunday evening at a union service, including six evangelical churches, Rev. C. C. Rowlison, pastor of the Disciples' church, preached a sermon on "The Test of Efficiency," in which he dealt concretely with the waste of the denominational order of things in the town. It was a frank facing of the facts and figures which he had obtained with reference to these particular six congregations. He showed that a more efficient type of organization could be maintained upon a federated or united principle with an expenditure of $12,400 than is now maintained by the expenditure of $22,700, and asked, "Does Jsus Christ want us to spend $10,000 a year to keep up our denominationalism?" Mr. Rowlison's sermon was bursting with concrete facts illuminating the local religious situation. It produced a mild sensation in certain quarters, and the newspapers picked up the informal talk which had been carried on previously among the three congregations and spread abroad the too-good news that the three-cornered union was about to take place.

Nevertheless, it is out of just such stuff as this dream and this sermon that ultimate, mundane, substantial Christian unity will be made.

Chicago Challenges the Cities

Mr. W. E. Palmer, one of Chicago's most active and loyal Disciple laymen writes a "challenge" to the cities on behalf of Chicago to double their last year's offerings to missions both Foreign and American. He says that his Chicago brethren have determined to double their gifts and asks, "Is it not possible for other cities to do the same?" He cites the fact that the expenditures of both great missionary societies are far beyond their income and adds: "We Disciples of Christ must do greater things in the future if we wish to hold our place in the world's evangelization. Our church organization holds a responsible position in the religious world, therefore we must move forward in all lines and to do this work requires money." Following this Mr. Palmer gives a tabulated statement showing the contributions of churches and Sunday-schools in ten leading cities to both Foreign and Home missions for 1911. The totals are as follows:

Chicago	$4,838.89
Indianapolis	2,978.52
Louisville	2,454.31
Kansas City	2,568.73
St. Louis	2,701.58
Cleveland	3,675.40
Cincinnati	3,454.48
Pittsburgh	1,254.26
Richmond	2,988.54
Des Moines	3,065.08
	$29,959.79

These amounts Mr. Palmer thinks can be greatly increased if the cities respond to Chicago's challenge. He subscribes himself, "Yours for hilarious giving." Certainly if the men of the ten cities would give as "hilariously" as does Mr. Palmer himself the thing would be more than done.

One Million for China's Relief

The Laymen's Missionary Movement is lending its national leaders, J. Campbell White and William B. Millar, and its secretaries in various cities, to the China Famine Relief Committee, which seeks to induce American philanthropists to send $1,000,000 to buy food and clothing for the 600,000 starving families of central China. A bureau, under direction of a secretary of the movement, has been opened and is appealing to Americans everywhere. The committee, of which Bishop Greer of New York is chairman, is co-operating with the American Red Cross.

An area of three hundred square miles is affected, but a description of conditions in Chekiang province, given by the movement, sets forth fairly well conditions obtaining in all. Last summer typhoons brought floods from the sea. Yu-Yao county, bordering on Hangchow bay, is an immense tract of fine farming land under ordinary conditions. It was reclaimed from the sea by dykes, of which there are seven in a rising series. Typhoons caused the sea to sweep over all seven of the dykes, destroying rice and cotton, and drowning thousands of people.

The American Relief Committee calls upon churches in this country to take offerings on Sunday, March 10, and upon theater managers to give benefits on or near that date. Already $20,000 has been forwarded to the Shanghai committee, of which Bishop Graves is chairman. It is stated that part of the relief funds will be employed to pay men to build the dykes higher, and so prevent if possible future incursions from the sea. From an American point of view the dykes are declared to be crude affairs.

Brotherhoods to Observe Holy Week

At a conference in Chicago representatives of the Presbyterian Brotherhood of America, the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip, the Brotherhood of the Southern Presbyterian church, the Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ, the Methodist, Baptist, and Congregational Brotherhoods, the United Brethren in Christ, the Lutheran Brotherhood, the Brotherhood of Saint Andrew, the Young Men's Christian Association and the American Federation of Men's Church Organizations joined to recommend the observance of Holy Week, which will begin with Sunday, March 31, as the distinctive week of prayer for Brotherhoods. Mr. Robert H. Gardiner, chairman of the Interbrotherhood Committee, says, "We must all be willing to give ourselves to prayer with new earnestness, recognizing that the great facts of Christianity are vital, and especially that the culmination of the atoning work of Christ in the crucifixion, the resurrection, the ascension, and the coming of the Holy Spirit, mean that man's highest glory is his opportunity so to surrender himself to God's will that he may share God's purpose and enter his service for the establishment of his kingdom." Literature suggesting topics for each day's study and meditation can be obtained from the Gardiner Publishing Company, Gardiner, Me.

—The next stage in the evolution of the question concerning the membership in the Church of Christ of Presbyterians, Methodists and others, will be the appearance of a fine crop of nice distinctions and qualifiers. Mr. Spencer says they are not members "in the full New Testament sense." Dr. Shepherd writes learnedly on "the meaning of membership." Another writer makes a distinction between "membership" and "fellowship." Mr. Tharp introduces an original idea in his distinction between the Church of Christ and the Christian Church! He also proposes a hitherto untried hypothesis in declaring that baptism is simply the "regular" or "authorized" way of getting into the Christian Church, but by no means the only way. It is, however, the only way of admittance into the Church of Christ! These are samples only. We are in for a rich assortment of evasions, parentheses, fine distinctions, technicalities, "as it weres," "in a senses" and such things. Every reader should carry a notebook and make a list of them as they appear. Mr. Spencer's future writings will bear study with this in mind. The one solid rock that we can anchor to is Dr. Sweeney. He says outright that he does not hold that any who have not been immersed are members of the Church of Christ. He apparently intended to stay right where he put himself. We have our doubts about the others. But we must not get ahead of the story!

—Professor Walter S. Athern of the department of Religious Pedagogy, Drake University, has rendered positive service to Christian worship by calling attention to the great hymns of the church that should be taught children in the Sunday-school. In the list he includes: Holy, Holy, Holy, When I Survey the Wondrous Cross, Rock of Ages, Nearer My God to Thee, Sun of My Soul, Faith of Our Fathers Living Still, The Church's One Foundation, The Son of God Goes Forth to War, Lead Kindly Light, The Magnificat, In the Cross of Christ I Glory, Abide With Me, Guide Me Oh Thou Great Jehovah, Come Thou Almighty King, My Faith Looks Up to Thee, etc. This is an overlooked duty, that of training children in the poetry and music in which Christendom has learned to worship. With the passing of the good old custom of hymn-singing in the homes, the Sunday-schools should undertake to acquaint children with these rich stores of Christian praise. It is little less than pathetic to see a man or woman stand dumb and unfamiliar when a congregation is voicing its joy in "May Jesus Christ be Praised," or its prayer—so apostolic and so modern—in Washington Gladden's "O Master Let Me Walk With Thee." The business of learning hymns like these would drive out the crude and deleterious songs that have done so much in recent years to lower the tone not alone of the Sunday-school exercise but of church worship itself.

—New York City did not get the Democratic National Convention, but it has secured another national meeting of men that may possibly bulk larger in the ultimate history of the nation. Three thousand men, from all sections of North America above the Mexican border, will gather in Carnegie Hall, April 19-24, for the Christian Conservation Congress in which the Men and Religion Forward Movement culminates.

This will be different from any convention of men yet held; it will have before it expert reports from nine commissions upon the state of religion in North America. In this respect, it is patterned after the epoch-making Edinburgh Missionary Conference of two years ago.

—Dr. W. E. Macklin recently addressed a large meeting of Chinese socialists at Nanking. He had been invited to speak by President Sun Yat Sen. The meeting was attended by about 150 delegates from the various provinces, and their object was to discuss the changing times and their opportunities. The chairman and several of the delegates were atheists, and Dr. Macklin, who knew this, in a powerful speech showed them the absolute impossibility of a true socialism without God. His speech was enthusiastically received.

—Mr. John B. White, one of the leading lawyers of Iowa, speaks a heartening word on Our Readers' Opinions page when he says that the laymen of our churches cannot tolerate any loubt or equivocation when speaking of the Christian status of the members of other churches. This is in line with our observation. Laymen would make short work of Christian union if the clerical mind would give them a chance.

—Let us register a prediction: Five years from today the Boards of Church Extension and of American missions will be heartily ashamed that they instructed their secretaries, through fear of the Christian Standard, to go on record as denying that Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Methodists were members of the Church of Christ.

Caricaturing Foreign Missions

It is a pity that our popular magazines which seldom, if ever, devote any space to the beneficent work of foreign missions, should apparently welcome contributions which are travesties on the enterprise. We are likely to console ourselves that these distorted views do no harm, but we should bear in mind that they are read by a class to whom the representations of the popular magazines are authoritative and final, no other source of information being within their reach, and no interest on the subject in their minds, save that imparted by the passing page. To those who know the story of missions every caricature only excites pity for its author.

A recent publication adds its comedy to many that have appeared in late years, almost compelling the belief that a bureau of publicity is engaged in the task of instructing the pulpit in the follies and failures of the missionary enterprise. The real facts of missions are completely ignored. The non-church-going element of our country, it is safe to say, is much more familiar with the ridicule and misrepresentation in which unfriendly critics have indulged from the days of William Carey until now, while the magnificent triumphs of missions have altogether escaped their notice. Nothing is more common on flippant lips than the stories of missionary extravagance, the palatial housing of the missionary, missionary incompetence, the enormous cost of conducting the enterprise, the lack of information concerning conditions in heathen lands, the disappointment of the missionary as he faces conditions as they are and recalls the impressions which were graven on his mind by the plea of the enthusiasts at home, or the hundred and one objections which the disaffected find canned, labelled, and ready for use.

On the other hand how few of the readers of popular magazines have ever heard the name of Henry Martyn or Dr. Duff, or any of the princely heroes who have played a great part in the revolutions that are making old empires new. How little those who tell of what the missionary is not doing know of his achievement in the creation of languages and dialects, over one hundred dictionaries and more than a hundred grammars coming from his hand; how little they know of missionary exploration as seen in the labors of Livingstone, and those who immediately followed him; how little they know of the miracles of modern missions, of the promotion of the useful arts, of the bettering of living conditions, so that men leave the hovel for the house, and adopt the clothing of civilization for the cast-off clout; how little they know of the hospital, the orphanage, and the school, and in a thousand ways of those benevolent agencies that promote the well being of those among whom the missionary labors.

It is as impossibe to tabulate the full results of missionary achievement as it is to estimate the influence of the summer's sun upon the gathered harvest. The caricaturist knows of the follies and indiscretions; he seems to know nothing of the nations that are being born in a day. He seems to know much of missionary defeats; he seems to know little of the lofty inspiration or devotion to a great enterprise which calls out everything heroic in Christian character.

Such, however, is the confidence of the friends of the divine enterprise in its success that they rest their case on the facts of missionary history; and they point with pride to missionary lands as the vindication of all their claims. Criticism is not objected to; no good cause suffers from honest criticism; it is the caricatures that hurt.

A General View of Montreux, Switzerland

Idyllic Scenes in Switzerland

From the Lake of Thun to the Lake of Geneva

BY ROBERT C. AULD.

One of the most romantic sections of the country beautiful is that found between the lovely Lake of Thun and the pearly Lake of Geneva, through which runs the scenic railway, the Montreux-Bernese Oberland, one of the most spectacular in the Alps. The Bernese Oberland from Berne, by the Lake of Thun! What memories these names recall. Let us stop for a time at Spiez, or at some other spot along the shore, then go on leisurely by way of the Simmenthal to the Lake of Geneva. Let Spiez, nestling on the shore of the lake, be the starting point for the journey into a charming haunt of valleys and heights.

Amid Lakes and Mountains.

The situation of Spiez is exceptionally happy and its fine old chateau and church are pleasant to gaze upon. It is of importance as the lake station of the line that connects with the Montreux-Bernese Oberland Railway, as well as of the line leading through the Loetschberg (recently pierced) that is being pushed to completion, and will connect Berne and Interlaken with Brigue on the Simplon route. As a nature picture, the view of the Blumlisalp, from Spiez, is one of the finest of the Alps and reminds the visitor of the vision of the Jungfrau from Interlaken.

Wimmis is a pretty village on the line at the foot of the curiously bowl-shaped Bergfluh. Through the Wimmis romantic, rock gateway we are carried by the Spiez-Erlenbuch section of the railway until we arrive at Oey at the opening of the Diemtig Valley. Here we must leave the train and continue by a steep carriage road along the Kirel and Fildrich streams to Grimmialp with its famous springs, known to the herdsman in days long past.

Erlenbach, an Oberland village of the real old type, is prosperous and nowhere are seen such large wooden houses or so many cattle, especially on market day when they come to Erlenbach in droves from the country round. Our next stopping place is Boltigen a quiet pleasant resort with the jagged Mittafluh towering above. In the distance is the Rawil Pass and its snow fields. We pass Reichenbach. Weissenbach and Garstatt past the Laubegg Fall until here we are at Zweisimmen.

Zweisimmen is much frequented during the summer for its refreshing and energizing climate and the picturesqueness of its scenery. It is the starting place for numerous excursions to the mountains. Here we get our first taste of genuine Swiss highland life and scenery. State farm-houses, of the characteristic Bernese type, are found almost side by side with the stone houses of modern days.

Since winter sports have become popular, Zweisimmen has become the center of much gay life during the "season in white." The partly level, the partly sloping environs are especially adapted for skeeing; a number of steep roads attract those fond of tobogganing, while the rinks entice skaters and followers of other ice sports. The winter scenery is not less beautiful than that of the summer. The season of flowers has its charm, its beauty, its distraction, but so, too, has the season of flashing frost. In these mountains it seems as if some subtle influence, which cannot be defined by the common mind, but which belongs to the realm of enchantment, seizes one in its grasp.

Incomparable views of the Bernese Alps may be obtained as we speed on our way up the valley, first following the course of, and then crossing, the Simme, an impetuous mountain torrent here. Here we are at Gstaad, another charming village, which until a few years ago, was almost lost in the mountains. Now, owing to the advantages it affords and its accessibility, it has become a popular summer and winter resort. The drive leads to Lauenen a delightfully sequestered spot and we find the road from Gstaad to Gsteig full of picturesque beauty.

The next railroad station, Saanen, is also known by its French name, Gessenay. It is the last village on the Germanic side of this part of the Alps. Here one finds remarkable overlappings of French language and Celtic customs. It is interesting, too, as being the home of a peculiar breed of milk goats, large numbers of which have been imported into the United States.

The Bernese Oberland, which we leave behind at Saanen, is a land of beauty unrivaled in the Alps. The people are, for the most part, simple in their language and their customs, yet possess a higher culture than those living under similar conditions. One must live in the mountain fastnesses to realize the necessity of being well equipped to cope with adverse conditions. It is this which has made the inhabitants strong but full of intelligence.

Among the interesting customs of the country are the "alpengangs" in the spring and in the autumn. The cattle, living mostly in stables in the winter, are driven to the Alps pastures for the summer, the "queen" cow, bearing the biggest bell, at the head of the herd. The going and coming of these herds are made occasions of charming spring and autumn festivities, during which the old folk-customs play a prominent part.

Over the heights, the Montreux-Bernese Oberland road leads along the high plateau of the Pays d'en Haut. Here, not only has nature changed, but there exist also a different race of people and the unmistakable influence of the Celt. Different though the people may be on each side of the mountain, both are one in their national Swiss feeling, and equally proud of the centuries of common history and of the common struggle that made them one.

From Mountain Top to Valley.

Les Avants is a spot much favored by nature, sheltered as it is from all winds, yet subject to pleasant breezes; sunny, yet furnished by much natural shade, in the midst of mountains, of spruce forests; and picturesque mountain scenery. In the distance, the rugged outline of the Dent du Midi and the ever-blue Lake of Geneva is at one's feet. A more varied aspect and a more favorable location could hardly be imagined. Long before the advent of the railroad into these parts, Les Avants was a much-frequented place by those who knew how to find and to appreciate the advantages it offers, and today it is the rendezvous of visitors from all parts of the world.

As we leave the tunnel of the Dent de Jaman, as rapidly as photo-films succeed themselves on a screen, we have before us the third change of scene which this incomparable journey affords. We have left behind, in succession, gentle pasture lands, and stately villages, wild mountain scenery and picturesque and inspiring views of mountain giants. What a scene! No more rugged and majestic picturesqueness, but a paradise of green meadows, productive vineyards, cultivated fields, simple farm-houses, romantic castles now turned into school-houses or the dwellings of democratic people, of patrician ancestry. Then follows an amphitheater of villas, in the midst of gardens, and of trees and of flowers, the scent of which almost comes to us on the gentle breeze. At our feet the pearly lake reflects a sky of azure; while we find, almost within calling distance, silhouettes of the familiar peaks, among them, the Dent du Midi.

The Castle of Chillon, on the Lake of Geneva.

Montreux is in everybody's land where we meet people of all nations, still we regret to leave a part of Switzerland that has made us forget that there is such a thing as the world, and a struggle for existence. Our journey from lake to lake has taken us through a delightful part of Switzerland.

The Minister Who Broke Into Politics

By William E. Barton

It is still an unsettled question to what extent a minister ought to meddle with politics. The question was just as open for honest difference of opinion in the days of the Rev. Dr. Elisha as it is today. You remember Dr. Elisha? He was the baldheaded minister who preached for some time in the First Congregational Church in Samaria.

It was a suggestion of Mr. Elijah, just as his pastorate was closing, that lodged in the mind of his successor, and caused him to enter into politics a number of years later. Some of the very best things a minister does, and some of the worst, sometimes, grow out of the suggestions inherited from his predecessor. It has never been fully decided whether the suggestion of Elijah to Elisha could have been wrought out by Elijah himself, and if so, whether it would have insured him a longer pastorate. When General Grant came to Chattanooga to succeed Rosecrans the latter general told Grant a number of excellent plans he had for driving the Confederates from that region. They were so good Grant always said he wondered why Rosecrans did not use them himself. It often happens just in that way. The Rev. Mr. Elijah thought the matter out, suggested it to his successor, the Rev. Dr. Elisha, and then withdrew. And later Elisha put the suggestion into operation.

One day at a ministers' meeting Elisha proposed a plan, which met with quiet but hearty acceptance. Elisha selected a young minister who had plenty of nerve, and sent him to Ramoth Gilead where the army was encamped. The young man had his instructions and rehearsed his part till he knew it well. The army was inactive and restless. The king was back in Samaria recovering from a slight wound, and visiting with his cousin, the king from Jerusalem. The soldiers were getting tired of it, and the ministers had private information concerning their feeling.

This young minister made his way into the club-house where the officers were at their mess, and standing in the door till he attracted attention, picked out one whom he thought he recognized as Captain Jehu, and said,—

"I have a message for you, Captain."

"For which of us?" asked Jehu.

"For you, Captain," said the young man.

Jehu rose and walked out into the corridor, but the young man passed on into a waiting room near the front door. Jehu followed him in, and the young man shut the door and stood with his back to it, and flung a bottle of oil upon the head of Jehu, and said, "You are anointed king! Now go and give Ahab what he deserves!"

Then the young minister ran, and hurried back to town where he told Elisha what he had done, and awaited results.

Jehu walked back down the hall to the dining room, making some little effort to wipe the oil from his beard.

"What did that crazy fellow want of you?" his companions asked.

"You heard what he said," replied Jehu. "You know as much about it as I do."

"You lie!" they cried. "Tell us!"

"Well, if you must know," said Jehu, "He poured oil on my head, and said I was to be king in place of Ahab."

Then such a scene ensued as happens sometimes in national conventions. The soldiers piled up their coats to make a sort of throne, and set Jehu thereon, and shouted,—

"Jehu is king!"

For a little while the enthusiasm went on unbounded. Then Jehu said,

"If you really want me for king, keep every man here. I will announce my own nomination."

He cranked up his machine, and he broke the speed limit on his way back to Samaria.

The king had felt uneasy, and when he saw Jehu coming at a rate of speed that seemed murderous, he sent a policeman down the road to ask Jehu what was the trouble; but Jehu said,

"Get out of the road!" And the men who were sent to stop him dropped obediently into the dust behind him, and Jehu went on.

You must read about this campaign in the Second Book of Kings, the ninth chapter. It was a hot and bloody campaign, and several men were hurt at the polls. But that is not the important point in this present story.

As the campaign got fairly under way, Jehu, still in his car and taking nobody's dust, met the Rev. Mr. Jehonadab, a Methodist, or at any rate something other than Elisha. In politics he was a Prohibitionist. Jehu stopped and invited him to get into his car. Said he,

"I understand you Methodists are with me, as well as the people of Rev. Dr. Elisha's congregation."

"We're all for you," said Rev. Mr. Jehonadab.

"Get in and ride with me," said Jehu, "and I will show you how I will clean up this town if I am elected."

It has not always been pointed out that Elisha himself carefully kept himself out of Jehu's chariot, and did not appear too much in the limelight in this whole matter lest it should be said the Congregationalists were trying to run the town. But he saw to it that a committee of ministers of other denominations were standing on the curb when Jehu started out, ready for an invitation, and carefully noting down his pre-election pledges.

Yes, it was a bitter fight, and a bloody election. I really do not like to think of all the things that were done, and I hope Elisha did not connive at all of them. But some of them he certainly suggested, and he was practically chairman of the campaign committee, though his name was carefully kept out of the papers.

On Wednesday morning the town awoke with a headache, and the worst shock it had had for years. The way Maine went for Governor Kent was not a circumstance to it. The whole state had gone Democratic in one of the greatest landslides in history.

Jehu was a disreputable character. His morals were bad, and his party was bad. He tore the civil service law to shreds, and appointed his cronies to places of power. But he kept faith with the ministers. He cleaned up the town. Not for years and years had Baal-worship been so thoroughly routed as it was in that election. Indeed, it never afterward recovered from the blow Jehu smote it.

And good came out of it, along with some things that were bad. On the whole it has been considered that Jehu made a reasonably good king as compared with Ahab.

Years afterward some old men were talking about the exciting campaigns they had lived through, and one of them said,

"One thing I never understood, and that is, Who was really behind that campaign? Who planned it and organized it and brought about the closing of the disreputable places?"

And the other said, "Oh, don't you know that? Well, it was a secret at the time, but I thought every one knew it now. It was Elisha did that."

"Elisha? Who was he?"

"Why, that bald-headed preacher. He did the whole business."

"What did he get out of it?"

"Well, Jehu, bad as he was, kept his promise to the preachers, and he cleaned up the town. That was what Elisha wanted."

"Pretty shrewd old politician, Elisha must have been."

"Yes; but all his life there were people who said he did not preach the good old gospel the way Elijah did. But he left Samaria a cleaner town than it had been since the good old party fell back on its record."

This whole story is recorded in the Second Book of Kings, together with a number of details which I have omitted in this condensation. You must read it there to understand it all. You will see how well the Rev. Dr. Elisha lined the ministers up, and how skillfully he kept himself in the background till it was all over but the shouting, and he let others do that. In all the history of ministers mixing up in politics, there probably has never been a more bold and successful combination.

None of the ministers, so far as I know, got anything out of it for themselves. Elisha was wholly above suspicion in such matters. But very few people in Samaria could bring themselves to believe that the caucus that resulted in turning out Ahab and electing Jehu was held at a ministers' meeting. And there still is a difference of opinion as to whether Elisha did the right thing. But I am merely telling the story as it was told to me. It is for others to point the morals. It shows that ministers can do things in politics when they try. The question whether they do them wisely is a disputed one.

Church Union in Canada

Story of its Beginnings and Progress Up to Date

BY E. RYERSON YOUNG.

Two millions of Christian people in Canada are just now considering the matter of uniting and forming one grand united church for the glory of God and the furtherance of His kingdom on earth. There is perhaps no more interesting event in the religious world today. If the general church of God knew just what this step meant for the good of the whole world in the progress of Christian charity, comity, and co-operation, many Christians outside of Canada would remember their Canadian fellow Christians in prayer that they might carry this great event to a successful issue.

Origin of Movement.

Whence came this movement and just what is it?

Some time ago a foreigner by the name of M. D'Alviella, said that America was remarkable in the fact that religious activity on this continent had a tendency toward one point. This has certainly been true of religious work in Canada. Co-operation of Christian people in God's work and the consolidation of their denominations in strong unions, have marked the history of the church in this land. For nearly a hundred years, unions have been taking place. The different branches of the Methodist Church have been steadily coming together since 1833, the last great union being in 1885, when practically every Methodist branch was cemented in one grand union. The same spirit was abroad amongst the Presbyterians, and almost as many branches have been brought together in a noble church in 1875, and their last independent congregations coming in a few years ago.

These unions have been so happy, so successful, and so far-reaching in usefulness, that the Christian hearts thus enlarged, and working in many ways with fellow Christians of other denominations, the question of larger unions have been in the air for years.

Union Revivals.

Years ago, the late grand principal of Queen's University, Dr. Grant, said that the churches in Canada were tending toward one point, that there was great similarity in their methods of work, their beliefs, and their aim was practically one and the same, and that outsiders saw little difference in them. The great-hearted leader of Victoria University, Dr. Burwash, at the recent Ecumenical Conference in Toronto, in speaking of the progress of the spirit of unity in Canada, said that "when we prayed together, we were all of one spirit. Calvinist and Armenian poured out their hearts to God with unity in the love of Christ. . . We have learned in Canada to unite in our revival services; and the most glorious revivals I have seen for many years past have been those in which we stood side by side—Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Methodists, and sometimes Church of England people, and worked together and saw the people converted by scores and hundreds. And as for holiness of heart and life, from time immemorial, a pure family, a high ideal of right and wrong, and duty, have been characteristic of Presbyterians and of the old Puritans, who formed the basis of Independents or Congregationalists, just as they are the characteristics of Methodism. . . . We are not giving up the old ideas or standards, but are finding that our brethren of all churches are coming together with one idea and one standard, and we think we can do our work better together. Competition is no better in church affairs than it is in the ordinary business life. It means that each one is grasping for himself, instead of all combining in one common effort to build the kingdom of Christ and make our young country what we desire it to be, permeated by the faith of religion, living under the influence of the highest conception of duty to God, and not for ourselves, but each for the other, and for the well-being of the world.

Began in 1899.

Exactly when and where the question of organic union between the Methodist, Presbyterian, and Congregational churches was first mooted, I do not suppose any one knows. In February, 1899, a Symposium on Church Union was held in The Christian Guardian. Most of the contributors to this symposium did not then think that there was much hope for union between these churches. But in the same year, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church desired closer relationship with other churches, so that overlapping in the home mission fields might be prevented, and appointed a committee to meet with representatives of other churches. At its next general conference, in 1902, the Methodist Church replied, and appointed a committee to meet the Presbyterians and deal with the Home Mission problem.

A Methodist Proposal.

The Methodist Church has always shown herself ready to consider union with any other evangelical body, and has for years had a committee appointed for that purpose, but little or nothing had resulted since 1885. However, this conference of 1902, after re-

The Man Who Didn't Have Time

By Edgar White

There lived in a growing Western city a young business man who had formulated his philosophy of life right on the threshold of his activity. It was the reversal of a certain Christian rule about first seeking the kingdom, but he aimed at the same result.

George Worthington was born of plain, country parents who had been driven hard by the lash of necessity, and he had barely cleared the curriculum of the village school before he began battling for the almighty dollar. He had long known its rarity and consequent value. By working in season and out, by night and day, denying himself every pleasure, he had made a start. At twenty-five he had more money to his credit than any two young men of his age in the village, when he went to the larger city and became a merchant, and then an investor in real estate and stocks. He was known as one of the most sagacious and successful business men of the city, and when his parents died, he had nothing in the way to prevent his accumulations. To his credit be it said, he provided for them well to the last, but no other call aroused his sympathy. He wanted to be financially safe, and then he intended to do great things for his fellow men.

About once every six months Mr. Worthington had a caller who took decided objections to his philosophy. Charles Stanton was the secretary and general manager of an association organized for the purpose of aiding worthy young men in getting employment, and in removing evil influences from them. He had long tried to get Mr. Worthington on his list of supporters.

"I like you, and I like the plan—it's a splendid thing," said Worthington, "but I can't commit myself—that is, financially—right now. Expenses are very heavy. You don't know what a drain there is. I want to get the business in shape, so I'll know for a certainty just where I stand. Then I'll help you. Not only that, I'll help the churches and other worthy objects, but right now please excuse me. Next time you call, maybe I'll give you a more favorable answer."

Mr. Stanton smiled. The previous answer had been much the same. He felt certain the next would be.

Worthington acquired the reputation of being close. He would pay his bills, because he had to hold up his business standing. But he gave nothing; not even to his workmen on Christmas. Some said he was stingy, but they couldn't appreciate his philosophy. Worthington wasn't stingy. He was just waiting until he could afford to give like a lord. What was a few paltry dollars doled out now and then to hundreds by and by? When he did open his purse-strings, he wanted it to be worth while. He would establish a library, endow a college, build a fine church for some needy congregation. Meanwhile, he'd go after that dollar. He had learned to enjoy the fascination of the hunt. He liked to hear them jingle on his counters, and to glance at his deposit book and the securities in his burglar-proof safe. That wasn't miserliness; it was just thrift; good, honest industry. Even the street beggars had learned it was no use to hold out a hand to him, even though it was snowing and bitter cold. No solicitors for any church or charitable enterprise were ever admitted into his office—none but Stanton. Somehow Worthington rather liked Stanton, possibly because he represented the sort of organization he would care most to help—when the time should come. There was no fake about Stanton. He was engaged in a real work and doing an immense amount of good. Worthington knew that. He had in his employ some of the young men who were aided by Stanton's society, and they had turned out well.

Stanton, of course, had tried to convince Worthington that only a few dollars now and then would be of considerable help, but Worthington said he wouldn't go in until he could do the thing right. When the time came, he would put up a big building for Stanton's enterprise, and fix it up with library and reading room, baths, and all that. It should be a monument to his sympathy for the cause.

And so the man of future generosity went on piling up the dollars and the securities, and clinging to them with lean, hungry fingers. He grew sharp and irritable. When debtors didn't pay promptly, he instituted suit. If there was a mortgage, he foreclosed on the day and date, regardless of consequences to the debtor. Friends dropped off. Men spoke of him as "old money bags." He laughed when he heard of it.

"They're mad because they don't own 'em," he sneered.

By and by a combination was formed among some rival merchants. By this Worthington was deprived of a city franchise that had meant thousands to him. He undertook to get an independent line to one of his warehouses in the city, and after being held up enormously for it, another concern was given the same privilege for practically nothing. Angered at his losses, he plunged heavily in some fluctuating stocks, and in a month his property was in the hands of the sheriff. The man who seemed to have been born with a silver spoon in his mouth was practically a pauper, and his enemies were laughing at him.

For a week Worthington went about in a daze, an old man beaten in the game of life. Then he moved into a cheap boarding house, and clung to his room, afraid to show himself on the streets, where he had once walked with such arrogance.

One afternoon he was sitting by his window, which looked out upon a dismal court and the soot-marked roofs of houses. As twilight came on his brow became gloomier, and he reached once or twice for a glistening object that lay on a table beside him.

"It's either that or whiskey," he muttered, "and it had better be that."

The resolution formed, he picked up the revolver with decision. It was a double-action make, and he eyed it curiously a moment, and then—

The door swung open and in walked Stanton without knocking. Worthington looked up with a dark frown.

"Well," he said, "you've come to a poor market, my friend. I've got just twenty-five cents to my name. If you want it, why, take it."

"Thank you," said Stanton, pleasantly, "but this time I've come to tender you our assistance."

"To—to—what?" gasped the defeated merchant, looking dully at his caller.

"Our society is organized for the purpose of helping young men over bad places in life," said Stanton, "and so soon as I heard you might need our assistance, I hurried here to see you."

"But I am no longer young. I'm over forty."

"That doesn't make any difference," returned Stanton easily. "Our organization helps whomever I recommend, and I'm certain it will do anything for you that I suggest."

Worthington arose unsteadily and laid his hand on Stanton's shoulder.

"Do you mean to say," he went on hoarsely, "that you would help me after the way I treated you?"

"Why, sure. I don't hold any grudge against you. I'm something of a business man myself, and I'm going to risk my judgment on you that you'll make good in anything you attempt. Just say what it is. Would a thousand dollars give you a start at anything?"

"A thousand dollars?" cried Worthington. "Do you mean your company or society would stake me for a thousand dollars?"

"Why, of course. Why not?"

Worthington paced up and down the floor. His face worked feverishly. He started to speak several times, ran his hand through his hair and finally sat down in a chair opposite the friend who had come to save him.

"Mr. Stanton," he said, with recovered composure, "I've gone at life all wrong. You knew I was wrong, and yet you were good enough to withhold from me the contempt an honest man must necessarily have felt. The lesson has been dearly bought, but it was worth it. Not a dollar I ever had was rightly mine, because I did not use it rightly. My eyes are open now, and I see clearly. If you want to trust me with a thousand dollars, I know how to make it pay out, and I trust in the future I'll act as a man should act when God has given him the capacity to do business. I will accept this as the talent bestowed upon the steward, and at the Master's coming, he will find beside it the proper interest it has earned."

The two men arose and clasped hands.

"I feel more certain about that new building now," said Stanton with a smile, "than I ever did before."

The Color of a Hat

The editor of a religious weekly in looking back upon his last vacation, taken in the fall of the year, said that the one thing which had ineradicably impressed itself upon him was the thought, "When you go to a fashionable resort, don't wear a brown hat." We are rather tolerant in America of idiosyncrasies, but our editorial friend discovered there was a limit when it came to the question of a hat. He had picked up the hat on his way to the train, buying it as most men buy their head-gear without other thought than that it was "easy," but he soon learned that the people who were very loose in their views of conduct were exceedingly "set" in their views of costume. His hat was light and agreeable and an excellent fit, but there was not another like it at the big hotel or on the links, and wherever he went people stared after him as though he were "the wild man of Borneo." Lucky for him, he was not in Great Britain or he might have been "run in" on suspicion, for as Thackeray once said, "The hat is almost a sacred object in England." It amuses "a looker-on in Vienna" to see how little things are exalted when big things are brought low, but there is something tragic about it when a man's character may be any color, but his hat must conform to the accepted mode. We have found some congregations more insistent as to the minister's clothes than they are in regard to his creed, and polite society will tolerate a soiled reputation more readily than a jewel that is "off color." The Pharisees were by no means the last to strain at a gnat while they swallowed a camel.

Our Readers' Opinions

A Response

Editors Christian Century:

My attention has been called to six affirmations put forth by The Christian Century in a discussion with Z. T. Sweeney, which affirmations The Century declares represent "the sentiment and conviction of the Disciples of Christ." According to The Century "Dr. Sweeney denies that these statements represent his brethren" and calls upon his opponent "to name prominent brethren who will support them."

Responding The Century says: "The following names have been put down not because we have from any of them any specific statement of views, but wholly in the faith that we know the sentiment of the Disciples and in the knowledge that these men are truly representative leaders of the brotherhood. Dr. Sweeney asks for the name of an editor. We will give the names of our three veteran editors: J. H. Garrison, W. T. Moore and J. A. Lord."

I have no disposition to take part in the discussion, but as my name has been called, I respond in the briefest terms practical.

The Century's first affirmation is as follows: "The Disciples believe that Presbyterian, Congregationalist, Methodist and other evangelical churches practicing affusion and 'infant baptism' are churches of Christ."

I do not believe that these denominational bodies are churches of Christ. Doubtless a host of their adherents are members of the Church of Christ, but this is quite different from believing that the party organizations themselves are churches of Christ. "The Disciples" generally have clearly distinguished between the personal faith and consecration of members of denominational bodies, and the denominational organization, having fellowship with the one and condemning the other. This distinction is in entire accord with my personal conviction.

As I do not concur in the first "affirmation" in which the whole or at least the main issue is involved, I do not need to make comment on the related "affirmations." Respectfully,

J. A. Lord.

Feb. 21, 1912.

[The Christian Century is glad to give space to the above statement by Mr. Lord, the more so because he manifestly conceives our citation of his name in precisely the spirit in which it was conceived by us. We are grateful to him for his quotation of our statement that we appealed to him and to the others, not because we had authority from any of them, but "wholly in the faith that we knew the sentiment of the Disciples." Mr. Lord writes in good temper, entitling his communication, "A Response," not a "protest." If he found anything in our statement that could be characterized as a "charge" or "an outrage" or as "presumptuous," he does not indicate it. He goes straight to the mark and in a concise sentence or two states his divergence from our theses.

But our esteemed correspondent misconceives our statements. He takes our words as affirming that the several denominations, as such, are churches of Christ, and he denies that "these denominational bodies are churches of Christ." In this position The Christian Century perfectly agrees with him. We regard denominational bodies, as such, as not only not churches of Christ, but inimical to the highest interests of the Church of Christ. We stand precisely with Mr. Lord in his distinction "between the personal faith and consecration of members of denominational bodies and the denominational organization," and we stand with him also in "having fellowship with the one and condemning the other."

Our affirmations had no reference to denominational organization. We did not use the term "church" as synonymous with "denomination." We referred not to the Presbyterian, Congregational and Methodist denominations, but to Presbyterian churches and Congregational churches and Methodist churches. These local churches we affirmed were churches of Christ and their members were members of the Church of Christ.

Specifically, we affirmed that the South Congregational Church of Chicago is a church of Christ, that the First Methodist Church of Lexington, Ky., is a church of Christ, that the First Presbyterian Church of Pittsburgh is a church of Christ, in the same sense that the Englewood Christian Church of Chicago is a church of Christ, that the Central Christian Church of Lexington, Ky., is a church of Christ or that the East End Christian Church of Pittsburgh is a church of Christ. And we affirmed that the members of the first named list of churches belong to the Church of Christ in the same sense that the members of the last named list of churches belong to the Church of Christ.

In the light of this explanatory word we are constrained to re-affirm that Mr. Lord endorses our affirmations. But rather than speak on his behalf we prefer to have him speak again for himself. Mr. Lord is pastor of a church of Christ at Milton, Oregon. In that community is a Methodist church and a Presbyterian church. Does not Mr. Lord believe that these churches are churches of Christ?

Our readers will be much interested in his response to this question, and we shall be glad to put at his disposal whatever space his answer may require.—The Editors.]

Misinformed

Dear Brother Morrison: As I am not a subscriber to The Christian Century and have not seen a copy for more than a year, I was very much surprised, yesterday, when a brother minister informed me that you had included my name in the list of men who are supposed to indorse the reception of unimmersed people into our churches.

If you will refer to my letter of September 25, 1911, (a copy of which I have), you will see that, in it, I told you I was unalterably opposed to the proposed policy, either at home or on the foreign field.

I stand for liberty of opinion, but, from my viewpoint, the design and form of baptism are not matters of opinion. So far as the fundamental doctrines of our movement are concerned, I am, and always have been, an old line disciple. My protestations in the past, as they will be in the future, have been against extreme conservatism which seeks to bind human opinions upon the individual conscience. But I do not consider the fundamentals, pointed out by the Campbells and proclaimed with such marvelous success by our people for a century, human opinion. Not being a reader of The Century, I naturally concluded that it had an ambition to lead our people into broader fields of thought, but did not dream that it sought the destruction of our loyalty to the unqualified commands of the New Testament.

I trust you will give this, my denial and explanation, a place in the columns of The Century.

I have forwarded a denial to both the Evangelist and Standard. A preacher's name is his greatest human asset, and he cannot afford to have it used in a way which misrepresents him or against his will.

Geo P. Rutledge.

Philadelphia, Feb. 27.

[We cannot repress our surprise that Mr. Rutledge would send a flat denial of our alleged statement to other papers when he had never seen the statement himself! Had he not sought this publicity elsewhere we would have written him personally to say that his informant gave him an entirely erroneous impression of the connection in which we used his name. We would have accompanied our letter with a marked copy of The Christian Century that he might see that there was not the silghtest hint in our six affirmations about receiving unimmersed persons into our churches. His seeking publicity elsewhere compels us, however, to make public his letter.

Our brother will not find The Christian Century differing, we are sure, from his view of the design and form of baptism. We hold with the Disciples of Christ on these points and presume that he does also. We, too, are "old line Disciples." We also hold that "the fundamentals, pointed out by the Campbells, and proclaimed with such marvelous success by our people" are not matters of human opinion. As to a purpose to destroy any one's "loyalty to the unqualified commands of the New Testament," we would hold that such a purpose would render us unworthy not only of support of but of association with Christian people.

The six affirmations for whose endorsement we appealed to Mr. Rutledge and some fifty other prominent Disciples are found repeated elsewhere in this department. We are quite sure that when our esteemed Philadelphia brother reads them for himself he will find no substantial fault with them as an expression of the attitude of the Disciples. And he will feel, no doubt, that his name has been honored by association with a set of theses which affirms unambiguously the complete Christian status of his brethren of other names.—The Editors.]

Letters to the Editors

Editors Christian Century: I greatly appreciate the many splendid articles in the various issues of The Christian Century. The paper is certainly filling a real place in religious journalism.

Editors Christian Century: I like the spirit of The Century. It is good, strong, spiritual food. You are attempting to settle a big question, but I doubt any one's ability to do it. Wish you could. What you say ought to make men think.

Editors Christian Century: I admire your wisdom in choosing Mrs. Harrison to edit your Woman's page.

[That is a point far above controversy, as every reader, man or woman, will agree.—The Editors.]

Editors The Christian Century: We think a great deal of The Century. Do not fear to proclaim the truth in a kindly spirit.

Editors Christian Century: Have read your series of articles on "Baptism" in The Christian Century. They are the best that I have ever read on that important subject. By all means publish there articles in book form. We must have them in permanent form.

The Century is growing. I like its spirit. God bless you in your great work.

Editors Christian Century: I must tell you something of my hearty appreciation of the splendid work you are doing in The Christian Century. Your discussion with Z. T. Sweeney and what has followed as a result of it has been gratifying to me. In your closing article of that discussion and the editorial, The Blight of Legalism, you have led us at last to our fundamental differences. You made the issue clear and Mr. Sweeney has accepted it and seems willing to take the consequences. It now remains to be seen whether others will still attempt to remain on his premises and go with him to the inevitable conclusion, or whether they will seek new premises. But the issue is clearly before us, and it has come up to us in the discussion of a question which many Disciples have wanted to consider closed for all time, a subject too upon which the Disciples have a most extraordinary conscience. This confusion of mind with respect to the Christian status of Presbyterians and others is the greatest obstacle in the way of the Disciples practicing their plea for Christian union. The way the issue has been raised has been a piece of generalship and service for which I am truly grateful. It is indeed amusing to see some of the brethren attempting to avoid both horns of their dilemma by making haste to announce their general disagreement with The Christian Century! They may, probably will, choose to keep quiet rather than take either horn of the dilemma in which they find themselves, but you may rest assured that, meanwhile, there is more hard thinking being done on this proposition than some of us have ever done on any single proposition in all our lives before. You have rendered us a great service and I am grateful.

A Suggested Revision

Editors The Christian Century: I am not one of the "representative men" referred to, but only a servant of the Lord. I have read the controversy very carefully. I am inclined to believe you were unfortunate in the expression of your "six affirmations." You seem to contradict yourself and at least opened the way to a rather humiliating discussion. I may not be able to express myself more lucidly than you have. I do not pretend to be any great scholar. It seems that the attitude of the majority of the ministry is toward accepting the "spirit" rather than the "letter" of the religious neighbors you mention. I think your position and many others is about as follows:

1. That the Disciples admit that the Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational churches are churches of Christ.

2. That the Disciples admit that the members of these churches are members of the Church of Christ.

3. That the Disciples know of no other way of admission into the Church of Christ except by baptism into Christ.

4. That the Disciples admit that those members of these churches who have not been immersed are members 'in spirit' notwithstanding their baptism—"irregular, defective and objectionable as to the manner of administration."

5. That the Disciples believe that baptism is not a physical act only.

6. That the Disciples believe that immersion only of a believer should be practiced in the administration of baptism as a loving obedience to Christ.

This may still be open to criticism, but it seems to me to be free of many points of controversy. The word 'admit' being substituted for the more decisive term 'believe' in 1, 2, and 4, and the word 'Christ' for 'it,' in the 3rd, agrees with the common idea "down state" at least.

The statement of the fourth affirmation as you put it, makes valid a practice that is excluded by the sixth, but as I have worded it the validity of a practice which you term as "irregular, defective and objectionable as to the manner of its administration" is not admitted.

The addition of the little word "only" makes the fifth affirmation agree with all the teachers from Campbell down.

The omission of the last phrase "and as a means to Christian union," is desirable to me as I see no reason for this in the scripture. Baptism in connection with proper antecedents was "for the remission of sins." I also think that the word "obedience" is better than "testimonial."

Now if you do not throw this away before you read it I suppose that you will after. That is all right. I do not expect anything more than the satisfaction I have already had in the expression of my convictions.

Casey, Ill. J. A. CLEMENS.

[The same care and conciseness which characterize the above communication should characterize also our comment. The reader is referred to the six affirmations which appear elsewhere in this department.

1, 2 and 4. A people pleading for Christian union must not reluctantly admit, they must profoundly believe and joyfully proclaim that those to whom their plea is addressed are members of the Church of Christ.

3. There can be no objection to the modification of number 3 as Mr. Clemens proposes. But it changes nothing. To be baptized into Christ, into the Church, into one body, all mean the same thing. There is but one baptism.

4. The New Testament knows nothing of membership "in spirit" as opposed to some other kind of membership. Presbyterians are in Christ or out of him, in the body of Christ or out of it, members of the Church of Christ or not members, baptized or not baptized. Disciples may not grudgingly devise for them an extra-New Testament status. The Book gives us no such authority. Mr. Clemens' article gives evidence of his having studied the six affirmations very pains-takingly, but he has overlooked one important point. Affirmation 4 does not validate what affirmation 6 excludes. Affirmation 4 validates the baptism of the members of these churches, condemning the manner by which it was administered. Affirmation 6 states the only manner of administering baptism acceptable to Disciples, and gives two reasons for it.

5. To say that baptism is not a physical act only, is to imply that it is a physical act mainly. This The Christian Century denies, and the best writing among present-day Disciples denies. While baptism cannot be performed without a physical act—no social act can be performed without some physical act—the essential thing in baptism is the social act of incorporating the penitent believer into the living organism of the body of Christ, which is the Church. This is not a physical, but a social, a spiritual, act.

6. The sixth affirmation was not worded with the purpose of exhausting all the reasons held by all Disciples for the practice of immersion. It does not include all the reasons held by The Christian Century itself. It simply undertook to state an adequate minimum of reason for this practice. We say "a means to Christian unity" because both the New Testament and historic Disciple teaching support that position. We say "testimonial" rather than "obedience" to Christ, because not all Disciples believe that Christ commanded immersion. The Christian Century does not believe that he commanded immersion. He commanded baptism. If Christian union waits until the Christian world is convinced that Christ commanded immersion, it will never come. There is sufficient ground for the practice of immersion only in the two considerations suggested in our affirmation. It is our observation that the tender appeal to follow Jesus into the water for the joy and satisfaction of honoring him in the beautiful physical sign as well as in the essential spiritual act persuades more people to be immersed than does all the dogmatic argument of the theologians.—THE EDITORS.]

Six Affirmations

I. The Disciples believe that Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregationalist churches are churches of Christ.

II. The Disciples believe that the members of these churches are members of the Church of Christ.

III. The Disciples know of no other way of admission into the Church of Christ except by being baptized into it.

IV. The Disciples believe that baptism as administered by these churches, —irregular, defective and objectionable as they regard the manner of its administration—does actually induct men into the Church of Christ, and is therefore valid.

V. Disciples do not believe that baptism is a physical act.

VI. Disciples believe that immersion only should be practiced in the administration of baptism as a loving testimonial to Christ and a means to Christian unity.

Wallace Tharp States His View of the Disciples' Position

[The interpolations in brackets throughout this article are editorial comments.]

Editors Christian Century: I thank you for making public my protest against your unauthorized use of my name. I accept your apology. You must not conclude a man's position is in error simply because you are "astonished" at his position. If the measure of astonishment is a proof of the truth or falsity of a proposition, I challenge you to greater astonishment than has possessed me as I have had read your now famous Six Affirmations and some of your other dicta.

I am concerned, and solicitous, to have my position on your "six affirmations" known to you and your readers, and herein set it forth in the hope that some good may be accomplished. Permit me to repeat them, seriatim, numbering them as you do, and to make my statement following each:

1. "The Disciples believe that Presbyterian, Methodist, and Congregationalist churches are churches of Christ."

I believe, tenderly and lovingly, that they are Christian churches—Christians in all the content of this beautiful and significant adjective—but that they are churches of Christ, in the full New Testament sense, I deny. The very logic of my relation to the great movement of the Restoration impels this position and conclusion, and any other position would be absurd and stultifying. If these churches are all they should be why try to have them become anything else?

[This is a new distinction which the Disciples have not been accustomed to make. We would be interested in hearing whether there are others who regard the Church of Christ as something other than the Christian Church.]

2. "The Disciples believe that the members of these churches are members of the Church of Christ."

I believe that the members of these churches are Christians; but I do not believe it because of the reasons you assign. You relate their vital and saved connection with the "body of Christ," through their church-membership, which cannot be true, else the whole teaching of the New Testament is mislead-

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

Rudyard Kipling's Idea of Women

Rudyard Kinpling's poem, on "The Female of the Species," is very much in evidence just now. The following sane comment on it from The Woman's Journal is commended to our readers. Mr. Kipling is not over-complimentary to women in this poetical diatribe; but losers have a privilege to grumble, and the anti-suffrage cause has become so clearly a losing cause that women can afford to smile indulgently over such outbursts.

The burden of Mr. Kipling's verse is that "the female of the species is more deadly than the male."

In proof of this he asserts that if a peasant of the Himalayas unexpectedly meets a bear, "he shouts to scare the monster," and if the bear is a male he "will often turn aside;" but the she-bear, when thus assailed with shouts, promptly attacks the person who has tried to frighten her. The shouts of cheap politicians often scare voters from the right path; and if women should prove less open to influence by clamor, it ought to make them a valuable addition to the electorate.

Natural History Open to Doubt.

Mr. Kipling adds that the female cobra is less apt than the male to glide quietly away when somebody is coming; and, finally, that when the American Indians put the Jesuit missionaries to the torture, the women were the worst tormentors. From this he draws the conclusion that "females" are incapable of feeing pity. But the Indian men approved of all that their women did. The women showed no more cruelty, only more ingenuity. In our modern times, when the problem is to prevent suffering, not to inflict it, the women continue to show greater keeness in appreciating what causes pain, and they put forth greater ingenuity in trying to relieve it. In the charities and philanthropies the bulk of the workers are women.

Mr. Kipling's natural history is open to some doubt. We do not know much about cobras or Himalayan bears; but among the animals of which we have daily experience, we do not find the female the more ferocious If a woman wants to cross a pasture where a horned beast is grazing, she can usually do so with safety if the creature is a cow, but not if it is a bull. The farmer's wife can harness and drive the average mare, but she would not try it with a stallion. If you go among a flock of sheep, you may get a butting from the ram, but never from the ewes. With most creatures, the male is distinctly more pugnacious and dangerous than the female, except when the female is defending her young.

Man and Compromise.

Mr. Kipling lays stress upon the supposed inability of women to compromise:

"Man propounds negotiations, man accepts the compromise."

Some men can compromise; others are like Tom Brown at Rugby, the typical British schoolboy, of whom a friend declared that he knew only one sort of compromise: "It's everything that he wants and nothing that you want!" In modern politics there is often too much compromise with the forces of sin and greed.

If women are intractable about compromising where a real principle is at stake, this is an argument for equal suffrage. Our political life could stand a somewhat larger infusion of unbending conscience.

Mr. Kipling says:

"But the Woman that God gave him, every fibre of her frame
Proves her launched for one sole issue, armed and engined for the same,
"She who faces death by torture for each life beneath her breast
May not deal in doubt or pity—must not swerve for fact or jest.
These be purely male diversions—not in these her honor dwells—
She, the Other Law we live by, is that Law and nothing else!

"She can bring no more to living than the powers that make her great
As the Mother of the Infant and the Mistress of the Mate;
And when Babe and Man are lacking and she strides unclaimed to claim
Her right as femme (and baron), her equipment is the same.

"She is wedded to convictions—in default of grosser ties;
Her contentions are her children, Heaven help him who denies!
He will meet no cool discussion, but the instant, white-hot, wild
Wakened female of the species warring as for spouse and child.

"Unprovoked and awful charges—even so the she-bear fights;
Speech that drips, corrodes and poisons—even so the cobra bites.

* * * * * * * * *

"So it comes that Man, the coward, when he gathers to confer
With his fellow-braves in council, does not have a place for her
Where, at war with Life and Conscience, he uplifts his erring hands
To some God of Abstract Justice—which no woman understands.

"And Man knows it! Knows, moreover, that the Woman that God gave him
Must command but may not govern; shall enthrall but not enslave him.
And She knows, because She warns him and Her instincts never fail,
That the female of Her species is more deadly than the male!"

Here is a whole mass of misconceptions. It is a pet delusion of Kipling's that women are created for the sole purpose of motherhood. Some years ago, in a book for school boys, he asserted that a boy is by nature shyer than a girl, because she is created for one purpose only, but the boy for several. The Woman's Journal pointed out at the time that this was a plain error. Women are created for motherhood, of course; but they are also equipped by nature for doing many other things.

Women's Vocations.

Jenny Lind was created to sing, Rachel and Modjeska and Bernhardt to act, Mrs. Booth to preach, Madame Curie to discover new facts in chemistry, Florence Nithingale and Clara Barton to organize hospitals. A number of women have given as clear proof that they were created to write as Mr. Kipling himself —some of them even more so. A multitude of women have shown that they are amply equipped by nature to manage institutions and charities, to carry on businesses, large and small; to be teachers, artists, physicians and surgeons, nurses, probation officers, police matrons.

It is not only "when Babe and Man are lacking" that women embrace convictions and causes. Elizabeth Cady Stanton had seven children; so had Harriet Beecher Stowe. The federated clubs have developed a host of women—most of them mothers of families—who are doing incalculable good in promoting education, combatting dirt and disease, sending out traveling libraries, working for pure food, and advancing the public wellfare in a score of ways.

Woman's Pity.

But, even if women existed solely for motherhood, it is not easy to see why, in order to be successful mothers, they must be "deadlier than the male." Since a woman "faces death by torture" whenever she bears a child, she must not be given to self-pity; but it does not follow that she must be devoid of pity for others. If she were, she would wring the baby's neck the first time it kept her awake by crying at night. Generations of nursing and caring for helpless children have developed the pitiful and tender-hearted side of human nature in women till it is now much more marked in them than in the opposite sex. When Kipling speaks of pity as a "purely male diversion," one is inclined to laugh.

Why must a mother be unable to "swerve before a fact?" If she is crossing the road with her baby in her arms, and sees an automobile bearing down upon them, she must swerve, or she and the baby will both be killed. She does swerve—and quickly. The person who really refuses to swerve before a fact is the obstinate theorist of either sex—like Mr. Kipling himself, who goes to irrelevant reptiles and savages to prove the superior deadliness of the civilized modern woman, and shuts his eyes to the statistics of murder. Why are a score of murderers less deadly than one murderess?

Woman as Counsellor.

If Mr. Kipling had the privilege of talking with Jane Addams, and if he denied some principle that she thinks important, does anyone seriously suppose that he would "meet no cool discussion," but would find her instantly "white-hot and wild?" The women who accomplish things are not those who fly into a rage at the first word of contradiction, but those who use patience and tact, who can allow for the other person's point of view, and who will compromise on non-essentials for the sake of securing essentials. The wild and white-hot woman is a poor counsellor as a wife, and brings up her children on an alternation of angry slappings and passionate caresses. If the average woman were the furious, merciless and irrational creature that Mr. Kipling pictures her, she would, indeed, be unfit to vote, but she would be equally unfit to bring up a family.

Her Sense of Justice.

In past years there was considerable plausibility in the statement that women had less sense of justice than men. The school to learn justice is said to be intercourse with one's equals. One of Elizabeth Stuart Phelps' characters says that women's eyelids would long ago have been worn off through constant looking up to men, if the balance had not been in some degree restored by their having to look down to children. In those days, if women were twitted with lack of justice, we could answer that it was not reasonable to expect them to play fair till they had had a chance to learn the rules of the game. Now they are getting a chance, in the many women's societies; and it is cheering to see how fast they are learning toleration and "team play."

Woman's Growth in Capacity.

If women were constitutionally unable to be just, it would be the most serious gap yet discovered in their natural equipment for their traditional work as mother and housemistress; for nowhere is justice more necessary than in dealing with children and servants. But there is no such constitutional incapacity. Women are learning to be more just, day by day. And meanwhile are our brothers in a position to throw stones? How much regard for either justice or pity is there in competitive business? How much less in those lines of business where competition has given place to monopoly?

The publishers of Mr. Edward W. Bok's magazine, in advertising this poem of Kipling's as an attraction, boast that "it is like a lash across a woman's face." If any one started out to convince women that they are unfit to vote by lashing them across the face with a real whip, we should have no fear of his making converts by such means. Tell women that they ought not to vote because they are too refined and angelic, and some silly women will be flattered; tell them that they ought not to vote because they are too ferocious and deadly, and they will either laugh or join the Suffrage Association. Every such attack on women by an anti-suffragist gives fresh impetus to the cause. The poem need not worry the friends of suffrage; but it may well make the friends of Mr. Kipling feel unnappy.

Mr. Kipling as Counsellor.

Mr. Kipling lately published a passionate appeal to Canada against reciprocity with the United States. By accepting reciprocity in trade, he declared, Canada would be "selling her soul;" and he intimated that it might result in her approximating to American standards in murder—the proportion of murders to the population in the United States and Canada being as 150 to 3. The fact is that Mr. Kipling is himself the sort of person who grows "white-hot and wild" when his national or sex prejudices are touched; and it is truly comic to see him reproaching women on the same score.

Mr. Tharp's Position

ing and false.

[The words: "You relate their vital and saved connection with the 'body of Christ' through their church membership," have no meaning to The Christian Century. To be saved, to be part of the body of Christ, to be a member of Christ's church, all mean the same thing, in our view, as they have always to the Disciples of Christ also.]

My position is that they are members of the great, spiritual "body of Christ" because they have believed in the Lord, Jesus Christ and have accepted him as their Saviour, after the manner they believe to be his sovereign will, and are trying to exponent the life that he requires.

[This is precisely our own position.]

Those who have not done this, and have presumptuously substituted something else for his requirement, I do not regard as members of the spiritual "body of Christ."

[Nor do we.]

3. "The Disciples know of no other way of admission into the Church of Christ except by being baptized into it."

It seems to me that one as discriminating as you usually are, should have detected the fallacy and falsity of this position. If you had said: The Disciples know of no other regular and authorized way of admission into the spiritual "body of Christ," your position would not have been disputed.

There is only one regular and authorized way of admission into the human family; but Cæsar was not admitted that way, and hundreds of others, every year, become parts of the human family without being admitted in the regular way. The irregularity of the manner of the admission of these did not dehumanize them, nor rob them of the honors, emoluments and rewards that are possible to individuals of the race; nor will the irregularity of the admission of the denominational brethren unchristianize and rob them. No, they are children of God, not because they are members of the churches they are identified with, but because they passed through the whole process of spiritual gestation, and missed it only in the parturition.

[This is brand-new doctrine to Disciples and, we think, to the New Testament. Where is Mr. Tharp's authority either in Disciples' literature or in the New Testament for asserting that one can be a member of the Church of Christ in a way that Christ has not authorized? We will have to leave our correspondent to the tender mercies of Dr. Sweeney who, speaking for the Disciples, agrees with The Christian Century in affirmation 3.]

4. "The Disciples believe that baptism as administered by these churches—irregular, defective and objectionable as they regard the manner of its administration—does actually induct men into the Church of Christ, and is therefore valid."

It would be difficult for you to put into an equal number of words a proposition that is further from the "best Disciple conviction of to-day." You admit that those who practice "sprinkling" and "pouring" obey not the form of the act that Jesus required, and yet they obey the act. And by the marvellous movements of a modern mind you are at perfect east in describing their substitute for his requirement as "irregular," "defective," "objectionable," and at the same time "valid."

[Mr. Tharp is in error here. We do not describe the substitute as valid.]

The "best Disciple conviction of to-day" is not going to get itself into any such absurd and ludicrous attitude as that. If it were true that "sprinkling" and "pouring" did "actually induct men into the Church of Christ," your "therefore" might be accepted; but it is far from the truth. They enjoy their sacred relation to God, not because of their "sprinkling" and "pouring," but in spite of it.

[Mr. Tharp is in error here again. We do not affirm that sprinkling or pouring—or immersion—does "actually induct men into the Church of Christ." To our mind this is a monstrous idea.]

If the great All-Father could not see into the hearts of men, and did not know that intent or purpose gives value and significance to actions, there would be scant hope for those who obey not the ordinance of baptism in its very form and spirit. The absolutism of the law is not of my making. Paul himself declared: "If I, or angel from heaven, preach any other gospel than that I have declared unto you, let him be accursed."

5. "The Disciples do not believe that baptism is a physical act."

You could have said just as truly that Disciples do not believe that baptism is a spiritual act. Why? Simply because neither statement declares fully the faith of the Disciples in this matter.

Disciples believe that baptism is a physical act plus. Disciples believe that baptism is a spiritual act plus. When Jesus said: "Go teach all nations, baptizing them," etc., he imposed on teachers the duty of baptizing those who accepted what they taught. The only baptism those teachers were required to perform was physical. The teacher's whole duty was performed when he had properly taught his pupil and had immersed him in water after the form of Jesus' requirement. If the one upon whom the holy ordinance came did not grasp its full significance, or yielded to it from sinister or ulterior motives, the teacher performed the act of baptism, but the pupil was not baptized.

If you will get to see this, and will stop this effort to etherealize baptism into a something utterly indefinable and intangible, but a something that will transpire whether one is "sprinkled," "poured" or "immersed," you will do yourself and the cause you love a valuable service; and furthermore, you will then be coming into the lofty continent of the best Disciple conviction of to-day.

[The Christian Century believes that when Jesus commanded the teachers of his religion to baptize their disciples he meant something far more significant than to immerse them in water. And if such a teacher did nothing more than to immerse such an instructed disciple in water both himself and his pupil fell far short of obedience to Christ's command. What this essential baptismal act was we have described in a response to W. F. Richardson's inquiry in The Christian Century of Feb. 22.]

6. "The Disciples believe that immersion only should be practiced in the administration of baptism, as a loving testimonial to Christ, and as a means to Christian unity."

In this affirmation you are more amazing, and are wider from the truth, than in any other of your positions. Think of it! "Disciples believe that immersion only should be practiced in administering baptism!" Baptism is a thing, without form and almost void, intangible, undefinable, and may be validly administered by "sprinkling," "pouring" or "immersion," but Disciples are not concerned about the validity of it, they insist only that it be administered by immersion!

[Our correspondent and readers are referred to the sixth paragraph of our comment on J. A. Clemens' communication elsewhere in this department.]

No, the position of the Disciples of Christ is that baptism is the immersion of a penitent believer in water, into the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, and that nothing else is. Nor do they practice it as a loving testimonial to Christ, and as a means to Christian unity." They practice it in loving obedience to Jesus, and "for the remission of sins." They agree that it is a loving testimonial to Christ, and is a means to Christian unity; but they prefer to state its purpose in New Testament terms.

N. S. Pittsburg, Pa. WALLACE THARP.

Do Not Desist!

Editors Christian Century: I have been much interested in the recent discussion in The Century. I beg of you not to desist because they say you are "divisive." The truth has ever been divisive from falsehood and error. Whatever may be true as to the preachers you have "named," I feel sure that the masses of intelligent laymen are with you. You can without fear "name" the whole lot of us. What a spectacle we present in the light of much of this contention in our assumed advocacy of Christian Union. The illiberality and narrowness of some of your critics is shocking. If that spirit is the end and fruit of our "plea" then it certainly wasn't worth while. You must not desist. The very stones would cry out if you held your peace. You are making the best church paper among "us." Open wide the throttle and let her go. Respectfully,

Adel, Iowa. JOHN B. WHITE.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

L. A. Chapman of Carmi reports that Leroy Shaw of Enfield is soon to enter the ministry—a young married man of good ability. Our preachers should constantly be on the lookout for good ministerial material, and help them to take up the work. Carmi has a very large union men's prayer-meeting, from 150 to 200 every week, and the women are having equally large meetings on Monday afternoons. This condition will probably result in a great union revival meeting.

Fifth district evangelist, Chas. D. Hougham, will hold a meeting at Pana soon.

C. J. Reynolds of Arrowsmith has accepted a call to Winchester to begin March 10.

The Carthage church gave W. W. Denham a unanimous call to remain with them another year at an increase in salary. By bequest of Mrs. Elizabeth Hughes the church comes into possession of a splendid nine-room house a block from the church. With some needed repairs it will be worth $4,000 and make a fine parsonage. The work there is difficult, and has had many discouragements, besides the loss of sixty-eight good members by removal, but they had a good meeting and are pulling steady.

Milo W. Nethercutt of Onarga has accepted a call to Moweaqua to begin April 1st. The Fife Brothers will begin a meeting at Onarga March 12, and they are hoping for good results.

This is a Christian service, maintained in the heart of the city for strangers and non-attendants of churches. The great auditorium is usually crowded. The congregation overflowed upon the stage the evening of Dr. Willett's address. He spoke on "The Man of Nazareth."

We announced last week the illness of Paul Moore, who is in the hospital at St. Petersburg, Fla., with typhoid fever. The latest reports from him are that he is much better and, by the time this is read, his friends hope that he will be in Eustis. The Christian Century wishes for our good friend a speedy return to health.

A. R. Liverett writes from Jefferson City, Mo., "Five young men by Confession Feb. 26. A husband and wife a week ago. This is a healthful evangelism. Our Christian Endeavor is on a betterment campaign to increase the membership to 100 and the outlook is most hopeful. Will take the offering for Foreign Missions next Sunday."

The Fullerton, Cal., Church, Bruce Brown, pastor, has organized a Sunday-school at Placentia, a new town, which is growing very rapidly. A large number of brick blocks are being erected. The school now has an attendance of seventy and it is thought will soon develop into a church, being the first religious force in the town, which adjoins the beautiful orange groves of T. M. Dowling and C. C. Chapman.

The passing from labor to rest of the aged ex-president of Kentucky University, Charles Louis Loos, occurred at his home in Lexington, Ky., February 27. So rich a life, so full of good deeds and noble services, and so well-rounded a period of years makes it seem almost out of place to offer sympathy to anyone, for the noble career is a rich heritage and the beatitudes of heaven apply doubly to those who mourn such a loss.

In this day of federated women's organizations for various purposes we do not recall having seen any mention of any such federation as that which exists in Jackson County, Mo. It is the Federation of Women's Bible Classes for the Christian Churches of Jackson county outside of Kansas City. May their good works be in proportion to the length of their corporate name.

H. E. Stafford writes from Massillon, O.: Crayton S. Brooks gave an address on the "Cure for Corruption in Politics" before a large audience on Monday the 11th. It was the occasion of an open meeting of the local Brotherhood. All the Brotherhoods and men's classes of the city were invited. The Mayor, Ex-Mayor, Council-men, President of the Board of Trade and many prominent citizens were present.

C. C. Wilson of Milwaukee delivered his lecture on "What's Wrong with the World?" at the Evanston church and the Douglas Park church (Chicago) on recent evenings. Both churches found his lecture full of good things. The lecturer concerned himself with the big human problems of the age which he interpreted in a new way. There was a pleasing delivery, an interesting style and ideas that commanded attention. Mr. Wilson lives in the midst of a Socialist administration in Milwaukee which adds interest to his ideas.

The evangelistic meeting at Little Rock, Ark,. where H. O. Breeden is preaching now, was turned into a temperance meeting after the services at a recent evening service to consider the three-mile petition which was up for appeal. When the day does come, as it surely will, when the evils of liquor-selling will be abolished, the historian will record that it was due to the persistent and faithful activity of the churches that the movement finally reached its consummation.

The preparations for the National Conventions next October are already under way. The Armory has been engaged for the meetings, which with its seating capacity of 20,000 and ample halls and committee rooms, will make an adequate meeting place. The committee is headed by Linley G. Gordon, president; and George A. Jones, as secretary, to whom all communications should be addressed, care of First Christian Church, 4th and Breckenridge Sts., Louisville, Ky.

H. H. Baker is expecting to accompany Dr. Shelton when the latter returns to Tibet and is giving his congregation in Central Avenue Church, Topeka, Kan., a series of lectures on the mission work around the world. The lectures are in the form of a journey around the world. The last one was on Tibet, the most remote of all fields and the one that will ever be sacred to Disciples on account of the heroic sacrifices that have been undergone there by the Rijnharts and the other missionaries that have wrought and suffered there.

Secretary I. N. McCash with C. M. Chilton and J. V. Baird have planned an itinerary for a series of parliaments on American Missions to begin on March 3. The itinerary is as follows:

March 3, St. Joseph, Mo.; March 4, Omaha, Neb.; March 5, Des Moines, Ia.; March 6, Davenport, Ia.; March 7, Peoria, Ill.; March 8, Decatur, Ill.; March 9, Bloomington, Ill.; March 10 and 11, Chicago, Ill.; March 12, Akron, Ohio; March 13, Columbus, O.; March 14, Columbus, Ind.; March 15, Louisville, Ky.; March 16, Owensboro, Ky.; March 17, Evansville, Ind., and Madisonville, Ky.

The Central Church of Christ at Warren, Ohio, is one of the oldest congregations in our brotherhood. Several years ago they celebrated their one hundredth anniversary. In the early years of its history this was a Baptist congregation, but in the beginning of our movement for a distinctively New Testament church, they discontinued the use of human names and practices becoming thereby simply a church of Christ. A few years ago they established, and have since fostered the second church, which has now grown to be almost as large as its mother. Both these churches have a splendid missionary record, and we should not be surprised but that their prosperity at home and their missionary spirit have a very intimate connection.

P. H. Welshimer of Canton, O., where a new church of 2,500 seating capacity has just been completed, went to work to secure a new building when he found that the old one was proving inadequate. There were no funds at hand to build the new one with but there were 2,200 members of the church and so he began to secure pledges at so much a day, ranging from one cent to ten cents, for the new church. When the canvass was made, the total amounted to $10,000 a year. Mr. Welshimer took the list of names to the bank and explained the matter to them and money was advanced by the bank to build the new building, the cost of which was $75,000.

Bernard Gruenstein, pastor of First Church, Selma, Ala., was for many years connected with the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. It is quite natural, therefore, that Mr. Gruenstein should be a believer in a liberal use of printer's ink by the church. In a recent talk he declared that the Bible itself is a newspaper, two of its books being actually called "Chronicles," a good old newspaper name. The word "gospel" itself means "good news" and the word "publish" occurs frequently in the Bible. One of the greatest kings in the Bible did not think it beneath his dignity to become the publisher of the Proverbs of Solomon and the preacher of Ecclesiasts was evidently acquainted with the book business. Therefore the church should advertise!

In connection with the Christian Conservation Congress, to be held in New York City, April 19-24, a large attendance of our people is expected, and, through the kindness of P. F. Jerome, headquarters have been arranged in the Hotel York, located at Seventh avenue and Thirty-sixth street, within two minutes' walk of the new Pennsylvania Railroad station and ten minutes' walk from the Grand Central terminal, and one block from Broadway. The York Hotel is operated on the European plan, and attractive rooms may be had ranging from $1.50 to $2 and up. Where two persons occupy the same room only $1 additional is charged. Reservations should be made at once.

E. N. Duty writes us from Charleroi, Pa.: Eight additions, six by baptisms, two by letter at regular services, since last report. A splendid reception was tendered to the new pastor and his wife Feb. 23rd. Over 200 guests were present and an excellent program was rendered and addresses were made by members of the Charleroi Ministerial Association. A Missionary Rally was held here Sunday evening, Feb. 25th, having with us Mrs. Virginia Erskine, a returned missionary from Japan and her three children, appearing in Japanese costumes. It was an inspiring service. This service was held to quicken our missionary conscience and prepare us for a large, liberal offering March 1st.

F. N. Calvin proposes to his congregation in the Christian Monitor the following solution of the problem of the evening service: "How would it do to dismiss the regular evening preaching service, have one great rousing preaching service in connection with the Lord's Supper in the morning, and give the afternoon and evening to special work, such as Christian Endeavor, teacher training, mission work, looking after the sick, visiting the absentees, etc., etc.? The pastor could be in the church office two hours every Sunday evening to talk with those who desire special conference on any subject relating to their salvation or work."

Mrs. H. B. Robison, of Canton, Mo., recently filled the pulpit where her husband preaches at Center, Mo. This news no longer strikes one as specially noteworthy, for we have become accustomed to the right of a woman to deliver any message that will be helpful and acceptable to the congregation.

What is announced as a new record is the coming forward of 180 converts in a single day in the meetings now in progress in Muskogee, Okla., under the direction of the Scoville Evangelistic company. The Muskogee Times-Democrat in an editorial about the meeting, declared that it was a good index to the character of the town that the largest crowd of men ever assembled in the convention hall, was the one which came together to hear the preaching. Not even the prize fights or the wrestling matches or the political conventions were able to draw together so many men.

Judging from the following quotation, from the Lima, (Ohio) Christian, the pastor of Lima church believes in missions: "During January quite a number of churches published in our leading papers an annual report of their work and their finances. One Ohio church reported all its financial obligations met, no building indebtedness, and more than one thousand dollars in its treasury. We took occasion to look up in our Year Book the Missionary rating of this congregation, and this is what we found. No offering to American Missions, no offering to Ohio Missions, but a paltry offering of a little more than thirty dollars to the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. As we see it, the name Christian is just about as appropriate to that church as the name Snowball is to a negro baby."

E. E. Elliott writes: The Christian Conservation Congress of the Men and Religion Forward Movement will be held in Carnegie Hall, New York City, April 19th to 24th. This will be to America what the Edinburg Conference was to England in May, 1910. The Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ is a participating agency in the Men and Religion Movement and we are hopeful of having a liberal representation among the three thousand delegates who will be seated at the Christian Conservation Congress. We urge that the societies and churches supporting our various workers be requested to send brethren to this Congress. It will mean much to the life of all our work in general. Those who are privileged to attend will be larger men in the future than they have been in the past.

I. J. Cahill writes of the successful raising of the debt on the church at Bellville, O., which had closed its doors for two years and where the workers had become discouraged. Some months ago, however, a few of the members determined to see what they could do to revive the work and sent for the secretary to help them. Following the dedication there was a meeting in which there were forty-four additions, including the mayor of the town. The work at South Akron, O., is prospering, also, though they have passed through some hard struggles. Another matter of which Secretary Cahill writes in his interesting letter is the dedication of the church at Brilliant, O., of a building worth $2,400, at which occasion $1,500 was raised, more than enough to cancel all the debt. This is the church where H. A. Pallister, who was loved by all the community, was pastor at the time of his death only a few weeks ago.

There is an interesting prohibition contest in progress in Waukegan, Ill. The town is a manufacturing center with many foreign voters and there has never been any hope of securing the passage of a local prohibition law. But during a recent street carnival, the Catholic rector was scandalized because objectionable features of the show were placed immediately in front of his church and he was not able to induce them to move nor could he persuade the authorities to make them get away. The result was that the priest announced that he would fight the saloons and drive them out of the place and there have been several meetings with this end in view. All the Protestant churches have joined hands with the Catholics in this fight and there is hope that it will be possible to secure a favorable vote on the matter. But whether it is done or not, the campaign will educate the people and hasten the solution of the problem.

Disciples of Christ have decided to enter upon a general campaign in behalf of the Church College. It is apparent that either such college must be adequately supported by the whole Disciples brotherhood getting under and behind it, or else we must abandon the entire educational system to the state. The campaign is to be started next June, but final preparations are to be made for it at a conference to be held in Indianapolis in May. The thing Disciples and other Christian bodies are up against is shown by the statement, made by a Disciple College promoter, that if the University of Illinois had to receive its income from an endowment that earned five per cent, it would require $60,000,000. In 1898 forty of the great private endowed schools, many of them church colleges, had 36,907 students. In ten years this number had increased to 55,532. During the same period forty of the great state schools increased their student body from 34,653 to 70,017. Ten of the private endowed schools lost in attendance, and every one of the ten was a church college well known for its excellent work. Disciples have just made a general offering for college support under Disciples control. Returns are not yet in, but it is realized on all sides that a more strenuous effort than we have ever made is demanded.

Plans are making for the holding of a great exhibition in Chicago in the spring of 1913, to set forth the missionary enterprise in all its magnitude. The exhibition will be called "The World in Chicago," and is the same, in general character, as that which was held in Boston a year ago, and which will be held shortly in Cincinnati. The plans for Chicago are very extensive and ambitious. No less than 20,000 people will take part in the exhibition proper, and 15,000 more in the pageant in the Auditorium, making 35,000 in all who will be actively engaged in the work. It is expected that the attendance will reach a million. Plans are now in progress to reach each of the 1,100 churches in the city with an appeal for co-operation. One effect of the exhibition is that there is always a greatly increased interest in missions both from the financial and the personal standpoint. Each of the 20,000 participants will undergo a course of instruction in missions, so that all may be properly informed on the subject with which they are to occupy themselves in the exhibition. There will certainly be great good result from such an enterprise. No other way has been thought out that is so effective in presenting to the entire community the facts of the missionary enterprise in a short space of time. The exhibition is self-supporting. It is interesting to learn that the idea originated in the mind of an English gentleman who had no notion of its growing into such proportions, but started in a small town in England with a collection of curios. The exhibition has already been held more than twenty times in as many cities.

In connection with the Christian Conservation Congress to be held in New York City, April 18-24, a large attendance of our people is expected and, through the kindness of P. F. Jerome, headquarters have been arranged in the Hotel York, located at 7th Avenue and 36th Street, within two minutes' walk of the new Pennsylvania railroad station and ten minutes' walk from the Grand Central Terminal, and one block from Broadway. The York Hotel is operated on the European plan and attractive rooms may be had, ranging from $1.75 to $2.00 and up. Where two persons occupy the same room, only $1 additional is charged. Reservations should be made at once, as difficulty may be experienced, if delayed.

Foreign Society News

Herbert Smith, Lotumbe, Congo, Africa, has been elected president of the missionary bodies in the Congo.

The missionaries in Africa feel that they have never been so much pressed for laborers as now. The work has grown rapidly. At Bolenge, for example, there is a membership of about 800 with ninety-nine evangelists in that field, and the steamer, "The Oregon," is to be looked after. This is a heavy burden upon Mr. and Mrs. A. F. Hensey and Miss Eck.

The station at Longa has 290 members and thirty-six evangelists; at Lotumbe there are 250 members and fifty-two evangelists. The care of the churches and the direction of the evangelists is almost an overwhelming work.

The Monieka station, the pride and joy of the hearts of the missionaries, is a source of much anxiety. Who shall occupy this important place? There is now a membership of about 400, and they have 105 evangelists. The Bolenge workers are trying to direct this work as well as their own.

Never in the splendid history of the work in the Congo has the harvest been riper, or the hearts of the people so receptive. But who is there to run the Oregon. Where are the three doctors they have been asking for? Who is to open Monieka? The missionaries

Vital and Timely Books

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing. You need every one of this splendid list.

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST

By Edward Scribner Ames, Ph. D., author of "The Psychology of Religious Experience." 123 pages. Cloth, 75 cents, postpaid.

A book which lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day. Dr. Ames treats the Unitarian-Trinitarian controversy with a freshness and illumination that in itself makes his work a distinct contribution to religious thought. The book is more than a treatise. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, says:

"These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames's position at all times must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

say "Have the brethren in the home land forgotton Africa? Have we built up by the grace of God and the gospel of Jesus Christ this work of which we are so proud only to see it go to pieces because there is no one to care for it?"

D. O. Cunningham, writing from Harda, India, January 27, says, "The evangelists are much elated over the prospect of several baptisms in our outside villages soon. I believe the one great need is simply holding on and pounding away. Plague has made its appearance in Harda at last. For months it has been doing its deadly work in surrounding towns and villages. In Jubbulpore there are from ninety to one hundred deaths a day. We are hoping that it may not spread through the town."

David Rioch, writing from Mungeli, India, Jan. 16, says, "At this time of writing we are way out in a district covering territory we have never been over before. The people in some of the villages are rather afraid of us, but when we get acquainted listen to the story of the cross with great interest. Our lantern meetings at night are very largely attended. Mrs. Rioch has been able to relieve and comfort many women in the villages who so much need this care. We shall be out all the month."

David Teachout, a consecrated and a rising young business man of Cleveland, Ohio, has recently placed the Foreign Society under special obligations by valuable gratuitous service among business men. When our churches are filled with such devoted "laymen" we will soon Christianize the world for our Lord.

"I feel sure we will reach our $600 this year."—Claud J. Miller, Maryville, Mo.

"Took pledges for the March Offering yesterday in South Dallas Christian Church, amounting to an increase of ten times what was given last year and twice over our apportionment."—E. C. Sharpe, Dallas, Tex.

"We began our offering at Waveland last Sunday."—Hally C. Burkhardt, Indianapolis, Ind.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the month of February, amount to over $14,000, which is more than twice as much as has been received during that month for the past four years. Most of this amount is from regular receipts. We start in the March Offering with a gain of $7,500 over the receipts of last year. Let us see to it that the gain during March surpasses anything we have ever experienced.

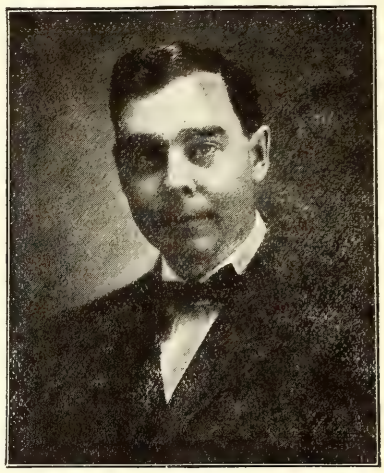
Words of cheer concerning the March Offering come from every quarter. Many churches seem determined to do better than in the past. One church, for example, apportioned $600 would not have it, but say they will send $700. A large number of churches are striving to reach the thousand dollar mark. A host of churches are taking more interest. We can conquer the world if we will. The gospel has the same power it possessed when Paul preached it. That gospel must be "sounded out" by the churches.

The Associated Press Dispatch a few days ago contained the following: "Five thousand government students in the city of Canton, China, went to the temples and cut off the heads of all the gods in the temples and carried the headless gods through the streets crying 'Our gods are dead!' The citizens of the streets applauded." Who can estimate the full measure of the wonderful Revolution in China.!

E. W. Allen's Resignation

E. W. Allen has resigned as secretary of the Foreign Society to take effect March 10, when he begins as pastor of the Central Church, Decatur, Ill.

Mr. Allen has rendered most helpful aid in the work of the society during the past three years. He is a strong preacher, indeed one of our very best. As an advocate of foreign missions in the churches and upon the platform of the conventions his addresses have been uniformly convincing and stirring. The services he has rendered in the missionary rallies and in the educational campaign have been exceptionaly effective.



Rev. E. W. Allen.

He now turns to the pastorate again. The splendid church he goes to serve is certainly most fortunate. He is a spiritual leader of large and successful experience. And we would not forget also to extend our most sincere congratulations to his bright and interesting little family to which he is so tenderly devoted and which has given him up so willingly for his long and strenuous campaigns.

E. W. Allen is a growing man. He has not yet reached the full zenith of his splendid powers and influence in the Kingdom of God. His associates in the Foreign Society entertain for him only sentiments of the most cordial and affectionate appreciation and wish for him the largest possible measure of usefulness and the fullest possession of the Divine favor.

Benevolent Association News

Plans for the new orphanage building in Dallas, Texas, are well under way. The new building will cost $30,000, and will accommodate at least one hundred children. It is being designed for the especial needs of the work. While not a single dollar will be expended unnecessarily, yet the plans provide for a modern building. The Lord is worthy of the best.

On account of a misunderstanding somewhere the contributions of the churches to the National Benevolent Association were not given place in the statistical report of the new Year Book. The Sunday-school offerings were reported, but it was not understood that this report was to include the offerings from the churches. The association will send its annual detailed report for 1911 free to anyone desiring it.

While last year was the best financially in the history of the association, it was the hardest. The association made a very substantial gain, but this gain was all in the annuity funds. The annuity funds are not available for use until after the death of the annuitant. They are invested and the interest is used to pay the annuity. The amount collected for the bread-and-butter fund, which after all is the fund of vital importance to the association, was smaller last year than usual. This, with the high price of living and a larger number than usual sent in by the churches for support, has made the burden unusually heavy.

The churches are taking an increased in-

The Best

The Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 are in The Life of Christ. You want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition has just been issued to meet the great demand. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. terest in the care of their poor, and as a result new families are arriving at the homes of the association almost every day. Only a few days since a widow with her children and a letter from the church at Lyons, Kansas, arrived at our St. Louis Home. The association exists to help the churches, but the churches must not forget that the association can not make brick without straw, can not feed widows and orphans without money.

Everything depends upon the response of the Sunday-schools to the Easter call. Upon this offering the living expenses of the several homes of the association depend. The offering ought not to fall a dollar below $30,000 this year. If the Sunday-schools don't volunteer a good offering, it becomes necessary to send for it, and the messengers must be paid. Economy and Christianity demand a generous offering. J. H. Rosecrans has prepared a fine cantata. Send to the association, 2955 N. Euclid Ave., St. Louis, for it. It is free. JAS. H. MOHORTER.

Missouri State Work

For the information and encouragement of our Missouri churches the following facts concerning our State Mission work are given:

First, since the resignation of our corresponding secretary, D. Y. Donaldson, which was presented to the board Jan. 4, he has continued in charge of the work, and has done all he could to put it forward. He has served the board during February without salary, and as he began his duties as associate pastor at the Independence Blvd. Church, Kansas City, Feb. 1, he has carried the double work during the month. During these two months there have been frequent meetings of the Executive Committee of the State Board, and the most thoughtful consideration of the work. Mr. Donaldson retires entirely from the work Feb. 29.

Second, the office of the society will be maintained in room 1201 R. A. Long Bldg., Kansas City, a competent stenographer is employed, and the executive committee has engaged R. B. Briney to become office secretary for the remainder of this missionary year. Mr. Briney is pastor of the Forest Ave. Church, Kansas City, and has arranged to use a part of each day in the state board office. He is thoroughly familiar with all our missionary organizations, and is capable of doing much to stimulate an interest in our state work. The board feels that it is fortunate in being able to secure him to look after this work. All correspondence relative to state mission work should be addressed to him.

Third, preparations are well under way for one of the strongest and best state conventions Missouri has ever had. It is a time, not of crisis, but of transition in our state work, and the wisest and best souls among us may well give the matter the most earnest and prayerful consideration. We hope the convention will give time for the serious and earnest consideration of some of the problems confronting us. Committees are already at work preparing their reports, and we will come to the convention to think and talk and pray over some matters of the most vital importance to the life and work of our Missouri churches.

R. GRAHAM FRANK,
Pres. State Board.

Church Union in Canada

affirming the position of the Methodist Church as that of seeking the organic union of all evangelical churches in Canada, adopted a resolution in which we find the following definite statement:

"Whereas, a definite proposal has been discussed to some extent in the press and elsewhere looking to ultimate organic union of the Presbyterian, Congregational, and Methodist churches in Canada, this general conference, in no spirit of exclusiveness toward others not named, declares that it would regard a movement with this object in view with great gratification, believing that the deliberate friendly discussion of the doctrinal, practical, and administrative problems involved, with the purpose of reaching an agreement, would not only facilitate the finding and formulation of a basis of union, but would also educate the people interested into a deeper spirit of unity, and into that spirit of reasonable mutual concession on which the successful consummation of such movements ultimately so largely depends."

Joint Committee.

A union committee was appointed by this conference to meet any committees that might be appointed by the other churches named. Committees were appointed by the other churches and in 1904, the first conference of the joint committee took place. This committee was subdivided into sub-committees charged respectively to consider all matters bearing upon the following subjects: Doctrine, Polity, the Ministry, Administration and Law. At each conference the findings of the sub-committees were considered and as adopted were ordered to be printed and sent to the various churches. The final meeting of this joint committee was in December, 1908, when it succeeded in finding a basis of union and concluded its work.

Friendly Negotiations.

These had been five happy years of most friendly negotiations. One of the last acts of the joint committee was to pass a resolution commending their work to the churches concerned, and in it they give thanks to God and "in the brotherly spirit of their deliberations, in the harmony of their decisions, and in the solution of many difficulties presented to them, they recognize the guidance of the divine spirit." "They commit it (the basis of union) to the great head of the church for His blessing, and to those portions of His church which they represent with confident hope of their approval."

Matter Matured.

The matter has thus had ample time to be matured. It is thirteen years since that symposium in the Guardian and eight years since the beginning of the work of the joint committee. In many ways, the people have been coming together. Sunday-school associations, Y. M. C. A. work, Christian Endeavor societies, evangelistic efforts, and the laymen's missionary movements, are but outstanding measures of co-operation. There has been much intermarrying and constant exchanging of pulpits. Truly there has been "unity of the spirit in the bond of peace" and the joint committee might honestly look with "confident hope" to the consummation of the union, over which they so faithfully, prayerfully, and successfully labored.

Adopted by Congregationalists.

The basis of union has been adopted by the Congregationalists. The official bodies of the Presbyterian and Methodist churches have also been carefully discussed and heartily indorsed the basis of union, and have now referred it to the members of their churches for final ratification.

—Christianity is not merely a record of past wonders; it is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth" at this very moment.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS. THE WINTER OF 1912 SURPASSES ALL RECORDS

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

A STORMY BEGINNING

A severe storm raged in most parts of the country on the first Sunday in March. This interfered very much with the March Offering. We have reports to this effect from every quarter. The friends will have to put forth special effort lest the offering for Foreign Missions be injured.

We have many most cheering reports. A large number of churches have passed their apportionments. A number are giving for the first time. New Living-links are being enrolled. The "old guard" is standing faithfuly at its post of duty.

Comparing the receipts for the first six days of March with the corresponding six days last year shows a gain of $1,494. The receipts for the first three days following the offering show a gain of $900 over the corresponding three days of last year. The showing would have no doubt been far better had not the almost unprecedented storm hindered.

The total gain on the year is $8,773. The gain in contributing churches to March 1 is 223. These figures encourage us to hope that the gains will not only be continued, but will be much increased.

These are wonderful days of opportunity. They are without a parallel in the history of the world. We cannot afford to falter or look back now. Our Lord trusts us and we must be true.

Please attend to the offering in your church at once. Make it as large as the circumstances will permit. And we ask every church and friend to be prompt in forwarding the offering. Sometimes the missionary money is permitted to remain in the church treasury for months, and even a year, before it is sent to the missionary treasury. It is important that we deal squarely with the missionaries on the other side of the world.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the month of February amounted to $14,910, a gain over the corresponding month last year of $9,046. There was also a gain of seventy-one contributing churches. The gain in personal gifts amounted to $4,648. There was also a gain of $5,150 in annuities. The Christian Endeavor societies sustained a small loss.

Send offerings today, if it is all ready, to

GREAT GAINS IN CHURCH EXTENSION RECEIPTS

The Million Dollar Mark in Sight.

From Oct. 1, 1911, to March 4, 1912, the Church Extension Board has received $49,244.90 of new receipts. This is within $10,823.50 of the total receipts of last year, the total receipts of the last year being $60,068.40. This is a gain of $25,192.59 over the same period last year. This brings the fund up to $940,017.49, which means that we have $60,000 to get to reach the million dollar mark by the close of 1912.

Of the above amount $8,513.39 came from the churches, which is a gain of $1,201.00 over last year for the same period. There is also an increase in the number of contributing churches.

Since our last report our board has received the following gifts on the Annuity Plan: $2,000 from one friend in Illinois, and $3,000 from another; $500 from one friend in Missouri and $1,000 from another. The board also received $5,000 from two good friends of Church Extension in California. The board has received a $10,000 gift from a good preacher friend of Church Extension, in Missouri. This makes 326 gifts on the Annuity Plan, and there is now $338,216.13 in the Annuity Fund. Our Annuity Fund has helped to build, up to March 1, 194 church buildings.

During the month the following loans have been closed: Burlington, Colo., $1,000 from the Annuity Fund; Hennessey, Okla., $1,500 from the Annuity Fund; Palouse, Wash., $3,500 from Annuity Fund and Jefferson, Ga., $1,500 from Dr. J. W. Gill fund.

The applications for help are still pouring in. During the month of February there were twenty-nine appeals, as follows: Greenup, Ill.; Anthony, Kans.; Baldwin, Ga.; Scotts Blub, Nebr.; Springfield, Ga.; Worth, Mo.; St. Albans, W. Va.; Alba, Mo.; Corning, Calif.; Randle, Wash.; Toledo, Ohio, Norwood Ave. Church; Belpre, Kans.; Fairview, Okla.; Grinels, Va.; Dallas, Tex., South Side Church; Pittsburg, Pa., Sheraden Church; Cedartown, Ga., Buchanan Church; Galax, Va.; Louisville, Ky., Flora Heights Church; E. Liberty, O.; Culdesac, Ida.; Bakersfield, Calif.; Snyder, Okla.; Battleground, Wash.; Malabar, Fla.; Barberton, O.; Seattle, Wash., University Place Church; Mongo, Ind.; Moorehead, Ky.

The ambition of the Board of Church Extension this year is to reach the Million, if possible, by the time of the Louisville convention and not later than the close of 1912.

All remittances should be sent to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 603 New England Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

The Weight of Character

THE fundamental principle of democracy is the equality of all men before the law. This means that essentially one man is as good as another, so far as the weight of his character and affirmations are involved. While it can never be true that men are equal in their advantages, either natural or acquired, it ought always to be possible to accept this basic claim of democracy that they are equal in the values of their citizenship. This is of course the actual meaning of the opening sentences of the Declaration of Independence, that venerable document which everybody reveres and nobody reads.

Yet nothing is more evident than the unsubstantial character of this claim when applied to men in general. No fact is more patent than that no two men have precisely the same weight of character. The testimony of no two persons in court is of equal value. When two witnesses swear to precisely opposite versions of a given incident the court and the jury invariably reserve the right to choose the one narrative rather than the other for credence. In fact were not this the case justice would frequently reach an impasse, for it is often the experience of the courts that evidence of entirely contradictory nature, yet sworn to in the most solemn manner, is introduced for consideration. In the last issue it is the weight of character that must determine the decision.

Two notable instances of this principle have recently engaged the attention of the country, one in the national capital and the other in this city. The first is the case of Mr. Lorimer, elected to the United States Senate two years since by the legislature of the state of Illinois, but under circumstances so suspicious that in spite of powerful interests invoked in his behalf popular opinion compelled an investigation of the case.

After many weeks of hearing and thousands of dollars spent in the process of investigation by members of the United States Senate, it was the decision of the investigating body that the evidence presented to it was not sufficient to justify the expulsion of the sitting member from his seat. No one affirmed that his election had been properly conducted or honestly secured. It was the plea rather that a sufficient number of facts in the indictments against him could not be proved, and therefore an adverse decision was unwarranted.

In this inquiry the testimony of many men had been received, but these witnesses were of such diverse sort and the impression produced upon the judges was so divergent that only the weight of character in the case of the different men supplied a criterion of judgment.

The same case has just passed through a second stage of inquiry. The technical points of the former investigation were favorable to the defendant, but the impression left by the mass of evidence produced and by the character of the witnesses for the prosecution and the defense respectively deepened the conviction throughout Illinois and the nation that a national disgrace impended if Mr. Lorimer were permitted to retain his seat in the upper house. And here again the weight of character has been the criterion. Every charge has been met with direct and categorical denial. It seems easy to secure witnesses to affirm the negative of every accusation. But summing up the evidence and the character of the witnesses public opinion has been more than ever confirmed in its conclusion that Mr. Lorimer is totally unfit to represent the state of Illinois in the United States Senate.

The second instance in point is that of Mr. Hines, the late president of the Lumber Dealers Association. It was widely reported that he was active in the effort to elect Mr. Lorimer; that he solicited large sums of money to make up a fund of at least a hundred thousand dollars to insure that election, and that he boasted in various places, notably at the Union League Club of this city, that he had "put Lorimer over." At that time there was no apprehension that the matter would be scrutinized by public investigators. The political conscience was not very sensitive as to methods employed, and perhaps Mr. Hines felt a pardonable degree of pride in his share of the work.

Later, however, when his conduct became the subject of judicial inquiries he denied every item of the charges against him, and produced the usual line of witnesses to make good his claim. Here again the dominant question to be decided by public opinion and by those directly and officially interested in Mr. Hines' conduct, was essentially the weight of character. On the principle of democracy the assertion of Mr. Funk, president of the American Harvester Company, that Mr. Hines had solicited from him a gift of ten thousand dollars, would have no more weight than Mr. Hines' emphatic denial that such was the case. But public opinion, which usually inclines to fairness in spite of temporary prejudice or misinformation, regarded Mr. Funk's as the more convincing statement. This opinion was also shared by the directors of the Union League Club, who after careful deliberation upon all the evidence obtainable, and after patient attention to the statements of Mr. Hines and his counsel, expelled him from membership in the Club by an almost unanimous vote.

Mr. Hines has felt the necessity of resorting to the most accessible means of justifying his conduct. He has taken the usual procedure of those who find themselves under grave suspicion in the public mind. He has sued Mr. Funk for a large sum in the civil courts. If the case ever comes to trial, which is of course an open question, the court must still decide, waiving technicalities, on the basis of the weight of character. And in the last issue such judgments are not likely to be far from correct.

Men suffer at times from false accusation or an imperfect knowledge of the circumstances on the part of the public. But the general character and reputation of a man have a singular way of appearing to vindicate or condemn him in the general mind, and the weight of character is the final arbiter.

Social Survey

A Commission on the Unemployed

The unemployed in Chicago this winter are reported to be an army of 125,000 men. This is the group of unemployed without resources and does not include the "idle rich." A commission has been appointed in Chicago to study this problem of unemployment. The commission will first endeavor to ascertain whether the number of unemployed without resources really is so great as reported and then study causes and remedies. The newspapers after the last snow storm advertised for men to help in clearing away the snow. The transportation companies were not able to secure men enough at that emergency season. This placed some doubt upon the accuracy of our statistics in the matter of unemployment.

Unemployment results from social change. The wants of the American people are fickle and in any given year some trades will be rushed and others slack. Since a man cannot change trades involving skill in a single summer, those in the slack trades suffer hardship. Also some communities are hunting for men while others have a considerable number of the unemployed.

One of the remedies for unemployment that has been proposed has been to have a federal bureau transport laborers to the sections where they are needed. Just now there is a brisk demand for farm laborers. The farms were never yielding such good returns for labor invested. Perhaps we should help solve the problem of unemployment in part if some of the idle men in Chicago were sent to the farms where their labor is in demand.

The Church in Politics

To propose that the church go into politics is the most unpopular of all suggestion today. We at once think of the Mormon octopus with its control of railroads and senators, more political today than any other church in America. We think of the next ecclesiastical power in politics, the Roman church, which manages to get our department of state to attend masses and secures the appointment of nuns in the Indian schools. We propose that the church shall go into politics but in no such reprehensible way as this.

The church Brotherhood or men's club is the place to awaken civic interest. Partisan issues should be barred, but here is the place to awaken a conscience on the duty of going to primaries and elections with the Christian vote. The corruption of municipal politics is largely due to the stay-at-home vote which is the decent vote. When the men of the church become educated in political conscience, we may trust them to vote what party ticket they please, for we shall be sure that they shall carry into politics what has been so notoriously lacking, honesty.

Shall Preachers Unionize?

This question is sometimes asked facetiously when the needs of the ministry are presented. Few, however, realize that the world is facing a serious problem in reference to its religious leaders. Both England and America report a decline in ministerial students. It is becoming more and more difficult for the church to find men of sufficient calibre to carry on her work. Yet never before was there such a growing appreciation of the social function of religion. Some social students make religion the inevitable prop of the social order. All agree in assigning to the church a place of leadership in cultivating the sympathy and brotherliness upon which a higher society must rest. Yet most communities are now paying their carpenters more than they are paying the ministers.

Some would say that this is right since the ministry is not a money-making profession, but men go into it to to good. While the minister is not usually a money-seeker, he has the right to the tools for his work. He is asked to dress himself and family better than the carpenter does and has suggestions at times from well-meaning people about keeping up to the times in dress. He leads in the giving of his church, giving away more than some men with many times his income. He must buy expensive books and magazines, go to the conventions, and in the cities attend no end of lunches, or not be in touch with his world. All this after he has invested time and money in an education superior to that of the average lawyer or doctor.

Altruism is a beautiful thing but the minister has a right to a chance to educate his children. He has a right to some other fate for his old age than the poor-house. The ministers who have quit and gone into business have in many cases done so that they might fulfil their duty to the family. To quit is not different than to go on a strike. We are face to face with a ministerial strike now in the hundreds of men leaving the ministry. That a generation with luxuries never before known in the history of the world should treat its ministry in this way is well-nigh unbelievable. We are not in favor of the ministerial strike nor of a ministerial union with wage scale and hours, attractive as the latter sounds, but we are in favor of social justice for the man of the cloth. He is a workman that needs not to be ashamed. He is a laborer that is worthy of his hire from every point of view. The average of six hundred dollars a year for the ministry of the United States needs to be doubled.

Using the School House

We have about a billion dollars invested in school buildings in this country. In days gone by it was difficult to get one of these buildings open for any other public use than the running of a school. It is true, in rural districts the school-houses have sometimes been used as churches but always with the hazard of some narrow-minded sectarian or blatant infidel objecting and terminating the arrangement. In the cities the school-houses have for the most part been locked except when the work of the school proper was going on. In a certain school we know in a medium sized city a ward school house has been opened up for the use of the community. One evening a week a dancing club uses the large hall of the building. The next a sewing club with volunteer instructors meets there. The following night is library night when you can either read in the building or play checkers as many of the older men do. On Thursday night there is a night school where sixty men and women immigrants are eagerly learning the rudiments of English. On Friday night an educational lecture is given free every week. On Sunday afternoon there is an address of some sort, often by a local minister. At none of these group meetings of the neighborhood is there any charge except for the dancing club.

It is still further suggested that the school building be used as an election headquarters on election day, instead of the kind of place so often chosen. The enterprising principal who is developing the idea has many other projects which he will try as time goes along. On this program, the community becomes acquainted with the school people in a helpful way and a neighborhood which is too much divided on sectarian issues can meet together sometimes to hear a religious talk when this would be impossible in any church.

Our political and religious sectarianism has hopelessly divided many communities but the way to unity is to be found in this device of making the school-house the symbol of the neighborhood's unity. The unused buildings all over the land are a reproach to our intelligence. It occurs to the writer that in communities where there is a non-progressive school board, the local church might take to itself some of these functions. We have too often thought that institutional church work meant gymnasiums and equipment. This public school we mention has no other equipment than a hall but does an enormous amount of "institutional church work." In every community there is need of instruction, amusement and a larger neighborhood consciousness.

Suffering in China

While the world has been interested in the revolution in China, a famine of more than usually large proportion has been taking its toll of human life. The over-flow of some of the rivers is always accompanied with loss of property and loss of life. Last summer destruction flooded an area of fifty thousand square miles, devastated the crops in the valleys and brought three millions of people to the very door of starvation. A strong famine relief committtee was organized in China and President Taft has issued a proclamation asking for help for the people. The money will be used to furnish work to the able-bodied and relief to all others. Those who labor will be employed in the work of building up dykes that will prevent the rivers from destroying property in this way again.

There will be no relief for the suffering people other than our gifts until the month of May, when the next crop will be harvested. Fifteen dollars will save a whole family from starvation owing to the lower cost of living in China. A box party at the theater, many an unnecessary luxury of other sorts, should be given up that precious lives may be saved. In these days of reconstruction in China the time was never more propitious to impress upon the minds of the Chinese an idea of the real spirit of our Christianity. Offerings for the relief fund may be sent to Mr. Orson Smith, 112 W. Adams St., Chicago, where it will be receipted for and sent promptly to the field. This is the official agency chosen by the committee in China for the carrying out of the relief plans.

The Constant Wrestle with Human Nature

The Living Church, (Episcopalian) furnishes an interesting essay on "The Church's Greatest Peril," which it declares to be "the lack of loyalty." It shows how tenaciously human nature holds its own, and resists the attempt of every creed to mould it to its own form. How often have we heard some brother or more likely, some sister, say: "If only we had a beautiful service like the Episcopalians; if only we had such elaborate music; if we had the stateliness, the decorum, the reverence for God's house, what wonders could we not accomplish!" But even our good neighbors, the Episcopalians, have their troubles, too, and while they may judge their members by a somewhat higher standard than the non-ritualistic churches, even so they make no secret of the fact that they constantly wrestle with human nature. The article referred to says, in part:

One would suppose that those who had been made by their baptism, members of the church, and whose associations have been with its services from childhood, would grow up with a sincere love and appreciation for it. One would also suppose that the clergy would do their utmost to foster such love and appreciation. But is this so? Undoubtedly it is in many cases. But in many, many more it is not. "I'd rather go down to the Congregational Sunday-school; they have something going on there, but Mamma won't let me," said one girl of fourteen to a visitor. "I didn't like the service this morning a bit, either," she said. The visitor, a well-trained churchwoman, said: "Do you know why you didn't find the service interesting? It was because you took no part in it. If you had taken your prayer book and joined in the service, you would have found a great deal in it." The girl gave an impatient flirt to her shoulders and evidently thought her companion a bore. But it was due to a lack of positive training.

All of which sounds perfectly familiar to us. Those conditions do not belong exclusively to the Episcopal church, we are sorry to say. For our own peace of mind, we wish some church had a monopoly on them, but that would be an unchristian wish. It takes more than Episcopacy or Methodism, or any other ism to triumph over human nature.

Great Problems for Methodists

The approaching conference of the Methodist church in May is exciting much interest in that body. It convenes once in four years, and will be composed of eight hundred delegates. They represent three and one-half million Methodists. The conference will elect several new bishops and elect the secretaries of the missionary and benevolent boards, editors of denominational papers, and managers of large publishing and Sunday-school interests. Here are some of the problems they will deal with:

"Shall Methodist bishops be made diocesan?" Shall there be a time limit to Methodist pastorates?" "Shall there be a Supreme Court of Methodism?" "Shall the official attitude of Methodism toward popular amusements be changed?" "Shall there be any credal change?" "Shall there be organic union of Methodist bodies, involving twenty millions of people?" "Shall laymen have a voice in annual conferences that station all preachers for the year?" "The possibilities of the rural churches and how to attain them."

There will be consideration of such subjects as temperance, peace and war, marriage and divorce, labor and capital, and other live issues of our day.

The Index Expurgatorius

Rome has many ways of suppressing heresy, which is to say suppressing thought. If Rome's war on progress in earlier days had succeeded, we should not have been far removed even now from the conditions of the Middle Ages. To her eyes, the world would have worn the sullen aspect of the winter's sky. But the human mind could not be suppressed, notwithstanding the terrible power of Rome, and light broke through the dark clouds. Heresy is not a good thing, but we cannot always be sure that heresy is not genius, and that the martyr is not a true prophet. Therefore it is better to harbor a heretic that a prophet might not be destroyed, and to risk a new doctrine in the hope that possibly it may change our civilization for the better.

Even Rome's infallibility could not prevent her from committing blunders, to use a mild term, for which her friends are now apologizing. Her infallible theology has often been exchanged for the teaching of the heretic. The pope who could not err is buried and forgotten; the heretic who championed error is not only among the immortals, but he sits at the fireside of scholar and peasant alike. Some forms of Protestantism are not much better than Rome in this matter of arraigning the heretic.

The Protestant is horrified at the cruelty of Rome, but he proceeds to do precisely what Rome has done, minus fire and dungeon. The forms of punishment have been changed, thanks to the age, and not to the heresy hunter; the spirit of Rome survives. In Rome, learning pronounced judgment on the theology of the accused; in Protestantism, it is too often that ignorance pronounces the judgment. But there is no sure guardian of the faith among faithful men on whom we can depend for the final word; no Holy Father to pronounce unerring judgment except Father Time. We can trust him for the verdict from which there will be no appeal.

So with the end in view of protecting the age from the aggressions of the heretic, the Congregation of the Index, on January 29, placed upon the Index Expurgatorius three dangerous books: "Letters to His Holiness Pius X", published in Chicago in 1910; "The History of Modernism in New England," published in Boston in 1911; and Monsignor Duchesne's "Ancient History of the Church."

Since there are no penalties attached, and publishers cannot be prevented from selling to those who will buy, and since the books are now thrust into notice, it is likely that the thunders of the Vatican will only help forward the disintegrating process for the best ends which its prohibitions were intended to arrest.

—Since his return to London, Dr. Reginald J. Campbell has been enjoying good health, despite reports to the contrary. He was delighted with his American tour of three months, his sharpest criticisms being reserved for our newspaper reporters. It is understood that in the absence of short hand facilities, the reporter is at liberty to draw on his imagination for facts. Dr. Campbell must have felt that David's sweeping statement, "All men are liars," should be allowed to stand. But public men in America have learned to appraise the reporter at his proper value. For him we have another Scripture which meets the demands of the case without the exercise of severity. When we read what the reporters say of us we seek relief in the prophet's "Who hath believed our report!"

—President Taft, Ambassador Bryce, and Editor J. A. Macdonald, of Toronto, will speak together on International Night at the Christian Conservation Congress of the Men and Religion Forward Movement, New York City, April 19-24. Upon a succeeding night, Mr. William Jennings Bryan and William T. Ellis will share the theme of America's foreign influence. Archdeacon Madden, of Liverpool; Bishop Greer, Bishop William McDowell, Fred B. Smith, John R. Mott, J. Campbell White, Robert E. Speer, Booker T. Washington and ex-Governor Northern, of Georgia, are among the distinguished speculation has become current as to the sources whence his $6,000 country in the Men and Religion campaigns will also be heard.

—At last a successor to Dr. Jowett has been found for Carrs Lane Chapel, Birmingham, in the Rev. Sydney M. Berry, son of the late Charles A. Berry, who twenty-five years ago was called to succeed Henry Ward Beecher. The famous call "made" Berry, and there are those who say the Birmingham call will make the son. It is said that he will accept.

—Since Dr. Len Broughton has decided to go to London some speculation has become current as to the sources whence his $6,000 stipend is to come. It is said that the congregation is unable to meet such an obligation. Possibly, the Doctor will take a hand in financing the church himself, as he has done such things before.

—Dr. J. H. Jowett has asked the ushers not to put any more "No Room" signs at the door of the church on Sunday morning. Notwithstanding the fact that the church is full he thinks that such a sign does not look well on a church. It must be admitted that they are not common on churches.

—Stillman Institute, the training school maintained by the Southern Presbyterian Church for the education of colored ministers, has received an endowment of $40,000 through the will of the late Charles Birthright, a wealthy colored man of Clarkton, Missouri.

—It is reported from London that Dr. A. C. Dixon is succeeding beyond all expectations in the Metropolitan Tabernacle. The old days are being lived over again when the voice of Charles H. Spurgeon was one of the mightiest in the land.

As Individual Members: Our Duty

The church of Jesus Christ ought to be the most democratic institution on the face of the earth. Its Founder taught his disciples to call one another brethren and to live together as the children of one Father. We have had many battles against ecclesiastical tyrants and doubtless there are other battles of the same sort to be fought. The church, however, suffers more from the deadening indifference of the many than from the tyranny of the few. Intelligent and alert disciples of Jesus can dispose of self-appointed leaders at pleasure. Modest and consecrated leadership is helpless in the presence of a mass of ignorance and indifference.

Membership in the church was regarded seriously by the early Christians. They felt their "endless debt to other men." Their faith was at home in human society. The church was a mutual improvement association. The true temple of God was a group of believers. In such a temple the forgiveness of God acquired a meaning and the comfort of the Spirit became real. The exile for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus lived in spirit with his brethren. He saw a nobler society in which men would be allowed to live in peace and he believed that he was one of the builders of this new society. He chose to suffer affliction that he might leave to those who came after him a heritage of faith.

In view of the mercies of God already bestowed upon Jew and Gentile or waiting to be bestowed in greater abundance when men were willing to receive them, Paul exhorted his readers to deliver themselves over entirely to the service of God. This required a detachment from the purely temporal, and a moral reformation. The will of God was to be the standard for the believer. Conformity to passing fashions of thought and conduct was to be rejected by one who wished to live a genuine life. That which is behind all changes was sought by the Christian. In this he found peace and joy. That we are in the church to emphasize the importance of living the eternal life here and now should be kept constantly before us. To judge the present moment by its relation to the whole of experience is necessary to a life of reason.

The church is a place where valuable experiences are exchanged. Every honest worker accumulates knowledge which he ought to share with others. In the church the experiences of all sorts and conditions of men should receive consideration. We forget our democracy when we listen to none except those who have acquired riches or fame or learning. The kind of wisdom we need may be just the kind the prominent citizen does not possess. Free interchange of ideas cures deceit and prejudice. We have an abundance of occupational vanity and narrowness. Every occupation gives prominence to a certain group of ideas. It is easy for those engaged in an occupation to fall into the habit of thinking that the group of ideas with which they have been made familiar is the only group entitled to the respect of sensible men.

"What kind of church would my church be, if every member were just like me." This implies that all church members are not of one kind. It is interesting and profitable to consider the contribution which each type of member makes to the success or failure of the church. The man who demands strict obedience to his orders is known in most churches. He does not consult the consciences of his brethren. As for their feelings, they have no right to possess any that run counter to his wishes. It is not always an elder or deacon or preacher who aspires to the office of dictator. It may be some one who refuses to assist in any enterprise unless he can have his whims honored. The critic is often in the seat of the scornful. He demands perfection of the sermon, in thought, diction, and style. He has no sympathy for those who blunder. He is more anxious to vindicate his claim to omniscience than he is that souls be fed on the bread of life. Hence he hastens to tell those who have derived benefit from a sermon that they ought to have found no food in it because it was faulty in arrangement. Over against the critic we place the one who is perfectly satisfied with things as they are or who, if he is not satisfied, does not think it is worth while to strive for better things. This person objects to a surgical operation because there is risk involved. He prefers actual evil to possible good. [Midweek Service, March 20. Rom. 12:1-13.] S. J.

Into the Depths

A LENTEN STUDY.

The reader of the two narratives of our Lord's temptation, given in the first and third Gospels, is sure to be haunted by the desire to know how the evangelists learned the facts. Jesus was alone in the wilderness. Indeed he had as yet made no choice of friends or followers in the ministry upon which he was entering. There was no one either to know or report the incidents of the Forty Days. Only as Jesus made known his experiences in that significant period of his life could they have been known at all. We must suppose that at some moment well on in his three-years career as a public tacher, Jesus took the disciples into his confidence regarding the days of deep trial through which he passed immediately after his visit to John's gathering of the people at the Jordan.

The days of vision, confidence and exultation passed. Absorbed in the contemplation of his opportunity and equipment the customary needs of the body were forgotten. The fasting of those days in the hills was no formal and imposed self-denial. It was the inevitable result of our Lord's profound surrender to the high ideals of his new ministry, which left him indifferent to the call of the flesh. While that mood of passionate commitment to the exalted themes of the Kingdom of God was upon him, there could be no time for the intrusion of lesser urgings.

But the body has its claims, and hunger came at last, and with it the weakness which long abstinence brings. And with the hunger, clamorous and insistent, and the weakness, baffling and overpowering, came the decline of confidence, the wavering of courage, the dimming of vision and the menace of doubt. It has ever been after this manner with the saints. The wrestlings with depression, despair and temptation have always followed the times of most confident and enthusiastic hope. When the body is weak and the vital powers run low, then the black images of doubt and defeat crowd upon the soul. The cavern of temptation is always underneath the hill-top of the most confident faith. The powers of darkness wait ever upon the reaction from moods of optimism and enthusiasm.

It was in the guise of doubt and question that the temptation came. That the trial of soul through which Jesus passed should take the form of a personal tempter in the narrative would be expected. The Jews of that age believed that over against the power of God there stood a dark antagonist, ready to thwart the designs of the kingdom of heaven whenever possible. Whence this doctrine of dualism had come it would be difficult to say. But it was a part of the accepted theology, and it would have been well-nigh impossible for Jesus to relate the fact of the temptation or for the disciples to conceive it in other than a personal form.

It is not the representations of a personal devil, a pinnacle of the temple or a mountain height from which all the dominions of the world could be seen, that have significance for the student of the temptation. These are the figures of speech by which the semblance of reality was given to the struggle through which Jesus passed in those days when he was deciding the most momentous questions of his life. One need not doubt the presence and the power of vindictive and scoffing evil in the world, even if the forms of speech current among the Jews of that century no longer have convincing force with the world of our time. The strength of evil is not less great that it resides in the human will allured by lesser good or by positive incitements to wrong, rather than in the person of a denomiacal antagonist of God.

And the fact of the temptation is not to be diluted or waved aside with the assumption that this scene of the wilderness was only a sort of pageant in the life of Jesus, a dramatic representation of those temptations which are common to the soul of man. The theologies of the past have too much inclined to the belief that Jesus was incapable of sin or of temptation. Therefore the narrative of his struggle in the wilderness becomes only an unreal dramatization of the colloquy between good and evil, which occurs in the lives of all save the Christ himself. But the truth is far deeper than this superficial view perceives. It was not that Jesus was incapable of sin, but rather that he was able to resist it. The "non passe peccare" of the school men needs to be changed into the "posse non peccare" of a more careful study of the nature of our Lord. The writer of the book of Hebrews affirms truly that "He was tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin," and the fact of temptation involves always the surge of sin upon the soul, which however Jesus was able triumphantly to resist.

The temptation came to him, as to most men of high purpose and consecrated life, in the form of doubt and question. "If thou be the son of God," was the manner of its approach. How could he be sure that the call at the Jordan was real and trustworthy? Might not his own deep devotion to the program of the kingdom of God have misled him into a confidence which now seemed unjustified in the moment of reaction and weakness? How could he be sure that he was either the chosen of God or the one beloved beyond all others? Still further, how could he have the audacity to assume the attitude of a leader of his people when so many had failed, and the obstacles in the way of such a ministry seemed so mountainous and insuperable? In the earlier days of his tarrying among the hills all had seemed fair and easy. Now one by one the difficulties arose before him until his task seemed inconceivably difficult. What hope was there that he could realize those crass messianic expectations of the nation? Was it imaginable that the program to which the Pharisees and Scribes had committed themselves was capable of realization at all, much less by his effort? Could he consent for a moment to make compromise of his high purposes with those dreams of political emancipation which were the dominant conception of the messianic task in the popular mind? What credentials could he present to his people that should in any manner convince them of the righteousness and validity of his claim? And as to the world beyond the frontiers of Judaism, how was it possible to conceive of himself as successful in that ministry of leadership and regeneration upon which all the future of the race seemed to depend?

* * *

Should he satisfy himself of his position as the unique messenger of God by trial of his powers upon nature? There were the stones of the desert, looking almost like loaves of bread. Why not try to allay his hunger by the attempt to change some of these into bread? Every fibre of his body called aloud for food. Could he perform such miracles as were affirmed of some of the prophets? This would satisfy his hunger and at the same reassure his faith in himself. Why should he not win the confidence of his people by some striking act of powr? He could dazzle their imaginations by a thrilling disclosure of that wonder-working potency which prophets and heroes in the past had put forth according to tradition? Could he not thus satisfy both himself and his people? To allay his own questioning and to give them assurance was alike worth while. And then how to win the world. Was it possible by holding fast to his own high ideals to make way with that morbid and selfish generation, intent upon worldly interpretations of the messianic hope? Must he not choose between some acceptance of the views of the Scribes and party leaders with at least the hope of measured success, and his own uncompromising standards of moral and religious exactitude, with the danger that his plans would fail at the last?

* * *

And thus the doubts and questionings came in like a black flood upon the soul of Jesus in these oppressive days of his temptation. One may doubt that he could be allured to the more common forms of evil, "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes and the pride of life." Perhaps it is this fact that has led many commentators to regard the scene of the temptation as scarcely more than an effort to ascribe to our Lord in some dramatic way the usual experiences of humanity, and to affirm in this way his likeness to his brethren. But viewed in the light of his own past experiences and the circumstances in which he was placed it is not difficult to understand that the temptation was one of the most agonizing experiences through which Jesus was called to pass in the entire cycle of his days. It searched out every motive and purpose of his soul. It was the supreme moment of choice between the higher and the lesser good. In the light of that experience Jesus becomes the supreme example of resistance to temptation, not of the gross and repulsive kind, but temptation that presents itself in attractive and almost convincing forms, and wins the will to a fatal choice by the show of seeming good.

* * *

The struggle was not momentary nor easily passed. There were days and nights of agonized weighing of the issues. The outcome was still in doubt. The victory was yet to be won.

An Indiscreet and Humiliating Course

Profound regret is felt in many quarters of the brotherhood at the position taken by the Church Extension and American Society officers with reference to six affirmations recently published by The Christian Century. These officers insisted upon the publication of their protests against the use of their names in connection with these theses although their names had been absolutely withdrawn by us.

American Home Missionary leaders of fico-operation. From left to right those sittin a "survey" of western and northwestern cities, villages and country places for the purpose of eliminating the waste due to sectarianism, and facilitating interdenominational coöperation. From left to right those sitting are: Ward Platt of the Methodist church, and Hubert C. Herring of the Congregational church. Those standing are: L. C. Barnes of the Baptist church, I. N. McCash of the church of Disciples, and J. E. McAfee of the Presbyterian church.

Their course in so doing is now plainly seen by all to have been short-sighted, indiscreet and humiliating.

These officials are now receiving credit (?) in the paper in which their statements were published for the very thing they protest against. The Christian Standard interprets them to the brotherhood as having repudiated the six affirmations, in spite of the fact that their protests are not directed against the affirmations at all, but against being "lined up" on either side of a controversy. But the Cincinnati paper has sounded a trumpet blast for what it calls a "line up" of those who oppose these affirmations, and shrewdly enough it sets down these two societies and their officials as its first and most significant recruits. Manifestly they would have fared better, if they were truly sincere in wishing to keep out of controversy, had they left their case in our hands.

The Christian Century did the magnanimous thing in withdrawing their names as soon as it saw there would be any sort of controversy. Once out, they should have stayed out as the Foreign Society and C. W. B. M. have done. But they have forced themselves into it! They insist upon taking sides! They are now being patted on the back by those who deny that Presbyterians and others are Christians. Their indiscreet move has placed their societies before the Christian world as denying the Christian status of all except immersed believers and immersionist churches.

Does Dr. McCash wish the American Society to be so regarded? Does he wish his own personal attitude to be so interpreted? By insisting upon the publication of a protest against a statement that had been absolutely withdrawn he has played into the hands of those who are making it appear that the Disciples regard Methodist converts on the mission field as "unbaptized heathen, enrolled by denominational missionaries."

Dr. McCash recently participated in a "survey" of western mission fields. Four secretaries of other American missionary societies—Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregationalist and Baptist—made up the joint board of investigators. An interesting account of this great undertaking—involving thousands of miles of travel, long absence from his office, the expenditure of a large sum of money to defray expenses, to say nothing of his own personal effort—was contributed to The Christian Century by Dr. McCash.

Who were these men with whom Dr. McCash participated in a discussion of the enterprise of taking America for Christ? Were they Christians, members of the Church of Christ, and therefore not without baptism? Or were they unbaptized worldlings enrolled by organizations which have no right to be called churches of Christ? Dr. McCash's statement has put himself and the American Society on the side of those who are contending loudly against the recognition of the Christian status of his confreres in this "survey."

But if these denominational leaders had known that Dr. McCash and the society he represented regarded them as unbaptized outsiders would they have asked him to sit with them on equal terms in such a conference? And if he and his society hold them and their churches as non-Christian, what right had he to compromise the Church of Christ by discussing with them questions of comity, federation, overlapping, etc.?

Clearly the American Society in its practice agrees with The Christian Century's affirmations concerning the Christian status of these brethren and their churches. But the secretaries have given aid and comfort to the opponents of these catholic convictions of our hearts. Dr. McCash's final insistence upon the publication of his protest was an evident effort to escape the inquisition threatened by the Christian Standard. But the Disciples have long since reached the point where they emphatically disapprove of any of their servants truckling to this sinister power. They wish their societies and secretaries to avoid every appearance of purchasing, at even the slightest cost, the favor of that newspaper. It is a high price that has been paid for the flattery the secretaries are now receiving.

The presence of the American Society and its secretaries in the camp of those who have betrayed and are still betraying both the plea and the sacred missionary interests of the Disciples is not a pleasing spectacle to those who created the Society and whose servants its secretaries are.

Dr. McCash owes it to his brethren to extricate himself and his great enterprise from the trap into which The Christian Century would have effectually prevented his falling.

The Flight Toward Anti-ism

I am so deeply moved by the representation of the Disciples' convictions by I. J. Spencer and Z. T. Sweeney which I affirm are at war with all the history and tradition of our intelligent leaders from Alexander Campbell until now, that I am constrained to write again in the hope of helping to relieve us all from the shame and humiliation that have fallen upon us. I repeat what I said in a former article, that no issue has arisen in twenty-five years comparable in possibilities for evil to that thrust upon us by the assertions of Mr. Spencer and the several statements of dissent filed against the affirmations of The Christian Century concerning our relations to those whom we have always been taught to regard as the people of God. Whether or not they are correct, judged by the teaching of Alexander Campbell as found in the pages of the Memoirs by Dr. Richardson, we shall allow the reader to judge. Contrast the severe and uncharitable utterances which have recently appeared to the effect that Methodist, Presbyterian, and Congregational churches are not churches of Christ, and their members not Christians, with this noble declaration of Mr. Campbell:

Rev. Ellis B. Barnes.

> So long as any man, woman or child declares his confidence in Jesus of Nazareth as God's own Son, that he was delivered for our offences and raised again for our justification—or, in other words, that Jesus is the Messiah, the Saviour of men—and so long as he exhibits a willingness to obey him in all things so far as his knowledge extends, so long will I receive him as a brother and treat him as such. (Vol. 11, p. 134.)

Let us hear Mr. Campbell once more:

> I labor to see sectarianism abolished and all Christians of every name united upon the one foundation upon which the Apostolic church was founded. To bring Baptists and pedo-baptists to this is my supreme aim. (Vol. 11, p. 135.)

The dissenters claim that we and other immersed people are the only Christians; Mr. Campbell speaks of uniting all Christians of every name. Once more I ask, if there are no other Christians except those known as Disciples, how can there be Christian union? "All Christians of every name" says Mr. Campbell; "no Christians of any name save one," says Mr. Spencer. Whose leadership shall we follow, whose teaching accept? I prefer Mr. Campbell's.

Here is a significant passage showing that Mr. Campbell had trouble in reconciling his views of baptism with his duty to the Christian people with whom he associated but with whom he hesitated to commune. Incidentally, there are in this passage seeds which grew into a violent controversy in Isaac Errett's day, and to which we shall later refer. But while Mr. Campbell had his doubts at this time about communing with his brethren of various names, let us remember he always considered them as his brethren in the Lord; he never disfellowshipped them. Later in life, as this passage shows, he was relieved from his difficulties, and entered fully into the communion service with those of God's people everywhere as opportunity offered. Here is the passage from the pen of Dr. Richardson:

> Remembering the earnestness and faith in which the church at Brush Run sought to know and to do the will of God, while yet mistaken in regard to baptism, his feelings led him to wish to have communion with any similar churches, though they might yet be pedo-baptist. Nevertheless, he remained fully satisfied that the New Testament presented baptism as "indispensably preceding" social communion in religious acts. Thus he was placed in a straight between his conviction on the one hand that there were saints of God in all parties, and, on the other, that obedience to the ordinances of the gospel was necessary to church membership. His feelings led him to recognize all as Christians who gave evidence of faith and piety, while his views of the gospel restricted him to formal communion with those only who had publicly professed to put on Christ in baptism. In practice he was governed exclusively by his conscientious convictions, and was often obliged to do violence to his feelings; nor was it until some years after that a somewhat different view of the subject finally relieved him from the practical difficulties of the communion question. (Vol. 11, p. 138.)

Fortunately for us Mr. Campbell outgrew his difficulties with reference to this subject. However great the perplexities of his mind he never failed to recognize as Christians all those whose lives gave evidence of faith and piety.

"About this time," says Dr. Richardson, "a protracted discussion was carried on in the Harbinger in relation to the position of unimmersed believers to the Christian Church. It became evident that a widespread conviction existed that the term could not, in its scriptural, legitimate and full sense, be applied to any except those who had been baptized into Christ according to the primitive model."

Notice the similarity of the language used by Mr. Spencer more than fifty years later: "This writer [Mr. Spencer] does not believe 'that members of these churches are members of the Church of Christ' in the normal, adequate, New Testament signification of the Church." Well may we wonder at such a repetition of history, and stand aghast at the confusion of thought of one of our representative men, occupying today precisely the same ground which those did in Mr. Campbell's day whom he felt called upon to conciliate. And now Mr. Spencer is correcting The Christian Century for its representation of the position of the Disciples, and incidentally of the views of Mr. Campbell! Writing for the benefit of the Disciples who held these austere views, Dr. Richardson said:

> Mr. Campbell admitting this urged, nevertheless, that the term had now come to be applied to the character, rather than, as in the beginning, to the state or profession of an individual, and that in this respect it might be employed, or that they who manifested the character of Christians, even though mistaken in regard to baptism, might be called at least disciples of Christ, as this designation was used in Scripture of those who were as yet imperfectly acquainted with the nature and institutions of the gospel. Among the reasons which led Mr. Campbell to give place to the discussion of the subject at the time, he mentions several, such as that some professed Reformers "were too much addicted to denouncing the sects and representing them en masse as wholly anti-Christian and corrupt. (Vol. II, pp. 435, 436.)

This passage, intended to conciliate, is really a fine attempt at dodging the issue. Both the practice and the logic survive to this day. How much better for us all if Mr. Campbell had come out squarely, as he did on every other occasion known to us, and affirmed his conviction that members of the surrounding churches were Christian, as he believed in his heart. Could anything be more unworthy of his principles or his powers than to concede to these exclusionists that our brethren in other churches might be called "disciples," since "this designation was used in Scripture of those who were as yet imperfectly acquainted with the nature and institutions of the gospel," and to deny them the appellation "Christian." The attempt at reconciling failed utterly, and resulted in embarrassing Mr. Campbell's charitably disposed friends, we have no doubt. If that distinction had been accepted by either party to the controversy what seas of printer's ink would have been saved! But the distinction died upon the page as it should have done and we have never met with it elsewhere in our literature.

No Bible student will claim that Mr. Campbell's definition of "disciple" has any warrant in Scripture. Think of the Saviour's parting command, "Go make disciples of all the nations," and ask ourselves whether there is any finer meaning in the name "Christian" than in "disciple." When once Mr. Campbell committed himself to the charitable and tolerant view, all attempts at compromise with the severe school of interpretation failed. He found that there were no half-way houses in the world of truth when once a man takes to the open road. Either the people in question are Christians or they are not. Such modifiers as "scriptural, legitimate, and full sense." are too often used as cities of refuge into which lame logic flees when hard pressed, to escape the terrific conclusions involved in the denial of Christian standing before God of honest and pious souls who may have erred unwittingly. Or they are side entrances to heaven at the end of the easy road of the uncovenanted mercies, by the grace of our "monstrous assumptions." No, Mr. Campbell, if the people over whom the discussion was waged were "disciples," they were "Christians," according to every rule of logic and every page of Scripture known to us.

Quoting Mr. Campbell, Dr. Richardson said:

> "These very zealous brethren," continued he, "gave countenance to the popular clamor that we make baptism a savior and a passport to heaven, disparaging all the social and private virtues of the professing public." (Vol. II, p. 436.)

How could any assuming their position expect otherwise, then or now?

He gives another reason, says Dr. Richardson, that he had been accused of "aspiring to build up and head a party"—an impression which he desired to remove. He showed that from the beginning the Reformation had called upon the people of God among the different parties to come out from among them and unite upon the true and original "foundation upon which all Christians might form one communion," and that in the Christian Baptist and the Harbinger he had often expressed similar views. He regarded a conciliatory, meek and benevolent attitude on the part of the Reformers, not only the most comely and Christian-like, but the most successful in bringing men to understand the gospel." (Vol. II, p. 436.)

"Mr. Campbell," says Dr. Richardson, "showed that from the very beginning the Reformation had called upon the people of God among the different parties to come out from among them and unite upon the true and original foundation". Mr. Spencer repudiates this position when he represents the Disciples, as holding the belief that the Church of Christ is limited to those who practice immersion at baptism. The members of these "different parties" are not members of the Church of Christ, says Mr. Spencer. Z. T. Sweeney and those who have dissented from The Century's affirmations appear to do the same. They think they are repudiating and exposing the heresies of The Christian Century; their war is with the Restoration movement. They have either never known or have forgotten what the position of the Disciples in Mr. Campbell's day, with reference to unimmersed Christians, was. They profess to represent the Disciples; they misrepresent Alexander Campbell and Dr. Richardson. They identify themselves with those to whom Mr. Campbell felt obliged to administer the rod of correction. They have aligned themselves with that small fraternity of harsh interpreters who, had their counsels prevailed, would have reduced the Disciples to a hard-shell sect whose propaganda it would have been a Christian duty to ignore.

"He regarded a conciliatory, meek and benevolent attitude" on the part of the Reformers, "not only the most comely and Christian-like, but the most successful in bringing men to understand the gospel." I fail to understand how any man who adopts such an attitude could unchurch and unchristianize the major part of Christendom simply because they had not been immersed!

For the benefit of those Disciples who have renounced the position of Mr. Campbell on this matter of our relation to unimmersed Christians, and for the benefit of the newspapers which are wielding the big stick to browbeat college men, secretaries and pastors to join them in public repudiation as if such were an honorable proceeding rather than an occasion for tears—I close this article with Alexander Campbell's description of what he was in 1811, as suggesting what these brethren will be if they follow the reactionary and unfeeling creed which they have flung to the world with the confidence of victors. I cheerfully admit that they are not in the pharisaical stage of their history yet, but continuing in their present course there is no hope of escape. Read and ponder well, all ye who have accepted the rubric of Ishmael:

> I have tried the pharisaic plan and the monastic. I was once so straight that, like the Indian's tree, 'I leaned a little the other way.' And however much I may be slandered now as seeking 'popularity' or a popular course, I have to rejoice that to my own satisfaction, as well as to others', I proved that truth and not popularity was my object; for I was once so strict a separatist that I would neither pray nor sing praises with any one who was not as perfect as I supposed myself. In this most unpopular course I persisted until I discovered the mistake, and saw that on the principle embraced in my conduct there never could be a congregation or church upon the earth. (Christian Baptist, vol. II, p. 137.)

Here is food for reflection; and I trust that this essay will convince open-minded men that we have been sorely misrepresented by as good and great a man as I. J. Spencer, set in a false and humiliating light before our brethren of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational, and Episcopal churches. Let the brethren who have dissented be swift to undo the damage, as far as they are able, by affirming that the teaching of Mr. Campbell, and our own hundred years of history, as well as the Fatherhood of God compel us to acknowledge as brethren in Christ and in the Church of Christ all those who love and obey our Lord Jesus in sincerity, no matter if they have erred in the manner of being baptized.

My glory is not that I acknowledge them; my hope is that they will acknowledge me. Their interpretations of the will of Christ—not ours, for we are too young—pedo-baptists and Baptists, have made our Christianity the glory of the world. We have certainly been put in a ridiculous attitude by a few honored men, who in their haste to resist what they thought was a heresy have succeeded in involving us all in an absurdity.

—If God is a vital reality to us so that our life is in his life and our will is his will, and with our hand we hold his hand, then we know that God will lead us, and help us, and bless us, and bring us at last through whatever sorrows into his light and joy perpetual. And that faith will interpret all the days of the new year, begun, continued and ended in the name of God.—George Hodges.

Editorial Table Talk

A Periodical that Might Do Great Service

There is more satisfaction in reading the current number of the Christian Union Library, the quarterly publication put out by the Disciples' Commission on Christian Union, than any previous issue. This little periodical can be made to do great service to the cause of Christian unity if big-visioned men are solicited to write. Nothing should be allowed to appear in its limited pages merely to fill space, nor out of mere compliment to an author. Dr. Ainslie, the chairman of the Commission, owes it to his brethren to exercise great independence in selecting his articles, and he should rigidly edit each issue. Every article that gets past the editor should make a positive contribution to the problem. It cannot be said that many articles printed hitherto have done so.

In the current number, however, there are three great messages. Rev. J. Campbell Gibson, missionary to China and ex-moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly of England, voices the appeal of the infant church of the Orient for a united church on the mission fields. It is a great word he speaks. Rev. Oliver Huckel of Baltimore, Congregational pastor, presents a comparative study of the Catholic and Evangelical ideals of the church. He pleads with Protestants to adopt the sacramental conception. One feels the grandeur and depth of his ideal, but cannot repress a criticism of the obscurantist form in which he puts the case. The statement is more emotional—albeit restrained—than lucid. No Christian message of greater importance than this of the sacramental character of the church is waiting to find voice today. But it cannot voice itself in the old theological terms. Meanwhile sociology stands waiting with categories which, were churchmen able to use them, would interpret the church to our day and illumine it with a richer meaning than ever the Catholic has dreamed of.

Dr. W. T. Moore plucks the heart out of the Disciples' plea for unity and flings it, like the heart of Bruce, into the midst of the divided camps of believers. This is one of Dr. Moore's best contributions. He does not discuss details. He says the Disciples will wait outside the door while others discuss details and will accept whatever basis is agreed to. It is the Disciples' historic proposal that Dr. Moore makes. It involves a conception of the mission of the Disciples which the growth of the denominational spirit in modern days has almost stifled. The Christian Board of Publication, St. Louis, or Dr. Peter Ainslie, Baltimore, will supply the periodical to all applicants.

Official Newspapers

Our Lutheran brethren like ourselves, are having a discussion over an official organ. In their case, the Observer has been too free with its criticisms of those who have been occupying the seats of the mighty. The Churchman (Episcopalian) passed into new hands recently because of some strictures made upon the vestrymen of Trinity church. It may afford us a crumb of comfort to know that we are not the only people who have a few thousand problems on hand. No people can escape the problems. The success of any people depends upon the manner in which they are handled. Christianity creates as many problems as it solves; all we need to settle any problem is time, and the spirit of Christ. This item from The Continent will be of interest at this time:

> The last general session of the Lutheran General Synod appointed a committee to establish an official weekly paper for the church. The Lutheran Observer, which has been published by a private company since 1831 in the interest of the denomination, has allowed in its columns at various times free criticism of some of the synod's official actions. This, by a certain group of ecclesiastical leaders, has been held to be disloyal, and by persistent agitation they have finally pushed through a plan which aims to establish an organ that, being under official control, will always echo the synod and refuse all contributed articles dissenting from positions to which that body has given sanction. The committee was instructed first to buy out The Lutheran Observer, but when it made the effort, the subscribers of that paper protested so vehemently that its directors refused to consent to any change. In consequence, the committee is now going ahead to put in the field a rival to The Observer, and it calls upon all the pastors to support the official undertaking. Many of them, however, as well as a great proportion of the laymen of the church, believe as much in a free press for the advancement of the church as for the health of the state, and there are many signs that the appearance of the new journal will create deep and bitter dissension among the General Synod's constituents.

—The campaign for equal suffrage goes forward in many parts of the western world. In America the sentiment in favor of woman suffrage has rapidly increased, and probably it is only a matter of time until the principle will prevail in most if not all of the states. The women of the United States have conducted their campaign with tact, courage and dignity. Very little sentiment has developed in favor of the more militant methods pursued by English suffragists. The violence to which some of the English women have resorted has been the most serious obstacle to the prevalence of favorable opinion. There might be some justification for the interruption of political meetings with cries of "votes for women," but when resort is had to violence, such as the wanton destruction of property by the breaking of shop windows, the small number of women resorting to such fanatical and unjustifiable actions brings discredit not only on the great body of law abiding English suffragists, but on the cause of equal suffrage throughout the world. No principle ever wins by resort to hoodlumism, least of all one in which the interests of womanhood, the most sensitive and delicate interests in the world, are involved. The cause of equal suffrage will win in spite of the injuries inflicted upon it by the ill-advised actions of a few wrong-headed leaders. But it is unfortunate that such episodes as have marred the campaign for equal suffrage in England should have occurred.

—Mr. Hanecy, counsel for Mr. Lorimer in the latter's effort to retain his place in the United States Senate, has made every effort to win tolerance for his client by the claim that he was the victim of popular prejudice and newspaper persecution. In his summary of the second investigation recently completed in Washington he likens his blonde employer to the great historic martyrs, including John Huss, Savonarola, Joan of Arc, Charles I and the Puritan sufferers. These he affirms were the victims of popular misunderstanding and hatred, and this he insists is the misfortune of Mr. Lorimer. Indeed, he has not scrupled to include a holier name than that of any of the martyrs in his list of those similarly placed to the malodorous senator. But Mr. Hanecy's knowledge of history plays him false. With the exception of Charles I, a most unfortunate instance for his purpose, those who have suffered as martyrs in his list were brought to their death not by public disapproval but by the fanaticism and violence of a small group actuated by partisan bias or mob fury. In every instance the great body of public opinion was entirely with the sufferer. And this is precisely where Mr. Lorimer's case breaks down. His friends are the men who for personal reasons or because of political or commercial advantage have espoused his cause. The almost universal popular sentiment is one of emphatic condemnation of the man and all he represents in American public life.

—It will be remembered that the Vice Commission of this city, appointed by the Mayor, issued its report in a volume of nearly four hundred pages a year ago. That report was sent out to public libraries, institutions of education, public officials, reform organizations, and persons who made request for copies, until the entire ten thousand volumes published in two editions were exhausted. For a time some of these volumes were held up by the postal department while the question of their transmission through the mails was under consideration, but later they were permitted to go through without further objection. Almost as many additional requests have been received by the Commission since the supply was exhausted, and the problem of securing funds to issue another edition is now under consideration by the Commission, which since its report has continued its existence in an unofficial but chartered capacity for the furtherance of the causes to which it directed public attention in its report.

—John D. Rockefeller, Jr., who announced a few days ago that he had completed his two years' campaign to abolish "white slavery," will turn his attention to establishing a "bureau of criminalistic research." The bureau will aim at the improvement and ultimate reformation of the conditions under which women convicted in the criminal courts are compelled to serve sentences imposed upon them. Mr. Rockefeller's plans are based on a scheme originated by Miss Katherine Bement Davis, superintendent of the state reformatory for women, at Bedford, N. Y. Miss Davis would have a number of buildings erected on a site as far away as possible from prison environment. Beginning with a small number of women convicted of crime, she would segregate them according to type, the vicious type in one class, the mentally defective in another class and so on. Trained pathologists and psychologists would make an individual study of the character, thoughts and habits of each woman. The disposition aimed at would be eventual parole.

—The anniversary of Shakespeare's birth and death, April 23rd, is to be celebrated in many places this year with unusual features. In this city the school children have been devoting odd times to the rehearsal of a Shakespearean pageant, which will be a part of the celebration of the day. Any attention which can revive in the program of the average American a regard for the greatest of our poets, and lead to a more competent reading and study of his plays, cannot fail to enrich the life of our generation. The men and women of today, particularly the men, spend far too little time with the classics of our literature, and of these classics, aside from the English Bible, the plays of Shakespeare are the most important. No better course of reading could be devised for the next two months, aside from the regular reading and study of the Bible, than the careful reading, either privately or in the home circle, of some of the great plays of our master dramatist.

—The appeal made by the missionaries in China for assistance in attempting to relieve the widespread sufferings of the famine-stricken districts is one to which America ought to respond promptly and generously. There is no conduct more likely to convince the oriental mind of the sincerity of western friendship than help in a time of such suffering as the failure of crops invariably brings in the far East. The missionaries are able to minister to the needs of the sufferers with wise and discriminating judgment, and the money placed in their hands for this purpose is almost as servicable for missionary ends as the funds which are devoted to the work of evangelization. Indeed, the feeding of the hungry is as truly missionary work as the medical and surgical ministries rendered in missionary hospitals, and those who have been helped are sure to hold their missionary friends in a new relation of gratitude and confidence.

—From the beginning of the Men and Religion Forward Movement social service has been stressed, and it has come increasingly to the fore in all the campaigns. The addresses of Charles Stelzle and Raymond Robins have attracted especial attention. Now, at the Christian Conservation Congress in New York, April 19-24, the practical problems which confront the country and the churches will be handled fearlessly by those who can speak with authority. In order to challenge the attention of the men of the nation with the man's side of the social evil, Miss Jane Addams, of Chicago, will present this subject. Miss Addams has the unique distinction of being the only woman speaker at the Congress, and the only woman admitted to its sessions.

—That staunch Episcopal paper, The Churchman, one of the best in our land, is about to change hands. It has been sold to a syndicate in which the vestrymen of Trinity parish, New York City, are prominent. These vestrymen were severely criticized a couple of years ago when they ventured to close up St. John's chapel in a poor district on the West Side. It is feared that the character of the paper will not be maintained on its high levels in days to come. Dr. Silas McBee, the editor, will retire. No one has yet been elected to fill his place.

—Foreign missions is one of the interests of the church that can be presented to a man not a Christian and get a check. Even a humane infidel, if he is intelligent and unbiassed, must be impressed with the fact that the work that missionaries do upon the foreign field is worth what it costs, in human service. It is hard to believe that there are still to be found in our churches benighted and belated souls who say they do not believe in foreign missions.

—25,000 Irish Presbyterians made a vigorous protest against home rule in Belfast, February 1, declaring their intention never to obey any laws of an Irish parliament.

Noon in Florida

How this sweet stillness rests my weary soul!
Life's busy, pulsing tide has passed me by
And left me for a while; this tranquil sky
Breathes blessed benizons; the soothing roll
Of ocean on the beach sounds like the toll
Of care and sorrow; oft my languid eye
Through aisles of many-pillared pines can spy
Its silvery gleam—like some long wished for goal.

And this at noon!—when in our eager clime
The streaming streets are full of busy life,
And toil, and care, and fret are in their prime.
Sweet summer land! 'Tis good to leave the strife
A while behind, and bathe us in the balm
Of thy kind air, and learn its heavenly calm.

The Coming of the Light

"There was the true light . . . which lighteth every man, coming into the world." —John 1. 9.

A Sermon Preached in Westminster Chapel, London, by G. Campbell Morgan

The words of this text are characterized by a striking simplicity. An interpretation of its meaning is not however as easy as at first sight appears. Let us consider these three things: First, the fact that there is a light that lighteth every man. Secondly, the truth about that light. Finally, the sense in which that light came into the world when Jesus was born.

Let us first remind ourselves of that of which I think we are in danger of losing sight in these days: the fact that there is a light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. We who have passed so largely under the influence of Western theology, and so far from that of the Greek Fathers, have largely lost sight of this tremendous truth, and it is well that we should be reminded of it.

John's Prologue.

I go back in this prologue to the fourth verse, and read:

"In him was life; and the life was the light of men." In this prologue—so full of mystery, gleaming with such strange glory, flashing with such unwonted light, so full of profound thought that we have never yet been able to exhaust it—John set the person of Jesus as he knew him, in relation to the essential, eternal facts, beginning with the mysterious, awe-inspiring declaration, "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God." Then proceeding, he started with another beginning, not so far back as that of the first verse, for in the first verse of the gospel John passed in thought behind all dates, all times, all ages. In the first verse of Genesis I read, "In the beginning God created"; and to that beginning of creation John returned, as he wrote:

"The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him; and without him was not anything made that hath been made."

Life was Light.

Then continuing his reference to creation, he wrote: "In him was life." All life, every form and fashion of life, was within him, proceeded from him, was created by him. Then occurs this significant sentence: "The life was the light of men." Man was differentiated from every other form of life in that particular. A more illuminative word is not found in any book of human philosophy, a more remarkable word is not found in all the divine library than this, as it differentiates between the life of man and life in every lower order of creation. If I go back to the Genesis story, I see life proceeding from the lower to the higher, until at last I see man, and the infinite difference between man and everything beneath him in the scale is that life was light in him. Beneath men lie other orders of creation, the most highly developed animals, and beneath them birds, reptiles, and yet lower life in tree and plant; but life was never light until man came. Man first turned back and looked into the face of God the Creator, and knew him. Life was light in man. That is the Genesis story. That harmonizes with all human experience.

This fact of light in man has a threefold witness: First, an apprehension of nature; secondly, consciousness of the moral; thirdly, aspiration after the eternal.

The Secret in Nature.

First as to an apprehension of nature. Man has a sense of the secret in nature. I am not suggesting that he knows the secret, but he has a sense of the fact of it. You tell me man is finite. I agree with you. You tell me man cannot know the infinite. In a sense, I agree with you. But if man is different from every other form of life, he is different in this, that while he cannot know the infinite, he knows he cannot know the infinite, and so he knows the fact of the infinite. He is conscious that there is that which he cannot know. He can think far beyond the power of his ability to tabulate, analyze, explain. Man will pluck the flower from the crannied wall and hold it in his hand, and know that there is a secret there, a mystery. That is an evidence of the light that is in man.

Search After Truth.

A further evidence is found in his search after truth, the truth that is in nature. Every form of life lower than man selects from nature what it requires for itself. Man desires to find in nature what nature is in itself. That is the difference. The highest form of life other than man is with marvelous skill under the divine direction, selecting from nature the things it needs for the support of its own life. How wonderfully we see it if we watch nature. How marvelously insects, birds, and animals adapt themselves to conditions and compel conditions to serve them. They select with an instinct and intuition that is most wonderful the things from nature which they need for their own life. Man comes to nature and after having selected from nature the things he needs for his own life, says, "Now I want to know the secret of nature itself." He asks, knocks, seeks, demands, investigates, and will not be said nay. The light that lighteth every man is apprehension of the fact that there is a secret in nature; and persistent demand to know it; the passion for truth for truth's sake.

Conscious of the Moral.

Then there is in man the consciousness of the moral. Consciousness of the moral is universal. All peoples have not the consciousness of right and wrong in our sense of the words; but no human being is entirely devoid of the consciousness of the moral. It may be low, it may be only the consciousness of vengeance deserved by other men, or by myself; but that is consciousness of the moral. It may never rise above that, but there it is. It may climb to great heights, expressing itself in the idealism of Buddha or the remarkable ethic of Confucius. Even though the missionary may have to make words to express Christian ideas, there is in the man for whom he makes the words, capacity to grasp the ideas. That in itself is consciousness of the moral.

Call of the Eternal.

Finally, there is in every man an aspiration after the eternal. "He hath set eternity in their heart." It is in the heart of every man, calling, calling, calling. When Jack London wrote, "The Call of the Wild," he wrote a strong and wonderful book. It is only the story of a dog, but it is a great parable of how strong evil may be in the life of a man. But there is something deeper than the call of the wild in every man; there is the sob of the tides of eternity, the passionate desire after the life that is age-abiding. That is proof and part of the light that lighteth every man.

Notice that this text does not say, the light that lighteth all men, but every man. Individuality stands out here. If this text be true, there is some measure of light in every human being irrespective of incidental differences. All human history and all human literature testify to this fact.

Recognized by the Fathers.

The Greek fathers clearly recognized and insisted upon the truth. Justin Martyr, who wrote only a generation after John wrote his gospel, said: "Stoic, poet, historian, . . . they all speak well, in proportion to the share they have of the spermatic word." And again: "Whatever things are rightly spoken among all men, are really the property of us who are Christians. For all the great writers of antiquity saw the great realities darkly; but still they saw them through the sowing of the implanted word that was in them. For whatever either lawyers or philosophers uttered well, they so uttered by finding out and contemplating some part of the divine word."

A century later Clement of Alexandria said: "To the Jews belonged the Law, and to the Greeks philosophy, until the advent.

Philosophy was a schoolmaster to the Greeks, as the law was to the Hebrews, to bring them to Christ."

In Reformation times, this almost more startling word was written by Zwingle: "Hercules, and Thesius and Socrates, and Aristides, and the Catos, and the Scipios, all walked with God; and saw him continually in their own and their families' histories."

These are great truths, of which we are terribly in danger of losing sight. The light has been in every man, and there is light in every man today. No human being crosses the stage of this life's experience in utter and total darkness.

The Word.

Now let us consider the declaration of the text concerning this light. John declared that this light that lighteth every man is the word. Note the persistence of the thought in this prologue, and in this particular paragraph, as to the identity of the person. First, in verse one, the reference is to the word. The term is mystical, full of suggestiveness, far more full than many of us dream; the logos is not only something spoken, but the thought itself before it is spoken; so that the logos means reason as well as revelation. In the second verse, I read: "The same was in the beginning with God." In the third verse, "All things were made by him," and the reference is to the same person. The fourth verse again, "In him was life; and the life was the light of men." Then follows the paragraph about the witness and his witnessing, until in the tenth verse we read, "He"—that is the same person—"He came unto his own, and they that were his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them gave he the right to become children of God."

Writing About Jesus.

John throughout was writing about Jesus. Who is Jesus? Who is this one? He is the logos, the word. Now John declared that the light that lighteth every man is this self-same one, infinite in the mystery of his true being, beyond all human analysis in the infinite fact of his personality, the logos.

Mark the bearing of that upon the things we have attempted to say about the light that lighteth every man. That in man which enables him to apprehend nature is not light evolved out of nature, but effulgence falling upon nature through the souls of men. That in man which creates the moral consciousness is not human reason but divine revelation. That in man inspiring him to aspiration after the eternal is not the aspiration of the animal, but the inspiration of God.

According to this conception, the light that is in every man is the divine nearness to him, presence with him, touch upon his spirit.

What is the Difference?

Finally, John declared that this light that had always been here, was coming. In what sense did the light come? What is the difference between the thing of which we have been speaking and that which we now celebrate with holy joy? What difference has Christ's coming really made? That is the question.

"The word became flesh, and dwelt among us (and we beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father), full of grace and truth." Reverently we ask, What does this mean? "The word was made flesh." Let me express the truth in the terms of the thought of our text. The light was focussed, centralized, so that men could see it. Apply that truth to all the things with which we have been dealing. When Christ was born, new light came to men concerning nature. I find old Isaac Watts singing,

"Joy to the world, the Savior reigns
Let men their songs employ,
While fields and floods, rocks, hills, and plains
Repeat the sounding joy."

New Possibility.

Paul said, "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now." "The earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the revealing of the sons of God." When the Son of God was manifested, nature thrilled and throbbed with new hope, new possibility. Light was everywhere before Jesus was born, and man was illumined ere the word became flesh; he knew there was a secret in nature and desired to discover it; but oh, my brother—assailed by unbelief in this material age, laughed at tomorrow by the man who thinks he understands the mystery of creation, a man who has read a small book called, "The riddle of the universe" and thinks he has settled the whole matter—think again, broadly, largely, and mark you this, that scientific investigation became possible of accuracy as the result of the birth of Jesus. The countries that have dared to prosecute investigation without fear of persecution are the countries in which he has made the spirit and possibility of liberty; and ere ing upon nature will admit man into its deepest heart, and its profoundest mystery.

When he came, there came light in relation to the moral, light on the question of righteousness. His coming gave the world moral standards which are spiritual and not merely moral, and taught men that no man is ultimately moral unless he have traffic with eternity, commerce with God; that the inspiration of morality is religion.

Redeeming Dynamic.

His coming did far more than that. He came not only to reveal to men the fact that moral standards are spiritual, but to communicate to men redeeming dynamic; so that they should not merely see the beauty of the ideal, but be able to realize it in the actuality of their own lives. He came, and by his coming the light that was in man sobbing, sighing for the eternity he never could possess, shone upon him clearly, and man understood eternity and came into possession of eternal life. These are the results, the values of the coming of that one true light into the cosmos.

Henry Ward Beecher said, "If the angels did not sing, and the shepherds did not hear them, they ought to have done;" and my heart says, Amen.

The greatest wonder is not the singing of the angels, not the listening of the shepherds, not the shining of the star, but the coming out of the everywhere into the here of the light that lighteth every man.

THE ANTIOCH GOSPEL

BY W. J. LHAMON.

We often use the phrase "the old Jerusalem Gospel." Why have we not coined another fitting the movement that proceeded from Antioch? The Jerusalem church was the mother, but the daughter out-grew her. The history of the church in Jerusalem has a sad side. She was poverty stricken; she was persecuted; she was hampered by Judaism; and within forty years of her birth she was all but destroyed by the destruction of the city. She organized no systematic missionary work. She gave a gingerly sanction to the work of the Apostle Paul. From her bosom there went out brethren bitterly opposed to Paul, Judaizers, who became disturbers of the Gentile churches. These Judaizers were reactionaries, opponents ofprogress, fearful of innovation, determined that the new wine of the Gospel should be kept in the old skins of Mosaism.

A Different History.

The church in Syrian Antioch presents us with a different history proceeding from a different spirit among its members, a different environment, clientele, and leadership. It was distinctively a Gentile church; its environment was predominantly Greek, and hence far more cosmopolitan than that of the church in Jerusalem; it was founded by relatively broad-minded, Grecized Jews, and had as one of its first pastors great-souled, generous-hearted Barnabas. Into this Gentile church things Jewish could not be brought. Naturally, inevitably, it rejected the Jewish priesthood, the Jewish altar forms of worship, the distinction between clean and unclean beasts, the Sabbath, and circumcision. These were among the limiting features of a religion that otherwise might have become universal. By rejecting them the Antioch church proclaimed her liberty, her distinctiveness, and her cosmopolitan spirit. She was Greek; she could be Christian, but she could not and would not be Jewish. The community caught the distinction, and "the disciples were called Christians first at Antioch."

Mother of Gentile Movement.

Having rejected the limiting features of Judaism the Antioch Church found herself prepared to be the mother of the Gentile movement, which under the Apostle Paul became the foreign missionary movement of the ancient church. Jerusalem could not have mothered such a movement; she was not fitted for it, she had not the spirit of it, and her Jewish environment was decidedly against it. Even the Apostle Peter, though he had preached in the home of Cornelius, felt that his mission was "to the circumcision." Reluctantly the man of the "keys of the kingdom" threw open-doors in the way of Gentile peoples.

Missionaries Appointed.

It was divinely fitting that in Antioch the Holy Spirit should say, "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have appointed them." From Antioch they went forth into Cyprus and Galatia, and to Antioch they returned with a missionary rehearsal of "all the things that God had done with them, and that he had opened a door of faith among the Gentiles." Again from Antioch Paul went forth, revisited his Galatian churches, heard the Macedonian call and responded to it, preached in Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, Corinth, and again returned to Antioch. And again from Antioch he went out on his final journey into Asia, Macedonia and Greece, nourishing a hope in his heart that he might see Rome. Antioch was great and free and generous. Paul loved her. She had embraced the grace and truth that came by Jesus; she had declined the law that was given by Moses. With her spiritual rather than legalistic vision she planned the beginnings of a world-movement. Paul found himself generously helped by her while he had to whip Jerusalem into non-interference with his mighty missionary enterprise.

Jerusalem and Antiock.

Let us make no mistake. We love Jerusalem for her matchless Pentecost, her heroic endurance of persecution, her struggle with poverty, her growth in grace and breadth. But we, with our western spirit, we love Antioch also with her freedom from legalism, her quicker adaptations, her ready response to the Holy Spirit, and her message and messengers to a sunken, dying world. We need, we must have, not less of Jerusalem, but more by far of Antioch; more of her response to the Holy Spirit; more of her Paul and Barnabas; more of her world-view; more of her missionary enthusiasm and practice. Today the greatest thing that can be said about her is that she helped Paul. By helping him she helped to make a new Rome, a new Europe, a Christian America, a Christian civilization struggling heroically with the problem of world redemption.

Today the greatest thing we can do is to help our missionaries as she helped hers, sending them westward still as she sent hers, anticipating such victorious centuries as have proceeded from her.

Business Politics

(From Governor Woodrow Wilson's Chicago Speech.)

"As our economic affairs are now organized they cannot go on. The division is far more difficult to trace today than it was in Lincoln's time. No man is a friend of this country who predicts dire results. Every problem we have to meet can be solved without injury to business or any other sound interest.

"America is a business country, and business must be taken care of. I believe that the ills from which we suffer can be solved without harming sound business. I have no feeling of piety about any political doctrine except the one that gives equal rights to all. Business and politics must be separated. Give politics a chance without the domination of special privilege and great wealth. The biggest enemy business has is the man with a program which goes further than he can see. The standpatters have imprisoned business behind a great dam. There is no need of breaking down this dam and causing a commercial flood with its consequent damage. Engineers have appeared who have shown us how we may pierce the dam, here and there and release the water without harming anybody.

"I believe in the initiative and referendum because they will give the people real representative government. They are state and local questions and are designed to give the people the power in localities where special interests have obtained control of public affairs. I have never heard them suggested as a substitute for representative government. In fact, they will safeguard the people in preserving representative government wherever and whenever it is necessary. I have never favored the recall of judges because they are not administrative officers of the government. They simply interpret and enforce the law. To urge the recall of judges is to treat a symptom rather than the disease. My idea is to abolish the laws that make it possible for special interests to control the judiciary."

JAPAN AND RELIGION

The Japan Times, in an issue of recent date published an important article on the announcement of the government's home office, that it would call a religious convention in the near future. The convention is to be composed of the representatives of Shintoism, Buddhism, and Christianity, with the object of considering means for drawing closer the bond which naturally unites the state and religious bodies, as well as the religious bodies within themselves, in order to strengthen the authority of religion in its efforts to influence the life of the nation.

The Times, in commenting on this call, says: "Our readers will remember that last year, under the Katsura Cabinet, the ministers of home affairs and of education caused no little comment by suggesting the importance of paying reverence to temples and shrines as well as family altars, in order to foster the spirit of family piety and loyalty to the Emperor. The idea underlying the suggestion was not bad by any means, but it was apparent to all intelligent observers that the scheme was on too narrow a basis, and failed altogether to receive a cordial response from the public.

"But the present plan as explained by Mr. Tokonami is conceived on a broad-minded basis, which is altogether unexceptionable. The ultimate result aimed at is the strengthening of religious authority; for, according to the vice-minister, there can be no healthy moral life without a religious belief. Call it God, Buddha, or Heaven, the names represent the ultimate reality of the universe; and human life can attain its normal development only by coming in contact with, and being sustained in all its struggles by this ultimate reality. We must say all this is admirable.

Mother and Child

Religious Fabric of the Nation Destroyed.

"Modern Japan, in her zeal for reform and reconstruction, has passed through changes as thoroughgoing and radical in many respects as did the people of France in the great Revolution. Among other changes, the whole religious fabric of the nation has been destroyed. We believe the destruction was absolutely necessary, for both Buddhism and Shintoism, as they had been formed under the Tokugawa Shogunate into a well organized tool of statecraft, were the very embodiment of conservatism, and without destroying their influence no reforms would have been possible. It was the spirit of secularism that swept all conservative opposition before it, and the most marked result is seen in the present religious system of the country.

Secular Education a Moral Failure.

"In the separation of religion and education, in building up a purely secular system of national education, Japan has expelled all religions from her national schools, much as Jesuitism has been expelled from French schools. And as we look back at the total result of this policy, we must say that in the matter of moral education the Japanese schools have largely proved a failure. The sense of failure is felt not only by the most serious-minded of the educators themselves, but by all intelligent observers. It is not impossible that, if the proposed convention proves successful, the educational authorities may find in it some suggestions toward improving the system of moral training in schools."

The Rose of Tralee

An Irish Ditty.

The pale moon was rising above the green mountain,
The sun was declining beneath the blue sea,
When I stray'd with my love to the pure crystal fountain
That stands in the beautiful vale of Tralee.

She was lovely and fair as the rose of the summer,
Yet 'twas not her beauty alone that won me;
O no! 'twas the truth in her eyes ever dawning
That made me love Mary, the Rose of Tralee.

The cool shades of evening their mantle were spreading,
And Mary, all smiling, was listening to me,
The moon through the valley her pale rays was shedding,
When I won the heart of the Rose of Tralee.

Though lovely and fair as the rose of the summer,
Yet 'twas not her beauty alone that won me;
Oh no! 'twas the truth in her eye ever dawning
That made me love Mary, the Rose of Tralee.

Our Readers' Opinions

Let Us Hush it Up!

Editors Christian Century: Since reading the recent discussions in your paper, the conviction has been forcing itself upon my mind that you have perhaps done an unwise thing. I have felt like the old English woman who always boasted of her family lineage and who on being told that the evolutionists were teaching that our ancestors were monkeys, replied, "Let us hope it isn't true, but if it is, let us hush it up as soon as possible." There may be those among us whom Mr. Spencer represents in his denial of your six propositions; but if so, let us hush it up as soon as possible.

I wonder if Washington Gladden, Robert E. Speer and others are much concerned as to the outcome of this discussion.

These protestors, I am persuaded, do not represent our position as held from its inception. They are under the lash of that conservatism that has fastened its toils around our movement. I use the term, "conservatism," in harmony with their usage of the term, though what they are conserving it were hard to tell. Certainly not the position as set forth in our famous Declaration and Address. Utterances such as those of Brethren Spencer, Sweeney and others would look more at home in a certain antiquated journal known as the "Octographic Review," than in one of our up-to-date papers.

Is it true that "our plea," is as narrow as some of these "representative" men represent it to be? Have we, after all, done what we have been so often accused of doing, viz., making baptism in water of more importance than the spiritual requirements of life in Christ? I wish to register my protest. Such a position does not represent me. Let our brethren speak out on this and square ourselves with our religious neighbors, and thus save ourselves from our friends.

Christians Only, or Near-Christians

A Christian only! The choice spirits of the ages have always said in effect concerning the attainment of this ideal. "Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is too high, I cannot attain unto it." In our Zion, however, confident assertions along this line have been far from infrequent. The latest and strongest declaration has just been given publicity in the columns of one of our papers. A brother writes: "I am the only Christian only in this city of fifteen hundred population. Is not that awful?" Reading such a statement reminds one of the sanctificationist who said: "I have not sinned for four years, six months, two weeks, three days, seven hours and fifteen minutes." Surely the very strongest statement that any individual can make concerning himself, without qualifying for membership in the Ananias Club, is this "I am almost a Christian." Old Dr. Johnson spoke truthfully of himself when he said, "I, too, am an old struggler." We, too, are strugglers, if we are not stragglers. We are striving to be Christians. We want to be Christ-like. In moments of spiritual fervor we may even wax bold enough to say, "We are almost Christians." So, too, are the Methodists. Let us stop there. If we enter into a comparison with them on the basis of doctrine or deed the differences are not so easily resolved by the pronouncement of that glib formula "We are not the only Christians, but Christians only." Dr. W. E. Barton is right in telling us "You and we, and all of us, are Christians, plus and minus." A traveler in the Kentucky mountains encountered a native and asked him this question, "Have you lived here all your life?" and received the laconic reply, "Not yit!" Are we Christians only? "No yit!" If we were Christians only, we would be the only Christians in the world. Find one genuine "Christian only" and you will have found the only Christian in the world. It may be argued that a limited meaning is attached to the statement "We are Christians only" implying mainly that we have been immersed and that we wear only the name of Christ. But to leap from doctrinal correctness on these and allied points to the assumption involved in the application to ourselves of the words "Christians only" is to manifest a decidedly unscriptural predilection on our part for doctrine as against deed. The dwellers in Utopia are "Christians only." Here and at our best, we are near-Christians. Let us be modest. Not only to that "only Christian only" in Chipley, Florida, but to every man among us, the lesson is "not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think."

Beckley, W. Va. E. W. MCDIARMID.

Suppose We had been Charged with it.

Editors Christian Century: If a Methodist newspaper had undertaken to state the convictions of the Disciples, and had charged us with denying that Presbyterians, Methodist and Congregational churches were churches of Christ, and that their unimmersed members were wholly without Christian baptism and therefore not members of the church of Christ, what a mighty protest would have gone up from Kansas City and Des Moines and Lexington and Pittsburg. "The Disciples unchurching our Christian brethren? It is slander! That Methodist editor is a bigot himself or he would not entertain such ideas, not to speak of publishing them! The Disciples do not claim to be the only Christians; they are Christians only!" But behold two or three of our well-known men have spoken in contradiction of these theses formulated by The Christian Century. And they say that Congregationalists and the others are not Christians in "the New Testament sense," nor are their churches churches of Christ in "the New Testament sense." If they are not Christians in that sense, pray what other sense is there in which they may have a right to the name Christian?

Christianity or Orthodoxy

Editors of The Christian Century: Having followed the current controversy with such irregularity and lack of interest as absorption in other matters necessitated, I know too little of it to judge its merits. Even your "six affirmations" have not been studied sufficiently to justify my deciding for or against them. Furthermore, I fear the agitation of the question of our receiving the unimmersed is inexpedient. So far from helping Christian union, its practice would probably make two denominations of us instead of one. Certainly no one in this land will be robbed of church membership by our standing by our traditions.

But I am not writing to say that. The thing I cannot refrain from saying is that no evidence yet forthcoming has convinced me that the Disciples really believe themselves the only Christians and their churches the only churches of Christ in the world. Despite what some of our brothers have said, and others have failed to say, I cannot believe we have reached such a pitch of pharisaical self-righteousness, or have so far overlooked the beams in our own eyes in our zeal to remove the motes from the eyes of our religious neighbors. If we have, the letter has killed indeed, and no plea of ours for unity will be heard, for "what we are will speak so loud that none can hear what we say."

Fail not to cry out against any effort thus to sacrifice Christianity upon the altar of a legalistic and hide-bound orthodoxy. If that is what is to come from loyalty to the letter of the Gospel we shall all soon have to say to our Presbyterian and other brothers what the Bishop of Ripon tells us an opponent said to Dean Stanley. The dean had with courage stood almost alone through a stormy meeting as champion of one charged with heresy. After adjournment an opponent went to him and said, "Mr. Dean, may I shake hands with you? I don't agree with you; but I confess that if the orthodoxy is on one side, the Christianity is on the other."

A New Day at Hand

Editors Christian Century: It took some hard cannonading, but you struck center. The next move is to have your six affirmations printed in large type and put on nice cards and sent out by the thousands. At the bottom of card put a P. S. saying, "Please read carefully before rushing into print with the cry: 'I don't believe any such thing.'" Oh, that we might give up our double front, believing one thing about our Christian neighbors and preaching another. Yes, reforms come slow, but they will come as sure as there is a God in heaven. Therefore let us rejoice and be happy, for the new day is at hand. J. C. MCARTHUR.

Letters to the Editors

Editors Christian Century: I wish to express my deep gratitude because of your ably edited paper. It is a pleasure to tell you how much I enjoy same, and how you always help and inspire.

Editors Christian Century: Thank you for the really splendid paper you are giving us. It is by far our best paper, and you are doing our cause a great service. Go on, and may God bless you!

Editors Christian Century: Let me be counted of the number of those who appreciate what you are doing for the Disciples by means of The Christian Century. You are blazing the way for our next great advance. I have faith to believe that we are identified with too much of a "movement" not to make response soon or late to your progressive and positive editorial policy. Most heartily I wish you success.

Editors Christian Century: This week's Century has just come in. It is an excellent number. All the correspondents are dealt with in a good spirit. My, but the fine distinctions are appalling! If we don't be careful we shall find ourselves wound about by a net that will forbid our escape. Never did I belive it possible that the end of the Restoration movement was to produce a body of thought like that. What a pity some of us did not live in that age when the schoolmen debated the question of needles and angels. Some of our men would have made a record in settling all questions if their own assumptions could be taken as conclusions. Certainly this discussion has produced a harvest of modifiers and distinctions which, if admitted to be valid, would extinguish our plea. This is the time to laugh.

The Book World

A Valuable and Helpful Book

THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST. By Edward Scribner Ames. I have just finished reading this very helpful little volume. The book is a compilation of addresses delivered to his congregation at Hyde Park Church. It is a valuable addition to our literature on apologetics. The author leaves the usual arguments used to prove Christ's divinity and beautifuly deduces the fact from his teachings, his life, and his effect on the world. Here are a few quotations: "By the whole message and example of Jesus and his apostles, it is made emphatic that faith is shown more by the care of the hungry and thirsty, of the stranger and naked, of the sick and imprisoned than by any verbal declaration of his divinity." Instead of demonstrating that Jesus is the Son of God because he partakes of some assumed nature of God, the author maintains that by the study of the Christ we are to learn the nature of God. "Theologians are constantly plying us with sermons and arguments to prove the divinity of Christ, but the great aim of Jesus was to bring men to believe in the justice and mercy and love of God the heavenly Father." "The life of Christ is the given factor in the equation, and from it is to be discovered what kind of a being God is."

The chapter on Why I am not a Unitarian will be interesting to those who have been following the writings of some who have stoutly maintained that he is. While one may not agree with the doctor as to his conclusions concerning the birth of Christ he must in all candor, and in keeping with the position of the Disciples, allow him to have his own views. He adopts the well known motto of the Disciples of Christ: "I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' This certainly is a sane position. "The greatness of Jesus must be conceived in ethical and spiritual terms, and therefore as something which is not guaranteed by a mysterious birth and is not lessened by an ordinary one." "The life and personality of Christ are vivid and powerful realities. His words, ideals and sacrificial devotion live intimately and productively in the spiritual depths of mankind. They are the avenues through which we behold our God." These statements are self-evident truths and are as true to one opinion as another as to his birth. What the world wants today is the helpfulness which only Christ can give, not through an historical knowledge of his origin, how ever much that may help our faith, as the application of the principles of life which he lived and taught. There are many things of theological dispute that we may never know, but the philosophy of the man whom Jesus healed of his blindness is true to day—"One thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see." The greater always includes the lesser, and when Jesus has so positively shown to the world his divinity by the marvelous transformation of the world which has been brought about by no other means than by the application of his teachings why should we stop to hackle over the lesser abstruse propositions that have been discussed from the beginning and are yet as far from settlement?

The book will bear careful reading; the author deals with very delicate and disputed questions, but certainly urges the acceptance of that phase of life that can not be wrong for it is the application of the divine life. I can not help admiring the emphasis upon the Christ character. I commend the book to the careful student. JOEL BROWN.

Books on Social Problems

SOCIOLOGY AND MODERN SOCIAL PROBLEMS, by Charles A. Ellwood, Ph. D. This is an elementary statement of modern social problems designed for the use of teachers. The author does not attempt much in the way of giving the history of society. The book will be useful as a clear and balanced statement of our foremost American problems. Some of the chapter headings will indicate what these problems are: Growth of Population, Immigration, The Negro Problem, The City, Poverty, Crime, Socialism, Education and Progress. Dr. Ellwood places social progress in sharp relief to socialism. He regards the latter as inadequate as a program of progress in that it concerns itself chiefly with the economic interests of the adult, and ignores many facts of biology and psychology. He would offer state insurance in place of the benefits offered by socialism. On the whole, the book may be characterized as having a healthy conservatism, and for young teachers who may not read any other sociological work for awhile, the book is sane and helpful. (Chicago: American Book Company, pp., 330.)

SOCIAL MINISTRY, by Harry F. Ward. The Methodist denomination is rapidly coming into a position of leadership with reference to applying the social program to the work of the church. They have the Methodist Federation for Social Service which has published a considerable list of helpful books and library pamphlets. This book is edited by the editorial secretary of the Federation. Its chapters have been written by some of the greatest Methodists working at the task of social progress. The names of Dr. George Vincent, Mary E. McDowell, Edward T. Devine, and others indicate how rich the Methodists are in social leaders. The chapters of the book lay the biblical foundations for social service in the teachings of Jesus and the prophets and then unfold the different modes of helpfulness for the church. A chapter on the country church is full of interesting suggestions as to the application of the social view-point to the country ministry. It is a wholesome book that will strengthen a great cause. (Chicago: Eaton & Mains, 318 pp., $1.00 net.)

NOSTRUMS AND QUACKERY. This volume reprints a number of articles from the Journal of the American Medical Association exposing the patent medicines and the advertising doctors who have preyed upon the people. These exposures should be given to a larger public. It is to be regretted that the sectarian differences of educated medical men of different schools, together with the labor union ideas of organization advocated by some few, have made the public wary of legislation that might entirely abolish this evil. The patronage accorded worthless and worse than worthless remedies and treatments is a great economic drain upon the American people and a menace to their health. It is a matter of rejoicing that religious journals are developing more conscience over publishing advertising for such interests. (American Medical Association, Chicago.)

THE SOCIAL TASK OF CHRISTIANITY, by Samuel Zane Batten. The author brings to his task the scientific training of a professional teacher of sociology and at the same time the religious appreciations of the preacher. He conceives that Christianity is not static like geometry but is a growing thing. The present social crisis is an opportunity to the church to emphasize the social gospel which has ever been a part of her message. The book organizes its material well and moves to a well-defined close. At the end of the book is given the program of social service formulated by the Federated Churches of America. This program has already been endorsed by the leading denominations. (New York: F. H. Revell Company. Pp. 234. $1.25 net.)

THE LABOR QUESTION, by Washington Gladden. Washington Gladden has spent a long and useful life in the Christian ministry and through it all has stood for the rights of the common man. In this book he states his views on the labor question with great fairness and illumination. He states the case against the union as strongly as we have ever seen it stated, and then proceeds to show how necessary the union is in industrial evolution. The style of the book is simple and direct and it furnishes a delightful piece of reading upon a great question. (Boston: The Pilgrim Press. Pp. 209.)

THE SPIRIT OF SOCIAL WORK, by Edward T. Devine, editor of the Survey. The book contains a group of ten chapters rather loosely related but all bearing upon the general topic of social reform. These articles are either addresses delivered on various occasions or articles reprinted from the Survey, of which Mr. Devine is editor. He is a virile writer in the social field and these addresses are brought together to express his views upon some of the most vital issues in our social life of today. (New York: Charities Publication Committee. Pp. 231. $1.)

"No, Elvira," said the older; "but a pair of socks would."

Some Points of View on Christian Union

From a Member of the Episcopal Church.

A good friend, a member of the Episcopal Church, was saying not long ago, that her point of view toward people who differed with her on matters of Christian doctrine had changed; formerly, her attitude toward them was merely that of tolerance—they had a right to their opinions as she had a right to hers, and each could follow their own convictions in their separate, and often widely diverging paths. But of late years she had been studying more closely conditions in her own church, and she found there almost every phase of belief that was in the different denominations around her—from the extreme high church wing, which approached Roman Catholicism, to a freedom of thought that was classed by some with Unitarianism. And yet, she said, she not only tolerated these people of such varied views, but worked and worshipped with them as brethren. If she could do that in the church of her fathers and of her choice, surely she could do it with people of other communions.

We find as great differences of opinion among the Disciples of Christ as my friend found in the Protestant Episcopal Church—not along the same lines, but as distinct and divergent. One of the gentlest and most saintly men among us was arraigned before the official board of his church two years ago; because he had called on a minister of "one of the sects" to offer prayer in one of its meetings, and because he was in the employ of an organized board of missions! On the other hand, some of our members are so far removed from that point of view, that they are charged with a liberalism that approaches Unitarianism. And yet, while we may wrangle in pulpit and in print, we still count each other as brethren, and are working together for the same divine ends—the enthroning of Jesus Christ in our own hearts and lives, and the spread of his kingdom over the whole world!

Is not the point of view of the good member of the Episcopal Church worthy of our consideration? A mere attitude of tolerance is often that of a supercilious superiority almost intolerable, which brands all other churches but our own as "the sects," or "the denominations." Can we not extend to all who love and worship the Lord Jesus Christ with sincerity the same spirit of brotherliness that we bear to those who differ with us in our own communion, and work with them as churches of Christ, as we do with each other?

Point of View in Young People's Movements.

We are apt to think that youth should go to age for counsel and wisdom, but sometimes age can learn a lesson from youth. Our Lord held up a child as a pattern of Christian character to his chosen apostles and said, "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall in no wise enter therein." We owe the beginning of the missionary movement in America to a group of praying college students. In attending a recent convention of young people, the debt that the Church of Christ owes to them was brought home anew to me. Think of those three splendid organizations, The Young Men's Christian Association, The Student Volunteer Movement, and the Society of Christian Endeavor! All are interdenominational, and all have made great contributions to the cause of Christian Union. I have read somewhere that when the idea of applying steam to ocean travel was being first urged, that a body of so-called scientists met in New York City, and proved (to their own satisfaction!) that it was impossible, because the amount of coal necessary to take a vessel across the ocean would sink it before it left the harbor—and while they were demonstrating its impracticability, a ship steamed safely across the Atlantic! While preachers and editors and theologians have been splitting hairs about the terms on which churches could unite, these young people's societies have proved the possibility of Christian union—by simply uniting! They have crossed the ocean that divided Christians, while leaders were sitting on the shore, devising plans to accomplish the great deed. They have united on the idea that is growing everywhere, that the gospel of this age is the gospel of a person, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, not of a church, or of a creed. Loyalty to Christ, likeness to Christ, service for Christ, have been the common doctrines on which they have united, and surely his blessing has been manifest in their world-wide growth and world-wide work. Their view point is a splendid optimism about the necessity and the practicability of Christian union.

A Needed Point of Emphasis

The celebration of our Centennial three years ago gave us the backward look over our history, and enabled us to see things in truer perspective than even before. We saw how our church was forced from the haven of its quiet birth hour, when its overtures for loving fellowship and union were rejected, and it passed into the stormy waters of a struggle for existence, and became for many years a church militant. Hardly had this stage of conflict and debate passed, before it entered on a period of growth and expansion, unparalleled among modern churches, and contemporary with that on an era of missionary activity at home and abroad. As it has grown in years and service, should we not also grow in accent on riper and fuller ideals of Christian character? Is it not the normal and inevitable thing in these years of our maturity, that our great point of emphasis should be on the full grown man in Christ Jesus.

Such is the stage through which the great apostle seemed to pass; in his earlier epistles, the struggle period of Christian life is shadowed, the relation of the Jew and Gentile Christian, freedom from the law, justification by faith—these and many other sound doctrines are expounded with all the logic, and learning, and eloquence of which he was master. But in his later epistles, it is the relation of Christians to Christ that is the point of emphasis; note the phrases he has coined to express this—believers are "in Christ," Christ is in them, they are related to him as the stones of a building to the corner stone, as members of a body to the head, as the wife to the husband.

These ripest expressions of the mind of Paul dwell less on the justification of the sinner, than on the sanctification of the saint. Higher ideals of holiness among its members is the great need of our church, of all the churches of today—it has been the great need of the church of all ages. The enemies of the church have ever been from within, rather than from without. If the same mind had always been in it which was in Christ Jesus, his prayer for the union of his followers would have been answered, and the world brought to his feet long ago.

Woman's Doings

—Madam Paquin, the head of the famous dressmaking establishment in Paris which sets the styles for the world, aside from her interest in the business, draws a salary of $60,000 a year. In 1891 she was a poor, unknown dressmaker and her husband a cheap clerk.

—There is a womanless republic on a peninsula south of Macedonia in Greece. The place is Mount Athos, classic peninsula of Okte, the easternmost of three little peninsulas below Macedonia. It is called the Mount of the Twenty Monasteries, and was used in ancient times as a signalling station to Asia Minor. It is a real republic. There are 10,000 monks there, who govern themselves without interference from Turkey or any other country. There are, however, no government buildings, no president or other office holders. The only police force is composed of men who patrol the coast to keep out women and men who have no permit to enter this most exclusive of countries.

—Matilda Church-Keller, who died recently, left a Bible 400 years old to the Lutheran Theological Seminary of Philadelphia.

—Fraulein Gertrude Wocker, aged 33, a Swiss, is the youngest accredited professor in all the German universities, it is said. She is a brilliant Swiss who has just taken her post as professor of natural philosophy at the University of Leipsic, having been appointed by the German government. Another woman, Countess van de Ladevan, the government nominee for professor at the University of Bonn, which is that of the crown prince, was refused the sanction of the university authorities.

—Miss Annie S. Peck, who beat all American mountain climbing records by reaching the summit of Mount Huascaran in Peru, has just returned again from Peru after the conquest of another giant peak, Mount Coropuna, upon which, at an elevation of 21,000 feet, she planted a suffragette flag bearing the grim device, "Votes for Women."

—Mrs. Virginia Grant Corbin, a sister of Gen. U. S. Grant, celebrated her 80th birthday last week at her home in Orange, N. J., where she has lived many years. She is still bright and active.

—Mrs. Margaret Crumpacker, of La Porte, Ind., and wife of the late Jonathan W. Crumpacker, a former Indiana state senator and later a federal judge in New Mexico, has made announcement that she would tour the country, speaking in all of the large cities in opposition to woman suffrage. Mrs. Crumpacker has entered the service of the Anti-Suffrage League and her travels will also take her abroad.

—Club women of Chicago are to become "big sisters" to the dependent 14 year old girls who are obliged to leave school. The battle of these girls with hard industrial conditions on one side and the allurements to vice on the other side has awakened the sympathy of the Chicago Woman's Club, the City Club and the Association of College Alumnæ.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

There have been three additions recently to the church at Watseka, ministered to by Elmore Sinclair. A part of the observance of Educational Day was the ordination of a young man to the ministry.

Plans for the new church building at Camp Point are progressing nicely, and new members are being added to the church. There were five baptisms on February 11. H. J. Reynolds is the pastor.

R. E. Henry has been asked to continue his work with Niantic church. This church and its pastor will have part in the Rural Church Conference, to be held in Niantic, March 25-27.

Mackinaw church, with J. W. Street the pastor, is looking forward to a great celebration of its seventy-fifth anniversary this fall. A meeting recently held by home forces was intended primarily to arouse the church membership to active service.

There have been seventeen additions, twelve by confession at regular services of Jacksonville church, during February. Clyde F. Darsie is pastor. H. P. Shaw, the church's living-link missionary, filled the pulpit March 3. The Eureka College Glee Club will give a concert in the church March 13.

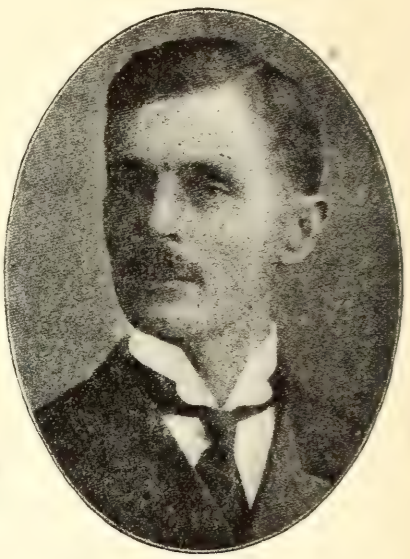
E. A. Gilliland and J. K. O'Neal recently held a most satisfactory meeting of three weeks duration for Washington church, of which Ernest H. Reed is pastor. The entire community was sympathetic with the work of the meeting. There were twenty additions.

E. A. Cary of Franklin, has assumed the work at Table Grove, preaching his first sermon Feb. 4. The work opens under the most favorable conditions in all its departments. Table Grove feels itself very fortunate in securing a man of Mr. Cary's qualifications and much good is expected to be accomplished. Fulton County is again coming to its self as for a time it seemed all the pastors in the county were making a change to new fields.

The work in Sterling is slowly moving forward. The last two Sundays there were 109 in the Sunday-school, and $2.54 cents collection. They have re-organized the young men's class, and see fruit immediately. The young men now attend worship more regularly. Since last report two have been added by letter and four by confession. They are aiming to get a contribution from every member, however small the offering may be, and have adopted the budget plan, drawing all offerings from one common treasury. The budget includes all expenses and offerings for all activities. Miss Mary Kelly was with the church recently and made an inspiring address. Plans for remodeling the building will probably be carried out the coming summer. Charles A. Stevens is pastor at Sterling.

The morning service of March 3 at First church, Bloomington, was in the nature of a memorial to the late Mrs. Judith Bradner. She was the last survivor of the charter members of the church. Mrs. Bradner was almost ninety-eight years old at the time of her death, having been born in Kentucky in the year 1814. With her parents, she came to Bloomington in 1835. Alexander Campbell was a personal friend of her father's and upon Mr. Campbell's last visit to Bloomington he was Mrs. Bradner's guest. For some years it had been the custom of the Sunday-school to send Mrs. Bradner flowers on her birthday. The memory of her long and faithful life in this church cannot but prove a benediction to its members.

W. F. Turner, for three years pastor of Central Church, Peoria, has resigned to accept a call to North Yakima Church, Wash. This is the pulpit to which Illinois recently sent one of its princeliest preachers, O. W. Lawrence, of Decatur, whose death within a few weeks of his arrival in the western city brought tragic grief to his new congregation and his thousands of friends in this and other states. Mr. Turner is admirably fitted to his new task. He came to Peoria from Joplin, Mo., where he had been successful in building up a strong congregation. During his pastorate in Peoria Central Church has established a new mission and fostered into independence the branch church on Howett street. Central church Sunday-school has been greatly increased in size and efficiency in recent months through the assistance of Miss Eva Lemert, the Sunday-school specialist. Among ministers of all denominations Mr. Turner is highly esteemed. He has been president of the United Ministers' Association during the past year.



Rev. W. F. Turner.

First church, Springfield, of which F. W. Burnham is pastor, is planning to dedicate its new church building about the first of May. A committee is at work on a programme, which will continue throughout the week following the dedicatory services. Mr. Burnham has recently received two beautiful pictures of mountain scenery in Colorado, the gift of friends in the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company, intended for the boy's club room.

Eureka College

Emory W. Ross, who has been at the head of the commercial department of Eureka College, for the past year, has been appointed by the C. W. B. M. to go to Africa. He will enter the Missionary Training School at Indianapolis, and will take up the work in Liberia in the fall.

The one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Charles Dickens was celebrated at Eureka this year. A large audience of students and townspeople were present to pay homage to the great novelist. Addresses were made by students and professors. Prof. R. E. Hieronymus, former president of Eureka College, delivered an address on "Dickens—an Interpreter of Life."

The returns from Education Day indicate that fully as many churches will have fellowship with Eureka College this year as last. When the campaign for Education Day observance began, we felt if we held our own this year, we would do well. It now looks as if we would go beyond last year, which was the banner year.

The annual missionary conference of the colleges of Central Illinois was held in Monmouth the first of February. There were eighty-six delegates in attendance representing nineteen colleges. Eleven students from Eureka College were present. Eureka is always on hand when things of a missionary nature are up.

The Eureka Chautauqua will be a little later this year than usual. It will begin July 11, and will be introduced by the country school play picnic of Woodford County, conducted by County Superintendent Roy L. Moore. Mr. Moore is an alumnus of Eureka College, and is one of our best friends. The Chautauqua has some excellent talent for this year, including Governor Glenn and Colonel Bain.

The annual debate between Bradley Polytechnic Institute and Eureka College is to be held at Bradley Hall, Peoria, Friday evening, March 1. The question to be discussed is "The Initiative and Referendum." Eureka College will be represented by a large delegation. It looks now as if it would be a lively time.

Mrs. Royal J. Dye occupied the pulpit of the Christian Church in Eureka the last Sunday in February, and delivered a very thrilling address. The Eureka Church will make a splendid offering to Foreign Missions this year.

The Missionary Rally, conducted by Secretary E. W. Allen and Missionaries Shaw and Hedges in Eureka recently was one of the best we have ever had. Several of the students in Eureka College deliverd short adrsses, and much local interest was aroused in the matter. H. P. Shaw's address in the evening was one of the very best. He used the stereopticon, and told the story of the new China in a very thrilling way.

The Boosters of Eureka College held a great meeting Wednesday evening, Feb. 28. The college band played. The debaters, who expect to go against Bradley Polytechnic Institute, were on hand with flattering promises of what they hoped to do. Prof. Clyde L. Lyon made a speech. There was much singing and "loud talk." H. H. PETERS.

The Antioch church near Shelbyville wants a preacher half time. Write Jas. McDonald, Shelbyville, R. D. 1, box 36.

J. E. Stout held a short meeting in his home town, Mulberry Grove, reorganizing the board of officers and setting things in order for a better work. He is now in a meeting at Bridgeport, with Geo. W. Schroeder. During April he will be at Sandoval.

The Fife Brothers Evangelistic Company are in a meeting at Onarga with Milo W. Nethercutt. Mr. Nethercutt soon takes up the work at Moneaqua.

F. T. Peters is the new minister at Pleasant Plains. He comes from Terre Haute, Ind., and we welcome him.

Frank H. Vernor, Homer, is available for a half-time preaching point within reach of Homer. Call him; he will do you a good service.

It will be a great favor to this office if any one who can give us the present address of A. Gamble, formerly a professor in Dixon, Ill.. He is (or was) a real estate dealer and promoter. Drop us a card, please.

E. M. Norton has decided to remain with the work at Potomac. His work is moving along very nicely.

L. M. Mullikin of Paris has begun his new work with the church at Detroit. Prospects are very flattering.

J. I. O'Neal held his own meeting at Oblong with twenty-seven additions. It was a remarkable meeting considering local conditions—small town, much opposition, another revival meeting going on, and five other churches.

We are nearing the greatest temperance battle Illinois ever had, the legislative primaries April 9. On that day we will win or lose County Local Option in the nomination of "dry" or "wet" candidates for the legislature. Every preacher and Christian voter in the state ought to be wide awake to the importance of working hard, not only on that day, but from now till the polls are closed April 9. Work and vote for men who are pledged to favor county option. Bring all the influence possible to bear upon them. The fight is on to the finish.

Pittwood has called S. H. Kuntz, a student in Eureka College, for half time.

The Central and Howett St. churches, Peoria, greatly enjoyed the visit of Bros. Allen, Shaw and Hedges in their foreign mission rally Feb. 19. Their messages will be long remembered. Also the visit of Miss Mark Kelly, of Nankin, China, Feb. 25.

We are very sorry to announce that Bro. W. F. Turner of the Central church, Peoria, presented his resignation March 3. He expects to go to the state of Washington in the near future. The church has been prospering under his faithful ministry to an unusual degree, and we regret his leaving.

B. S. Boone has enrolled as a minister, with the endorsement of the Paxton Church, and desires to enter upon the work. Call him to your service.

Said to be the greatest meeting ever held in Raymond closed Mar. 3, with sixty-four additions, held by Brother Crabb. The church has called G. Floyd Shaul of Hume to be their minister. This meeting was brought about by S. R. Lewis of Harvel. Other pastors could do great good by taking an interest in weak churches near their fields of labor. Try it.

A. F. Norman is getting hold of the work at New Boston, and the church prospers in all lines. They are striving for a Front Rank church, and have attained a number of points.

Preachers, please tell us when you change your addresses or any of your preaching points. We need this information constantly. A postal card and two minutes' time will do it. It seems difficult to impress our fellows with the importance of this matter. Sometimes it looks as if they do not want us to know where they are or where they preach. If we can help you in any way be free to call on us. We are at your service.

Robert W. Moore of White Hall just closed a good meeting with Pastor McNemar of El Paso, which resulted in thirty additions, and the church is greatly blessed every way.

Chas. W. Clark, formerly of Ludlow, is enjoying his work with Harold E. Monser in the evangelistic field, now in Syracuse, N. Y. He has had calls to settle in other states, but he says he is coming back and locate in Illinois in the not far distant future. Nearly all the boys come back home sooner or later.

W. L. Sanders of Litchfield is available for service. Call him. The Litchfield church endorses him, and he can be had at reasonable salary.

The Fourth district will have a series of Sunday-school rallies and contests in the next few months. There will be lively times.

That state offering, was it taken? Has it been sent to our treasurer, W. D. Deweese? One pastor says, "I was surprised that our treasurer did not send in the offering long before this. I did my duty in regard to the offering and thought the treasurer would do the rest." Please look into the matter and be sure that it has been sent in.

And be sure that it is sent to the right place. One church clerk just writes us: "Our church took the collection and the treasurer, through mistake, sent it to the Home Missionary Society."

If the offering has not been taken in your church, kindly do so at your earliest opportunity, and make it as large as possible.

Another preacher says he has taken two missionary offerings and the church treasurer put both of them into the current expense fund and refuses to forward them to the work for which they were given. What would you call that? Surely not a "square deal."

So far as we know now the district conventions will be held as follows: First—Walnut, June 11-13; Third—Dallas City, May 14-16; Fourth, ———— June 4-6; Fifth, — Illiopolis, June 5-7; Sixth—De Land, June 18-29; Seventh—Olney, June 19-21; Eighth — Elkville, June 25-27.

The city mission superintendents of four leading denominations addressed the Congregational Ministers' Association recently on the problems of Chicago religion. Orvis F. Jordan, the Disciples' superintendent, opened the discussion.

The seventy-first quarterly convocation of the C. W. B. M. union of Chicago churches, was held last Thursday at Austin Church. Mrs. Maud Ferris, of Taylorville, Ill., who had been announced to speak was kept at made an eloquent and vision-ful address on "The Larger Things of Missions." Miss Thompson is a heartening speaker. A paper by Miss Maxwell on the history of the dealings of the United States with the Indians was full of interesting data and received much favorable comment.

I. Raymond Lines has resigned at Monroe Street Church, after a two years' ministry there. Mr. Lines came to Chicago from Newman, Ill. He is a graduate of Hiram College and had previously held pastorates at Toledo, O., and Ladoga, Ind. The difficulties of the Chicago field were met by him with a brave spirit. He has greatly strengthened the souls of this heroic congregation by his thoughtful, spiritual and optimistic ministry. The people love him and regret his departure. He is spending the current weeks in assisting the Van Wert, O., church during a union evangelistic meeting now in progress in that city.

An advance step of great significance to the Disciples' Divinity House at the University of Chicago was taken last week when an additional fifty feet of ground adjoining their present superb lot was purchased. The deal was made possible by the will of the late Mrs Sarah K. Homan of Peoria, Ill., who left a substantial bequest to this strategic institution. The House now owns a corner lot 150x170 feet, across the street from the University quadrangle, and regarded as one of the most valuable pieces of ground in Hyde Park. The present purchase is an initial step toward the consummation of far-reaching plans which it is hoped may be announced to our readers very soon. The commercial wisdom of the board of trustees of the Divinity House has from the beginning proved itself an equal partner to the high scholarship of the men who make up the faculty.

The above picture shows the corner buildings of the University of Chicago Quadrangle. The arrow points to the eaves of the Hyde Park church building standing on the Divinity House lot, which has recently been enlarged by the purchase of additional fifty feet.

The church at Bellaire, Ohio, J. N. Scholes, minister, reports an expenditure last year of almost $5,000, of which almost $1,200 was given to our missionary organizations. It is doubtful if a church is ever justified in spending more than eighty per cent of its income on itself.

The meeting at Springfield, Oregon, is progressing nicely under the direction of Evangelist Lawrence Wright, who is assisting Prof. E. C. Wigmore, the minister. The audiences are increasing. Every sermon is of the Jerusalem gospel sort, and will bring lasting results. So far there have been three accessions.

Evangelists Jesse Kellems and Harold Humbert conducted another week-end meeting at Creswell, Ore. Steps have been taken to fully organize the work there. Twenty-seven have banded themselves together. Evangelist G. E. Williams and wife, with Miss Morton as music director, will begin a meeting there soon.

Paul Moore, late assistant editor of the Christian Evangelist, has been ill with typhoid fever for nearly two months, in the hospital at St. Petersburg, Fla. His many friends will be glad to know that he has now become able to be removed to his father's home at Eustis, Fla., and is slowly convalescing.

Mrs. Garst, one of the second band of missionaries to go from the ranks of the Disciples to the Orient, occupied the pulpit on March 3 in First Church, Ottumwa, Ia. Mrs. Garst was for fourteen years a missionary in Japan, and is eagerly heard by the churches on the work of the gospel in the island empire. Mr. Garst fell at his post of duty in Japan, in 1899.

The first three months of Royal L. Handley's pastorate at Kalamazoo, Mich., has been encouraging. The congregations have been good, and sixteen persons have been added to the membership. Mr. Handley has been appointed to direct the Institute conference for Sunday-school superintendents in connection with the Men and Religion campaign.

M. E. Chatley writes from Centerville, Ia.: "Centerville buried under greatest snow of season. Small audience present, but enthusiasm intense. Raised our "living link" fund, and will continue the support of Mrs. R. D. McCoy at Tokyo, Japan. Took subscriptions also for support of our state "living link" at Ft. Dodge, Ia., where Brother S. R. Reynolds now labors. This fund is also assured. Considering weather conditions, the response of our people was truly marvelous."

The annual dinner of the Disciples' Missionary Union of New York City, held at the Hotel Marseilles on Tuesday evening, was a decided success, with one hundred and ninety guests partaking of the repast and listening to the after-dinner speeches made by Rev. Geo. Alexander, Moderator of the New York Presbytery, James M. Philputt of the Central Church, and Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, National President of the C. W. B. M. A tribute was paid to Prof. Chas. L. Loos of Transylvania University, word of whose death had just reached the city.

Brownville is the oldest of the Christian churches in Nebraska. It was organized in January, 1855. Brownville is the oldest town in Nebraska, having been laid out a few years previous to the organization of the church. The church has had three buildings, and much tribulation in its fifty-seven years of history. It has preaching only half time, but one of the livest Sunday-schools in the state is conducted there. The school has attained front rank for 1911 and will do the same for 1912; and the church, under the leadership of a Cotner Student, B. A. Davies, has the honor of being the first church in Nebraska to declare for Front Rank Standards.

The funeral services of Prof. Charles Louis Loos were held at Central Church, Lexington, February 29, at 2:30. A male quartette sung his favorite hymns, "How Firm a Foundation," "Jerusalem the Golden," and "Lead Kindly Light." Prof. B. C. Hagerman offered prayer. Rev. I. J. Spencer read the Scripture and made a tender address of a personal nature, as pastor of the honored scholar. President Crossfield spoke of him as an educator. F. M. Rains made a brief address concerning Prof. Loos' relation to the Foreign Society of which he was president twelve years. Bishop Burton of the Episcopal Church spoke eloquently of the wide vision and the Christ-like spirit of Professor Loos. Prof. Deweese offered the closing prayer. A large gathering filled the auditorium.

On February 6, 1812, the first five missionaries of the American board were ordained in the church of Salem, Mass. Exactlf one hundred years later, February 6, 1912, five other missionaries were ordained in the same church under the same American board. It was a great event. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, of Brooklyn, preached the ordination sermon. Benjamin Franklin expressed the wish that he might return to the earth after one hundred years. If that were granted to the first five missionaries sent out from America, what rich harvests would astonish them. The devotion, the unswerving consecration, the service of those first American missionaries, have made a difference which only heaven is wide enough to measure.

D. Y. Donaldson, who has been corresponding secretary of the Missouri Christian Missionary Society since September, 1910, has closed his work with this society and accepted a call to become Associate Pastor with Dr. Combs of the Independence Boulevard church, Kansas City. The State Board has arranged with R. B. Briney to become office secretary of our state work from March 1 to the close of the current missionary year. Mr. Briney is pastor of the Forest Ave. Church, Kansas City. The church has generously agreed to allow him a part of each day for work in the office of the State Board, and he undertakes this work as a contribution to our Missouri work, as the salary offered is only a nominal one.

"The Law of Spiritual Growth" was the subject of the morning sermon by Dr. J. M. Philputt of the Central Church, Disciples of Christ, New York, recently. In the evening the pastor gave the second address in the series on "Christ the Great Teacher," the topic being "His Fascinating Personality.' The audiences are steadily increasing in this new church. Mr. Deloss Smith has been engaged as director of music for the coming year. Mr. Smith will also sing tenor in the quartette. He is the author of a number of church hymns and with Mrs. Smith is now on a Western concert tour. Mrs. Smith has been engaged as organist, having formerly played the organ in the West Side Christian Church in San Francisco.

The staff of the Young Mens Christian Association of Hiram College, are busy at present securing funds among the alumni and friends to complete the furnishing and remodeling of a parlor for the use of students, town folk, and visitors. An extra edition of The Advance has been mailed to Hiram people over the country, and excellent returns in a financial way are anticipated. Under the present regime, the Saturday night meetings of the association boys have been exceptionally interesting. F. L. Fink supervising this department, is deserving of the praise for the success of this work. Among the out-of-town speakers of note who have addressed the student body during the year are: Messrs. George Bellamy, Hiram House, Cleveland; Secretary Lewis of the Cleveland Central Y. M. C. A.; Tom Lewis, probation officer, Cleveland; Willard Behan, associate chief engineer of L. S. M. S. R. R.; Rev. R. Nichols, Youngstown; R. P. Glosser, Canton; Ralph Hollinger. An especially interesting and helpful feature of the chapel sessions the last few weeks, has been the brief lectures of Presdent Bates. Possibly no other one factor contributes more to the high ideals of the college than these brief addresses backed by the true life.

George Aydelott, pastor at Muskogee, Okla., wires us under date of Mar. 3, as follows:

"Eighty-five added here today in the great Scoville meeting under the direction of the First Christian Church. One hundred eighty-nine this last week with eight hundred in twenty-one days of invitation. Four days of stormy weather this week which made the work very difficult. Several of the leading business men of the city were reached today. Greatest mass meeting for women ever held in this city was held in convention hall today. Last Sunday afternoon and the Sunday before two tremendous mass meetings for men only. The daily papers state that these meetings surpassed the greatest political meeting ever held in the city. Many visitors from various points in Eastern Oklahoma today and the meeting is affecting the entire state. The consecration sincerity and sanctity of the Scoville evangelistic company is the comment of the entire community. This is the first real revival Muskogee has ever experienced."

DEDICATION AT FULTON, MO.

We are glad to present the picture of the splendid building which was dedicated last Sunday, Mar. 10, at Fulton, Mo., where T. E. Winter is pastor. The building is 119 feet long and 81 feet wide with a dome

Rev. T. E. Winter.

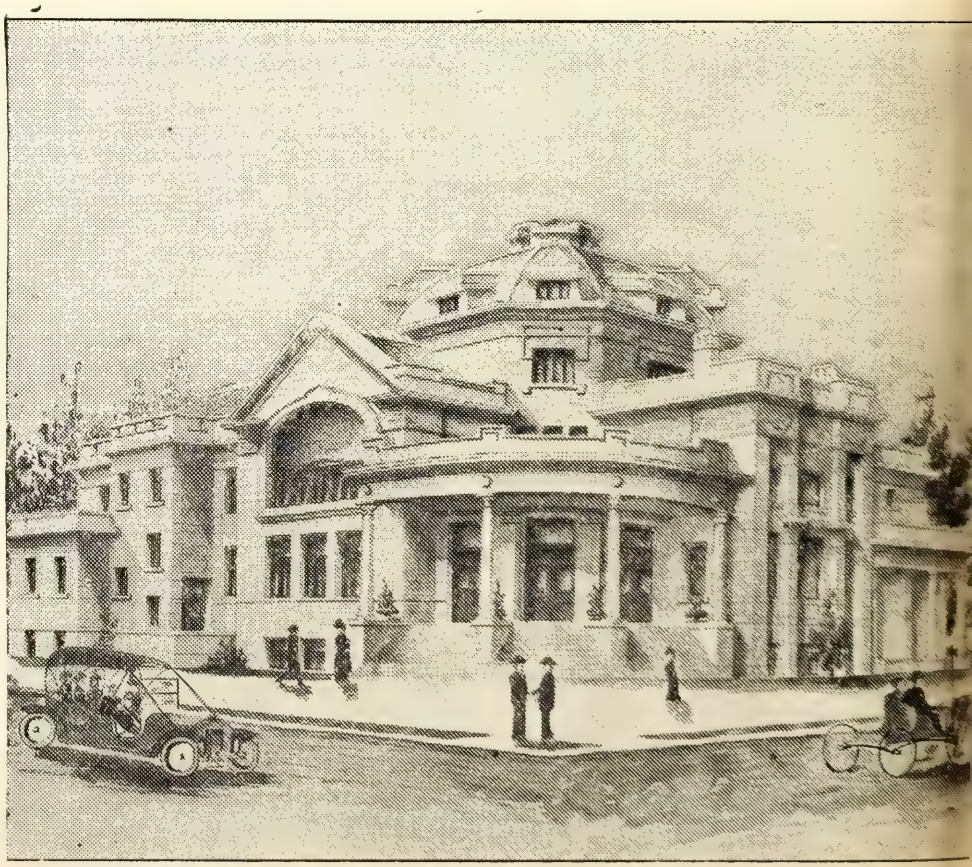
62 feet high. The material is Iowa granite brick trimmed with Carthage stone with a tile roof. The interior finish is oak.

The English basement has a nine-foot ceiling with all windows above the grade line. The entire floor space is finished, including large Sunday-school assembly room, room for the Primary Department, Baraca and Philathea rooms, public reading room, boys' club room, kitchen and serving room. The large assembly room is also to be used for social functions. Wood floor over concrete. The heating plant, fuel room, and water heater for baptistery are in a fireproof sub-basement.

The main floor contains Sanctuary 68x50 feet, with choir and organ, main Sunday-school room together with seven class rooms, pastor's study, Sunday-school Superintendent's room and Secretary's room. The Sunday-school Department is separated from the Sanctuary by a hoisting partition on counter poised weights. This partition is finished and tinted to match the walls and is mechanically operated. The beautiful open baptistery is made of white Italian marble. This floor exclusive of the Sunday-school Department has a seating capacity of 550; inclusive of that department, 875. The old pipe organ, that was used in the former church, will be installed in the Sunday-school Department and a new organ installed in the Sanctuary.

The balcony floor contains two balconies, that in the Sanctuary seating 220, making a total capacity exclusive of Sunday-school Department of 770. It contains also the balcony in the Sunday-school Department with seven class-rooms, having a seating capacity of 225. When the hoisting partition is raised, the whole is one large auditorium, seating 1,300 people, all of whom are in front of the speaker, and have excellent sighting to the pulpit desk.

The cost of the building is about $56,000 and is a fitting embodiment in permanent building materials of the work that T. E. Winter has accomplished in the city of Fulton. A university man of the evangelical, loyal type, he has laid the foundations broad and deep and builded thereon in a lasting way. The William Woods College for Girls is in Fulton and the influence of this church will thus, through its effect on the student life, reach far wider fields than are touched by the most of the churches, even of this rank. The Christian Century congratulates pastor and people and city on the completion of such an enterprise which will be increasingly fruitful in all the good works that are expected of a representative church of the Disciples.



Fulton's Beautiful New Sanctuary, Dedicated last Sunday without debt. Dr. H. O. Breeden Lead the congregation in Raising $18,500 and follows with an evangelistic meeting.

China's Desolation

6,000,000 Chinese are starving and dying throughout China as a result of the destruction of crops by flood and war. America is asked to contribute $1,000,000 at once to meet the immediate needs of these suffering millions. Every hospital, dispensary, orphan asylum and charitable institution established by the missionary societies is crowded with the sick, dying and orphaned ones. Only God knows to what extent the timely aid rendered by a Christian nation like ours, will prepare China's millions for a more ready acceptance of the Gospel of Christ. Already President Yuan of the new republic has cut off his queue indicating the official cutting off of the past in China.

Benevolent Association News

An application has just been received for the admission of Mrs. Milne into one of our homes for the aged. Her husband was at one time a very efficient pioneer preacher It is a joy to bear the burdens of one who is so worthy and who has so faithfully served the cause of Christ.

Word comes from East Aurora that Grandpa Hume, one of the choice spirits in the Havens Home, is very ill. Grandpa Hume is in his nineties. He has been a life-long devoted member of the church. He has been waiting a number of years in this home furnished by his brethren, while a mansion is being finished for him "over there."

A new annuity has just been received, and yet it comes from an old annuitant, one who has formed the habit of investing all his surplus with the Lord for the care of the widow and the orphan. Surely this brother is laying up treasure in heaven.

The Sunday-schools are preparing for the Easter offering. To them more than any other factor in the church is due the credit for the splendid work of the association. J. H. Rosecrans' Cantata, Easter Gifts and Gratitude, is in demand. It is being furnished free.

Easter is the only day in all the year devoted to the care of the orphan child, the widowed mother, and the aged, indigent disciple of Christ. It should be universally observed.

Mrs. Nora Woodruff, an active member of the church at Valparaiso, Ind., for some years the efficient superintendent of the Christian Hospital at Valparaiso, is stricken with tuberculosis. Mrs. Woodruff is a widow with one child to support. She is a cultured, devoted Christian woman. She is alone in the world. She is without relatives and without health. In health she cheerfully not only bore her own burdens, but the burdens of others. With health gone she is dependent upon her brethren. Because of the generosity of a few brethren she is now in Texas, seeking a milder climate. Now that she can not work her brethren should cheerfully share her burdens. Who will help provide for this worthy sister in the hour of her extremity? Send your answer and your contribution to The National Benevolent Association, 2955 N. Euclid Ave., St. Louis, and say it is for Mrs. Woodruff.

On account of a recent fire scare it was decided to wire the Cleveland Orphanage for electricity, which will cost in the neighborhood of $300. The board of managers would appreciate it if friends of the institution would help bear this expense incurred in the interest of the safety of the children.

Foreign Society News

"There never was a time in the history of Japan that seems so opportune as now. The government is leaning toward Christianity and the Home Minister has called for a conference of Buddhists, Shintoists and Christians to help in saving the national morality. There are hopeful signs that Christianity is at the down of the day of conquest like the world has not seen in a thousand years."—Fred E. Hagin, Tokyo, Japan.

W. R. Hunt, Chuchow, China, writes: "All the country work is still. The outside of the walled cities is in the hands of armed brigands. China is in a terrible condition. We long for the dawn of the new day. We wish the republic a booming success.. It is as France and England and the United States fighting for their emancipation and the liberties which make men free. Now is the time for evangelism."

The sale of missionary books by the Foreign Society reaches high-water mark. We have just received a card from J. C. Ogden, Batang, Tibet, under date of September 17, 1911, in which he says, "Largest crowd at regular services today since opening at Batang. Must rent more room until we can build. Bible seller is doing fine work selling literature. Telegraph open to Chamdo and postoffice opened through Tibet. Area the size of Kansas open and if we don't look out Tibet must be reported as a "neglected" not a "closed" land. Collection last Sunday $1.50 gold, collection today $2.00 gold."

Last week the Foreign Society received $600 on the Annuity Plan from a friend in Kentucky, who had before given $2,500 in this way. Another gift was received also of $250 from a friend in Ohio, who has made a number of gifts by this plan. Alsa a friend in Indiana sent $300 on the Annuity Plan, who made a gift in the same way last year.

Eleven new Living-links have been reported since the beginning of the missionary year. A number more expected in the near future.
